That he may be accepted before the Lord.] That the children of Israel and their sacrifices and gifts might be accepted when they presented them to God; which they were not, if the high-priest did not appear before him in this manner on their behalf. The heathens themselves (as Athenæus informs us, lib. xv. cap. 5.) thought prayers and sacrifices then acceptable to their gods, when they offered them with crowns on their heads. And therefore a great many authors tell us, the priests in all countries were crowned when they ministered; nay, the sacrifices themselves, and their altars, and their holy utensils, were crowned; as if all their services had been ineffectual if made without a crown. For they that prepared the beasts for sacrifice, and the musicians, and all that were present, were crowned, as appears out of ancient coins and innumerable ancient writers. (See Cuperus, Apotheos. Hom. p. 70.)

Ver. 39. And thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen.] This co*at* is one of the garments ordered to be made ver. 4. in Hebrew called ketonah: from whence both the Greek word χιτὼν, and the Latin tunica, seem to be derived. The matter of it was fine linen, and therefore it was white. The form of it was not much unlike one of our shirts, with sleeves coming down to the wrists; but made pretty close to the body, and so long as to reach down to the heels. It was the most inward of all the priestly garments, being next to their body. And though it be not mentioned in the description of it, there is no doubt that it had a slit in the neck of it, by which it was put over their head, and then tied to the neck with strings.

Embroidered.] The Hebrew word taschbetz all agree signifies a work with certain figures woven in it, either of gold or other materials. But what sort of figures is not certain. The famous Salmasius thinks they were round, like to our eyes. Others take them to have been square or cubical. R. Sol. Jarchi saith in general, that it was a work like the ouches (as we translate mischbetzoth), in which the precious stones were set. But none, I think, hath made such likely guesses at the figure of them as Jo. Braunius, who takes them to have been nothing else, but lacus aut fossulas angulares, &c. such little deep holes, as resemble those that are in one of the stomachs of those animals that chew the cud, called reticulum. (See lib. i. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebræorum, cap. 17.)

And thou shalt make the mitre of linen.] See ver. 37. where the mitre is mentioned.

And thou shalt make the girdle of needle-work.] It is mentioned before (ver. 4.) under the name of abanet, or abnet, which, no doubt, signifies a girdle or belt; yet not like our common girdles, but like that which we call a sash, being made of twined linen and worsted of divers colours, as we find xxxix. 29. where blue, and purple, and scarlet, signifies wool, or worsted-yarn of these colours. Such were the girdles of all the priests, which they wore all the year, the high-priest as well as the rest, except upon one day (that of expiation), when he had on a girdle of fine linen only, not mixed with woollen. These girdles were of such a length, that they might go round the body more than once, as Josephus tells us, lib. iii. cap. 8. For, if we may believe him, they were two-and-thirty ells long, and four fingers broad, being hollow within. When they were not in the act of ministration, both ends of them hung down to their very feet, πρὸς εὐπρέπειαν, &c. (as the same Josephus speaks) for comeliness' sake, that they might ap- pear more goodly to the beholders: which agrees to what Moses saith in the next verse, that they (as all the priestly garments, ver. 2.) were made for glory and beauty. But when they went about any holy work belonging to their office, they threw them over their left shoulder, that they might not be a hindrance to them. The use of this girdle was to gird their coat close to them, which they tucked up also in the girdle (when they went about their ministry) to the middle of their legs, that it might not encumber them in their service.

Of needle-work.] This was a different sort of word from taschbetz, (which we translate broidered, ver. 4.) and from choscheb, (which we translate cunning, ver. 6. 15.) and is here called rokem; which signifies the same with choscheb, as to the variety of colours and figures in the work: but choscheb, as the Hebrew doctors tell us, was done by weaving, and rokem with a needle, as we rightly take it. Of the two, choscheb was the most artificial, as the word seems to intimate; being wrought on both sides with the same figures, whereas rokem was only on one side. This they gather from xxvi. 31. where the veil is ordered to be made of the work called choscheb, which it is probable was glorious on both sides, both within and without the most holy place. Josephus saith, this girdle was wrought with flowers of the several colours mentioned xxxix. 29.

Ver. 40. And for Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats.] The coats of all the priests, as well as of the high-priest, were embroidered, as Maimonides expressly affirms. And it seems to be the sense of ver. 4. where he is commanded to make garments not only for Aaron, but for his sons (i. e. all the rest of the priests), among which the broidered coat may well be thought to belong to them. (See xxxix. 27.)

And thou shalt make for them girdles.] The girdles of the inferior priests were the very same with that of the high-priest (as well as their tunics or coats), being to bind their coats to their body.

And bonnets.] How these differed from the mitre of the high-priest, in their form not in their matter, see ver. 37.

For glory and for beauty.] The garments of all the priests were contrived to make them appear in a splendid and comely manner, when they ministered to the glorious majesty of God, being of fine linen, which was worn by the greatest persons, made with great art, especially their coats and girdles, which were finely adorned (as I have shewn in the verses foregoing) with elegant figures and rich colours: for blue, or sky-colour, purple and scarlet, belonged to kings and persons of honour. But the garments of the high-priest were above all the rest most glorious, and designed so to be, (ver. 2.) For besides those common to him with all the priests, which were very costly, he had others far more precious: particularly the ephod and its girdle, the breast-plate set with stones of great value, the robe, and the crown of gold. The two stones also on the shoulders of the ephod, were not only precious in their kind, but for their bigness; being so large, that twelve names were engraven in them, containing six-and-thirty letters. All which considered, Philo had reason to say (L. de Sacerd. Hon.) it is manifest the law dressed up their priest, Βασιλέως εἰς σεμνότητα καὶ τιμὴν, to the venerableness and honour of a king. For the priesthood in old time was so honourable, that kings themselves discharged it: which is the reason that in Scripture princes and priests have the same name of cohenim.

To all which I may add, that they took such care all their garments should be for glory and beauty, that when they were foul, they did not wash them, nor repair them when they had any breach in them: but new ones were bought, and the old employed about the lamps in the feast of tabernacles. (See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11. p. 142.)

Ver. 41. And thou shalt put them upon Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him.] As we read he did, Lev. viii. 6, 7, &c. 13.; and this was part of Aaron's consecration, ver. 3. of this chapter.

And shalt anoint them.] He anointed Aaron by pouring the holy oil upon his head; (Lev. viii. 12.) but he anointed his sons only by sprinkling some of it upon their garments (as he did upon his also) with the blood of the sacrifice, (xxix. 21. Lev. viii. 30.)

And consecrate them.] By the sacrifice of a ram, called the ram of consecration, the blood of which he put upon the tip of their right ear, &c. (xxix. 20. Lev. viii. 22, 23, &c.) and by the wave-offering which he put into their hands, that they might wave them before the Lord, xxix. 24. Lev. viii. 27. from whence the phrase for consecrate here in this place is in Hebrew fill their hand.

And sanctify them.] By the foregoing ceremonies. For they were set apart to the Divine service, by putting on their garments, anointing them, and offering the sacrifice of consecration, and by washing them with water, as appears from Lev. viii. 6, 7. 12. where it is said, he anointed Aaron to sanctify him; and ver. 30. having sprinkled their garments, it is said he sanctified Aaron, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him.

Ver. 42. And thou shalt make them linen breeches.] Though these are mentioned in the last place, yet they were put on the first of all the priest's garments; after them the coat, which being girt about with the girdle, the bonnet was put upon the priest's head. The high-priest, in like manner, having put on his breeches, coat, and girdle (which were common to all priests), was clothed with his robe, and next with the ephod and breast-plate, which were inseparable; and last of all with his mitre and the golden crown. To which order nature itself directed them; the inward garments being always put on before the outward.

Now as to these miknese, which we truly render breeches, the matter of them was linen, as we are here informed: and not ordinary linen, but that which the Hebrews call schesch, which was fine linen; and more than that, they were of twined (or six-threaded) linen, as we read xxxix. 28. They were made with great art, being woven of one piece, and not sewed together, as Maimonides tells us. The form of them was like our breeches or drawers, which may be the reason why Moses here uses a word of the dual number, because they had two parts, which covered each thigh distinctly.

To cover their nakedness.] This was opposed, as Maimonides thinks, to the idolatrous worship of Peor; which, if we may believe him, was so beastly, that it was performed by discovery of their nakedness, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45.)

From the loins even to the thighs they shall reach.] They were bound about the loins with strings, which run through the top of them, that they might be drawn straiter or looser, as they pleased; and came down the thighs as far as to their knees. There were some breeches anciently which covered the legs also, and came down to the feet, such as sailors use in cold countries: but these did not come down so low, the intention of them being only to cover those parts (as it goes before) which ought not to be exposed. For though they had a coat over their whole body, yet that being loose and wide below, by some accident or other, those parts might have been seen which ought to be secret, if that had not been prevented by these drawers, which so covered the lower parts, that nothing could possibly be seen. For in this they differed from our drawers, that they had no opening, either behind or before. Some think before this time there were no such thing as breeches in use among the Hebrews; nor after this, among any other men but the priests in their ministration. But in latter ages they came in use, as appears from Dan. iii. 21.

Ver. 43. And they shall be upon Aaron, and upon his sons, when they come in unto the tabernacle, or when they come near unto the altar to minister in the holy place.] They could not be permitted so much as to appear in the tabernacle, much less to minister, especially in the holy place, without their holy vestments. Which they wore there only, but in no other place: for at home, or abroad, or in the Sanhedrin, and all other places out of the temple, they wore common garments, such as other men did. Insomuch that St. Paul could not distinguish the high-priest, when he sat in the court, by his habit, from other judges, (Acts xxiii. 5.) And accordingly as we read, Ezek. xlii. 14. xliv. 17—19. an express precept for putting off the priests' garments, and laying them up in the chambers appointed for that purpose, when they went out of the court where they ministered. The high-priest, as Maimonides informs us, had a chamber, or vestry, peculiar to himself, where his garments were laid up, when he put them off, as the robes of kings are in their wardrobe. Of this one cannot reasonably doubt, that they, being not only precious, but sacred things, were kept safe in the temple, which was a holy place. And so were the garments of the inferior priests, as we may learn from Ezra and Nehemiah: who, among other things put into the treasury, mention a certain number of priests' garments, (Ezra ii. 69. Nehem. vii. 70.) In their vestries also there were peculiar chests, where every sort of vestment was kept by itself. All the breeches, for instance, which had this inscription, Miknese, i. e. breeches. In like manner, all the coats and the bonnets had two distinct chests, with this inscription, Ketonoth and Migbaoth: and so had the rest, as we are told in the Misna Tamid, cap. 5.

But while they were in the temple, they might keep on their holy garments (only not sleep in them there) even at those hours when they did not minister. Which this text seems to suppose, when it saith, they shall be upon them, when they come into the tabernacle, as well as when they come near unto the altar to minister. Thus the Talmudists: in the temple they might keep on their garments, whether in the time of their ministration, or out of it. But this they understand only of their breeches, their coat, and bonnet: for their girdle they were bound to lay aside as soon as they had done ministering.

That they bear not iniquity and die.] That God do not punish them with death, for being so profane as to appear before him without their holy garments, which he appointed to preserve his service from contempt.

It shall be a statute for ever unto him, and his seed after him.] That is, as long as there shall be any priest of the order of Aaron, they shall appear before God in these garments. But that priesthood being abolished by the true eternal priesthood of Christ, there is no longer any use of them; no more than of the sacrifices those priests offered, which are completed in the sacrifice of Christ. As for the Jewish sense of these words, it is manifest that it hath been long confuted; there having been no priesthood, nor holy garments, nor sacrifices, no, nor temple among them, for above sixteen hundred years. Nay, before the coming of our Saviour, some of the priestly ornaments, and those the chief of all, were gone, viz. the urim and the thummim in the breast-plate; which they generally confess were not in the second temple: and it may be a question, whether they continued to the end of the first. But the truth is, there was the breast-plate and the ephod, and consequently the urim and thummim, as to its matter and form (though it had lost its use, there being no answers from God given by it), and accordingly all the rest of the priestly garments remained as long as there was any priesthood; which is the full sense of these words, a statute for ever to him, and his seed after him.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. AND this is the thing that thou shalt do unto them to hallow them.] Having ordered Aaron and his sons to be set apart to attend upon him in his house as his ministers; he now directs how they should be hallowed (or made holy), that is, separated to his service in the priest's office.

To minister unto me in the priest's office.] This was the design of their separation from other men, as was often said before, (xxviii. 1. 3, 4. 41. 43.)

Take one young bullock and two rams without blemish.] There were several things to be done before this, though this was the chief. For they were to be washed, and robed with their priestly garments, and anointed; and then they were completed by peculiar sacrifices, which are directed and described, ver. 10, 11, &c. and put in execution, Lev. viii. 1, 2, &c.

Ver. 2. And unleavened bread, &c.] Together with the foregoing sacrifices (which it will appear hereafter were of several sorts), there was a mincha to be offered; bread being necessary at a table together with flesh. And this consisted of three parts; unleavened bread, unleavened cakes tempered with oil, and unleavened wafers (or thin cakes, like to our pancakes) anointed with oil, before they were put into the pan to be fried. All these were to be made of wheaten flour: and the two last were accounted a delicious bread among the Greeks, as Athenæus tells us, lib. iii. Deipnosoph.

Ver. 3. And thou shalt put them into one basket, &c.] All these, making but one meat-offering, were to be put into one basket, and so brought to the door of the tabernacle, to be presented there to God, together with the bullock and rams, (ver. 23.)

Ver. 4. And Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle.] To be presented unto God, together with their sacrifice.

And shalt wash them with water.] This was the first thing that was done for the hallowing them, (ver. 1.) as we read Lev. viii. 6. and was performed, some think, at the laver, which is directed to be made in the next chapter, (xxx. 18, 19.) where they were to repeat this washing every time they went in to minister unto God. But now, I take it to be more likely, at their first consecration, water was brought from thence to wash them at the door of the tabernacle, before they were permitted to enter into it. Whether their whole bodies were now washed, is not said; but we may probably gather that they were; for they were now looked on as wholly unclean (being unhallowed), and therefore were to be washed all over: though, being once cleansed, they needed not do more, when they went to minister, but only wash their hands and their feet; which agrees with our Saviour's words, John xiii. 10. Such washings, every body knows, were in use among the gentiles before they offered sacrifice.

Ver. 5. And thou shalt take the garments.] Their bodies being washed, they were, next of all, robed with those garments prescribed in the foregoing chapter.

And put upon Aaron the coat, and the robe of the ephod, and the ephod, &c.] The order wherein these garments were put on, according to the Talmudists, was this: first the breeches were put on by the priest himself, and that privately; which is the reason, perhaps, they are not here mentioned. They being tied about his loins, Moses put upon him the close coat, which came down to his ankles. Then this being bound to him by the girdle (which went round several times about him under the arm-holes), he put upon him his bonnet. This was the manner of habiting an ordinary priest. But when the high-priest was consecrated, after the girdle, beforenamed, was put on the robe, with the ephod and breast-plate, and then his mitre; to which was added the golden-plate, tied with a blue riband upon his forehead. (See Selden de Succession. ad Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 8.)

Ver. 6. And put the holy crown upon his head.] By this crown is meant nothing else but the golden-plate, on which was written holiness to the Lord; (xxviii. 36.) which is expressly called by the name of a crown, xxxix. 30. Lev. viii. 9. being bound upon the forehead with a blue riband like a diadem. Josephus seems to call the mitre by the name of a crown, (lib. vi. Halos. cap. 15.) but then he immediately adds, περὶ ἣν χρυσοῦς ἄλλος ἦν στέφανος, &c. about which there was another golden crown, having holy letters written in it, &c. (Vide Selden, lib. ii. de Succession. cap. 7.)

Ver. 7. And thou shalt take the anointing oil.] The next thing that was done for the consecration of Aaron, was anointing him with that oil which God ordered to be made, xxx. 31, 32, &c.

And pour it upon his head, and anoint him.] The Jews seem to think these two distinct things, pouring oil on his head, and then anointing him. The manner of which they say was thus: the oil being poured upon his head, which ran down to his face, he that anointed him drew with his finger the figure of the Greek letter chi (or St. Andrew's cross) upon his forehead between his eyebrows. This was done, Aben Ezra thinks, before his mitre was put upon his head. But that is contrary to the order here set down, which prescribes the putting on all his priestly garments (of which this was one) before the anointing. And he was therefore to be anointed in all his habiliments, because he was anointed to minister unto God; which he could not do without all the holy garments, (xxviii. 43.) particularly this, it being unlawful to appear before God with the head uncovered; as it was also among the gentiles. Other of the Jewish doctors therefore think, that when his head was wrapped about with the mitre, a place was left bare upon his crown for the pouring the oil upon it. Certain it is, that it was so poured on his head, as to run down upon his beard, (Psal. cxxxiii. 2.) And the Jews say, the form of the letter chi was drawn upon his forehead to distinguish his anointing from that of their kings; who were anointed in the form of a circle, or crown. (See Selden de Succession. lib. ii. cap. 9.) Where he observes also, that there being no holy oil all the time of the second temple after the captivity, they made high-priests only by putting on their holy garments. Which that they might have complete, they made an imitation of urim and thummim (though they had not the oracle itself), that none of the eight garments might be wanting. So Maimonides.

The only remaining difficulty is, whether all Aaron's sons were anointed as well as himself. And Mr. Selden, in the place beforenamed, thinks they were at the first, but not in future times: though all Aaron's successors in the high priesthood were consecrated by anointing, as long as the holy oil lasted; that is, to the captivity of Babylon, or, as some say, fifty years before, when it was hid, and no more found. And there is a place in the next chapter which seems to favour this opinion, (xxx. 30.) But as we read of no command for their anointing, as there is here for Aaron's; so, when this command came to be executed, it is said expressly, that Moses poured oil on Aaron's head; but that upon his sons he only put the holy garments, (Lev. viii. 12, 13.) And therefore he is peculiarly called, "the high-priest from among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured," (Lev. xxi. 10.) The anointing therefore of his sons, (xxx. 30.) is only meant of that unction which is here mentioned, ver. 21. of this chapter, where a mixture is ordered to be made of the blood of the sacrifice and of their anointing oil, which was ordered to be sprinkled both upon Aaron and his sons, and upon their garments, and was a part of their consecration. For it was done accordingly at that time, as we read Lev. viii. 30. So that Aaron himself had a double unction; one proper to him alone, as high-priest, upon whose head the holy oil was poured; another common to him with his sons, as he was a priest, whose garments were sprinkled with the oil and blood mingled together.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt bring his sons, and put coats upon them.] The high-priest was first habited, and then his sons, in the order I have described, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 9. And thou shalt gird them with girdles, &c.] See ver. 5.

And the priest's office shall be theirs, &c.] That is, as long as the holy garments were upon them, the priesthood was upon them: but if they were not upon them, neither was the priesthood upon them. They are the words of Maimonides in Celi Hammickdash, cap. 10. Or the meaning may be, they shall enjoy in perpetual succession the office of priests, as their father and his successors the office of high-priests.

And thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons.] Thus doing, they shall be completely consecrated. For in the Hebrew the phrase is, shalt fill the hand of Aaron, &c. which was done after the manner prescribed, ver. 22—24, &c. Which shews that this was the principal part of their consecration: or, at least, the consummation of it. And there was, besides this, a peculiar offering, which both Aaron and his sons are commanded to offer, in the day of their anointing, (Lev. vi. 20, 21.)

Ver. 10. And thou shalt cause a bullock.] The young bullock he commanded him to take, (ver. 1.)

To be brought before the tabernacle of the congregation.] In order to its being offered to God: for in this and in the following verses, the sacrifices are prescribed which were to be made at the consecration of Aaron and his sons; which were there: the first is this here mentioned, which was an offering for sin, as appears from ver. 14. For till their sins were expiated, they were not fit to offer any thing to God; much less to offer for the sins of others. The next was a holocaust, or whole burnt-offering, as a gift or present, whereby they were recommended to God. And the third was a peace-offering; on which they made a feast, and by that were in itiated into God's family.

And Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the heads of the bullock.] This was the form in all sacrifices, both burnt-offerings (Lev. i. 4.) and peace-offerings, (Lev. iii. 2. 8.) by which they devoted the sacrifice to be the Lord's. But in sin-offerings, there being a solemn confession of sins made, (Lev. xvi. 21.) he that laid his hands on the beast, seemed thereby to have transferred the guilt from himself unto the sacrifice, desiring it might be accepted for him.

Ver. 11. And thou shalt kill the bullock before the Lord.] Though Moses was never consecrated after the manner of Aaron, yet he was made a priest, for this peculiar purpose, by an extraordinary commission from God.

By the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where the altar of burnt-offering was placed, at the erection of the tabernacle, (xl. 6. 29.)

Ver. 12. And thou shalt take of the blood of the bullock, and put it upon the horns of the altar with thy finger.] Some have fancied that he means upon the horns of the altar of incense; because, when a priest offered a sin-offering for himself he was so to do, (Lev. iv. 7.) But it is to be considered, that Aaron and his sons, for whom this sacrifice was offered, were not yet priests, but common men, who, by this sacrifice, were to be made priests: whose blood therefore was to be put upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, as is expressly required in other sin-offerings, (Lev. iv. 25. 30.)

And pour all the blood.] All the rest of the blood.

Beside the bottom of the altar.] This shews he speaks of the altar of burnt-offerings; at the bottom of which there was a trench, into which they poured the blood of the sacrifice, as I shall shew hereafter.

Ver. 13. And thou shalt take all the fat that covereth the inwards.] He means that part of the beast which is called the omentum, in which all the bowels are wrapped; which in Lev. ix. 19. is simply called that which covereth. This hath a great deal of fat upon it, to keep the bowels warm, and was much used in ancient sacrifices, both among the Greeks and Romans, who herein followed the Jews. Nay, the Persians also offered to the gods nothing but the omentum, or a part of it, as Bochartus observes out of Strabo. (See Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45.) And from the condition and situation of the omentum, the heathen diviners made their conjectures; insomuch, that some think it had the name of omentum, because they made their good or bad omens from thence.

And the caul that is above the liver.] Our interpreters take this for the diaphragm, or the midriff, upon which the liver hangs. But Bochartus hath demonstrated, I think, that it signifies the greatest lobe of the liver, upon which the bladder of gall lies, (lib. ii. Hierozoic. par. i. cap. 45.) The only argument against it is, that this jothereth (as the Hebrews call it) is said here to be above the liver, and therefore must signify the diaphragm, upon which the liver depends. But the particle al signifies upon, as well as above: and is to be here so translated, upon or by the liver. And the reason why this lobe of the liver was peculiar to the altar, was because of the fat that is upon it.

And the two kidneys, &c.] For the same reason the kidneys were appropriated to God: which had one of their names from the fat that is upon them, which Homer (as the same Bochartus there observes) calls ἐπινεφρίδιον.

Ver. 14. And the flesh of the bullock and his skin, &c.] The burnt-offering being flayed, the skin of it was given to the priest, (Lev. vii. 8.) But in sin-offerings the skin was burnt (and the flesh also in some cases), and that also without the camp, not at the altar, (Lev. iv. 11, 12. viii. 17.) The heathen sometimes burnt the skin even of their holocausts, as Bochart shews, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 34.

Shalt thou burn with fire, &c.] The Hebrew word here for burn is quite different from that in the foregoing verse, which is used concerning the burning of incense, which soon vanished into smoke, as the fat there mentioned did. But the flesh, and the skin, and the dung, were burnt with a stronger fire, and were longer before they were consumed; and therefore burnt without the camp, where the ashes were poured out, as a thing abominable.

It is a sin-offering.] The priest might eat of any sin-offering, whose blood was not brought into the sanctuary; or rather it was his duty so to do, (Lev. x. 17.) because it argued that the people's sin was borne and taken away by the priest. It may seem strange then that Moses (who was in the place of a priest) is ordered to burn all this sin-offering, and not permitted to eat of it; though Aaron and his sons could not, because they were not yet priests. The best reason I have found of it is, that it was to signify the imperfection of the legal dispensation; since the sins of the priests themselves could not be taken away by the priests of the law, or their sacrifices; but were to expect a better sacrifice, or a better high-priest, as Dr. Jackson's words are in his Consecration of the Son of God, cap. 26. n. 2.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt also take one ram.] One of the rams mentioned above, (ver. 1.)

Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram.] See concerning this, ver. 10.

Ver. 16. And thou shalt slay the ram.] Where the bullock was killed, by the door of the tabernacle, (ver. 11.)

And thou shalt take his blood, and sprinkle it round about upon the altar.] It was a different sacrifice from the other, and therefore had different ceremonies belonging to it; some of the blood of the bullock being only put on the horns of the altar, (ver. 12.) How the blood was sprinkled round about upon the altar, will be explained Lev. i. 11.

Ver. 17. And thou shalt cut the ram in pieces.] That the parts might the more easily be burnt upon the altar.

And wash the inwards of him, &c.] Upon which there was a great deal of fat; which being put upon the pieces, and the head, made them consume the sooner, by nourishing the flame. Thus Homer represents the sacrifice of the Greeks (as Bochart observes), when they offered to Jupiter; they cut the thighs in pieces, and then covered them over with fat.

Μηρούς τ' ἐξέταμον, κατά τε κνίσῃ ἐκάλυψαν.

(Iliad. 2. ver. 423. Vid. Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 472.)

Ver. 18. And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt-offering unto the Lord, &c.] By this it appears, that as the former was a sin-offering, so this was a holocaust, or burnt-offering; which would not be received till their sins were expiated by the foregoing sacrifice. Nothing of which was offered at the altar, but some of the fat only, because (as R. Levi ben Gersom observes) the offerers were not yet worthy that God should accept any offering from them.

Ver. 19. And thou shalt take the other ram.] Mentioned ver. 1.

And Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram.] See ver. 10. This, it will appear afterward, (ver. 28. 32.) was a peace-offering: upon which, being now reconciled to God and received into his favour, they feasted with him at his table.

Ver. 20. Then shalt thou kill the ram.] Where the bullock was killed, which was first offered ver. 11.

And take of his blood.] Which was received in a bason.

And put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron and his sons, &c.] This being peculiarly called the ram of consecration, ver. 22. 31. the blood of it was not put upon the horns of the altar, (as in the first sacrifice, ver. 12.) nor merely sprinkled round about the altar, (as in the second, ver. 16.) but put upon Aaron and his sons. And first upon the tip of their ears, to signify that they should hearken to the Divine prescriptions; and then upon their thumbs and great toes (in which lie the strength of the hands and feet), to denote their ready and strenuous performance of every thing required of them. And being put upon the tip of their right ear, and the thumb of their right hand, and the great toe of their right foot, it may well be thought to signify the most exact and perfect obedience: the right hand being every where represented as the most excellent and strongest to do any execution. To this purpose Abarbinel discourses on this place, whose words are these: "All this tended to make the priest understand, that he ought to apply himself diligently to the study of the law; and to employ his hands with the same diligence in his sacred ministry; and to walk in the way of God's precepts," &c. Some of the Jews consider these things so scrupulously, as to say the priests might not use their left hand in their ministry, no more than minister with unwashen hands.

And sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.] i. e. The remainder of the blood. It is no improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, that from hence the heathens learnt their taurobolia and criobolia: which in process of time they disguised with infernal rites and ceremonies. For a deep hole being made in the ground, the priest to be consecrated was put into it; and then planks being laid over it, with a great many holes in them, the bullock or the ram was slain over them, and their blood running down into the hole, the priest received it on his eyes, his ears, his nose, his mouth; nay, he besmeared his body with it. And this was accounted the highest consecration of a priest; the virtue of which lasted twenty years before it was renewed: and he that was thus consecrated, was had in the greatest honour and veneration. Thus filthily did the devil pervert the most simple and cleanest rites which Moses prescribed, of putting a little blood, with a fragrant oil, on the tip of one of their ears, thumbs, and toes. (Myrothec. ii. Sacr. Elæochrysm. cap. 77.)

Ver. 21. And thou shalt take of the blood that is upon the altar.] Some of that which was sprinkled (as the foregoing verse directs) round about the altar. Or, perhaps some of the blood was left in the bason, upon the altar, for that use.

And of the anointing oil.] Which is afterward ordered to be made, (xxx. 23, &c.)

And sprinkle it upon Aaron and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the garments of his sons with him.] By which sprinkling, both they and their garments were separated to a holy use, as it follows in the next words, and he shall be hallowed and his garments, &c. (see upon ver. 7.) This may be looked upon as a lively representation of our purification by the blood of Jesus Christ, and by his Holy Spirit.

Ver. 22. And thou shalt take of the ram the fat.] All the fat in general was to be the Lord's, (Lev. iii. 3.)

The rump.] Here he seems to reckon up the particulars. And the rump of a sheep was the principal in those eastern countries, where their tails are of a prodigious bigness, and exceeding fat, as Bochartus observes, par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 45. and Job Ludolphus in his Histor. Ethiop. lib. i. cap. 10. n. 16. and in his Comment. in Histor. lib. i. cap. 10. n. 76.

And that covereth the inwards, &c.] See ver. 13. where these and the following words are explained.

And the right shoulder.] In peace-offerings this belonged to the priest, (Lev. vii. 32.) and so it is here ordained, (ver. 27, 28.) But now it was to be burnt upon the altar, (ver. 25.) because they were not yet priests, as the following words tell us, which give the reason why this shoulder was burnt.

For it is a ram of consecration.] Whereby they were consecrated, and made priests, but not yet completed, and therefore could not eat of that shoulder.

Ver. 23. And one loaf of bread, and one cake of oiled bread, &c.] Of that bread and those cakes mentioned ver. 2. of this chapter.

That is before the Lord.] Which had been presented unto God, (ver. 3.) for this by the law was to accompany their other sacrifices, (Numb. xv. 4.)

Ver. 24. And thou shalt put all.] Both bread, and cakes, and fat, and right shoulder, beforementioned.

In the hands of Aaron, and in the hands of his sons.]

Thence this sacrifice was called milluim, that is, filling of the hands; which we translate consecration. And their hands were thus filled, to shew that Aaron and his sons did not usurp this dignity, or take it upon themselves (as we speak), but were called unto it by God, who ordered these things to be put into their hands, that they might present them to him. R. Solomon will have this ram called the ram of fillings or impletions; because by this sacrifice they were completed, and absolutely made priests; nothing remaining to be done after this.

And shall wave them.] When such holy things were put into the hands of the offerers by the priest, then the priest put his hands under theirs, and they were lifted up, and then waved about on all sides.

For a wave-offering.] The Hebrew word tenuphah signifies agitation, or shaking to and fro; which, Abarbinel saith, was performed upward and downright, and then round about to all quarters of the world, to signify that the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; or rather, that he is the the possessor of heaven and of earth. Others of them speak to the same purpose.

Before the Lord.] Standing with their faces towards the sanctuary.

Ver. 25. And thou shalt receive them from their hands, &c.] After they had waved them, they delivered them into the hands of Moses; who, as the priest at this time, laid them upon the altar, and burnt them.

For a burnt-offering.] It is certain this was not a whole burnt-offering, but a peace-offering, as appears from ver. 28, 31, 32. yet some of it being burnt on the altar, that part is called a burnt-offering.

It is an offering made by fire.] So the burnt-offerings are called, Lev. i. 9. 13, &c. but this was so only in part, as I said, not in the whole; and may be interpreted by Lev. iii. 5. where all that was to be burnt of the peace-offerings, is commanded to be burnt upon the burnt-sacrifice, and in that regard might be called a burnt-offering. (See ver. 27.)

Ver. 26. And thou shalt take the breast of the ram of Aaron's consecration.] Of the consecration of him and of his sons.

And wave it for a wave-offering before the Lord; and it shall be thy part.] Being a peace-offering, the priest who offered the sacrifice was to have his share of it: and therefore the breast is here given to Moses, after he had acknowledged it to be God's by waving it about, and that he had it only as his minister.

Ver. 27. And thou shalt sanctify the breast of the wave-offering, and the shoulder of the heave-offering.] Upon this occasion, he makes a general law, to be always observed hereafter; that though, in this peculiar case, the right shoulder of this sacrifice was burnt (being for Aaron's consecration) and called a burnt-offering, (ver. 25.) yet, in all future times, both the breast and this shoulder should belong unto the priest. Therefore the word sanctify here signifies, as much as declare them to be sanctified, or set apart for the priest's use: as they were again by an express law, (Lev. vii. 31—34.)

Which is waved, and which is heaved up.] There is no difference, that I can find, between terumah, which we translate heave-offering, and tenuphah, which we translate wave-offering; but the former was only lifted up and so waved, and the other was waved all manner of ways, up and down, east, west, north, and south; to signify that He to whom it was offered was Lord of the whole world, and all that therein is.

Ver. 28. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons' by a statute for ever.] So it is called Lev. vii. 34. and it is again repeated for greater confirmation, Deut. xviii. 3.

For it is a heave-offering.] It is consecrated to God, to whom it belongs; and he bestows it upon his ministers.

And it shall be a heave-offering of the sacrifice of their peace-offerings, &c.] And it shall always in future times be presented unto God as his part of the peace-offerings; who constitutes the priests to eat it in his stead. As the former ram was a burnt-offering, so this, it is plain, was a peace-offering, in token that now they were in a state of perfect friendship with God. Which was procured by their sin-offering, (ver. 14.) which was offered first; whereby their present to God (ver. 18.) was made acceptable, as now their persons were declared by this sacrifice of peace-offering.

Ver. 29. And the holy garments of Aaron shall be his son's after him, to be anointed therein, &c.] Upon this occasion, also, God makes another general law, that all the successors of Aaron in the high priesthood, should be set apart to that office, in such garments, and by such an unction, and such sacrifices, as he was consecrated withal. And it appears by Numb. xx. 28. that Aaron's son was invested with the very same garments which Aaron wore: for those which peculiarly belonged to the high-priest, did not decay as the tunic and breeches did, and therefore went from one to another.

Ver. 30. And that son which is priest in his stead shall put them on seven days.] This was to be done seven days, one after another, that a sabbath might pass over him. For no man could be a complete high-priest, as the Jews imagine, till a sabbath had gone over his head. But the principal intention of this was, that he might be made a priest with great solemnity and deliberation; and put on his habit so often, that he might learn how to appear in them after a decent, or rather magnificent manner, before he undertook to minister. Yet the Jews say, that if he did offer sacrifice before the seven days' end, it was not accounted unlawful; provided he had been anointed, and had put them on once. So Maimonides, who adds, that he was to put them on by day, and not by night. (See Selden de Successionibus, lib. ii. cap. 8.) Where he shews (cap. 9.) this is to be understood of his unction also, which was to be by day, and not by night; and to be repeated seven times. And by the same reason, the sacrifices were also to be repeated; though if he ministered before they were offered, the doctors held it not to be illegitimate; as he shews in the end of that chapter.

When he cometh into the tabernacle of the congregation, to minister in the holy place.] At his entrance into the tabernacle he was to put them on for seven days together, before he could go to minister in the sanctuary.

Ver. 31. And thou shalt take the ram of the consecration.] That is, all the rest of the flesh which was not burnt on the altar nor given to Moses. Who having had their share, (ver. 22. 26.) the remainder, as the manner was in peace-offerings, belonged to those that brought the sacrifice.

And seethe his flesh in the holy place.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as we read expressly, Lev.

viii. 31. and as it is explained in the next verse, that there they should eat it. Fire was taken from the altar to boil it.

Ver. 32. And Aaron and his sons shall eat the flesh of the ram.] That is, feast with God in his own house, as persons now completely qualified to minister unto him.

And the bread that is in the basket.] All the remaining bread and cakes, which were presented unto God, after that which was burnt upon the altar, as his part, (ver. 23, 24, &c.)

By the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Hence it appears, that this sacrifice had something in it peculiar from other peace-offerings; which might be carried home and eaten there, after God and the priests had had their parts. But this was to be eaten in God's own house, where they were ministers, as a thing more holy: and therefore Aaron and his sons and daughters could not eat of it, as all the family did of other sacrifices of this kind.

Ver. 33. And they shall eat those things.] Aaron and his sons alone were to eat them; and nobody else with them.

Wherewith the atonement was made.] The atonement was not made by these things, but by the bullock, which was offered in the first place; which made them fit to have their hands filled with these things (as the Hebrew phrase is for consecrating, ver. 23, 24.) to complete their sanctification. And therefore the words should be thus translated, they shall eat those things for whom the atonement (or expiation) was made.

To consecrate, and to sanctify them.] Their consecration and sanctification began by the sacrifice for sin; and was completed by this now mentioned.

But a stranger shall not eat thereof.] None that are not of the family of Aaron, to whom alone this holy food belonged. Nor were all his domestics allowed to eat of it, though they might eat of other peace-offerings; but only Aaron and his sons: who being consecrated persons, were to eat these things, which had a special holiness in them, being part of the sacrifice of consecration; and therefore appertained only to such persons as had been consecrated.

Because they are holy.] Had a special holiness, as I said, in them; which made it fit only for such persons to eat them.

Ver. 34. And if aught of the flesh of the consecrations, or of the bread, remain unto the morning.] He and his sons being not able to eat it all.

Then thou shalt burn the remainder with fire.] This is a further argument, that there was a peculiar holiness in this sacrifice, of which only Aaron and his sons might eat: for if this had been like to the flesh of other peace-offerings, it might, according to the following law, have been kept two days before it was eaten, (Lev. vii. 15, 16, &c.)

It shall not be eaten.] Upon the second day.

Because it is holy.] Is of more than ordinary sanctity; being offered to make men holy to God: and therefore the greatest care was taken, it should not be in danger to be in the least corrupted.

Ver. 35. And thus shalt thou do unto Aaron, and unto his sons, according to all things which I have commanded thee.] This is the sum of what I have to command thee, concerning the consecration of Aaron, and of his sons.

Seven days shalt thou consecrate them.] They shall not be made complete priests, in less time than I have appointed. Which no doubt was to make them sensible of the weight of their office.

Ver. 36. And thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin-offering for atonement.] Lest he should think that only the ram of consecration should be offered seven days together, he here expressly directs the bullock for a sin-offering should be so often repeated. The reason of it follows, because it was for atonement. Which appears by the next words to signify, that it was not only for the atonement of the priest, but of the altar itself, which was, by this sacrifice, made fit for God's service. And that is the reason, perhaps, why he saith, in the plural number, it was for atonements. So the Hebrew text.

And thou shalt cleanse the altar when thou hast made an atonement for it.] The altar was not capable of any guilt; therefore this word atonement is here used improperly, to signify that, by these repeated sacrifices, it was set apart to be a place where expiation should be made. Or simply, this expiation of the altar was no more, but, of a common, making it a sacred place: or, as Fortunatus Scacchus understands it, it was purified by these rites from that defilement it must be supposed to have contracted, by the hands of the workmen that made it: for all vessels, in the sense of the law, were looked upon as made unclean, by the touch of any unclean person. And therefore perhaps the altar was also washed with water, as the priests were; which is here called its cleansing.

And thou shalt anoint it, to sanctify it.] To perfect its sanctification or separation from common use, it was anointed with the holy oil (mentioned in the next chapter), as Aaron and his sons were. For as by the blood of the bullock it was expiated, so by this anointing it was consecrated: which is meant by sanctifying it.

Ver. 37. Seven days thou shalt make an atonement for the altar, and sanctify it.] Many think that these were not distinct seven days from those in which the priests were expiated and consecrated; as the bullock for the cleansing of the altar, was not a distinct bullock from that for the priests: but the same sacrifice served for both. This opinion I shall consider in the conclusion of this book, (xl. 17, 18.) and now only observe, that thus not only the priests among the heathen, but their altars also, were dedicated, by their taurobolia and criobolia, (which I mentioned ver. 20.) for we find an ancient inscription, wherein one is said to have set up petram tauroboliatam, an altar consecrated, by besmearing it with the blood of those sacrifices, as Fortunatus Scacchus interprets it, (Ib. cap. 69.)

Make an atonement for the altar.] By the blood of the bullock.

And sanctify it.] By anointing it with the holy oil.

And it shall be an altar most holy.] The reason why it is so called, is given in the following words; because it was not only thus separated to a holy use, but made those things to be holy which were offered upon it. Which they could not be till it was thus expiated and sanctified. Therefore Fort. Scacchus expounds these words [an altar most holy] it shall be fully and completely consecrated, by observing all the rites which are here prescribed, for seven days together. Till the end of which no sacrifice whatsoever was offered on this altar (because it was not cleansed and sanctified to make them holy and acceptable), but on the eighth day, when all was performed that was required on the preceding seven days, fire came down from heaven, and consumed the burnt-offering, (Lev. viii. 1. 24.)

Whatsoever toucheth the altar shall be holy.] Nothing was acceptable unto God, unless it was offered upon this altar; which sanctified every thing that was laid upon it, according to God's direction. Thus our Saviour seems to explain these words, (Matth. xxiii. 19.) The altar sanctifieth the gift. That was the name for all things presented unto God, which were called korban; being destined to be offered at his altar.

Ver. 38. Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon the altar.] The principal use of the altar was, that there might be a constant sacrifice offered upon it, in acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over them. Which could not be done till it was expiated and consecrated: but that being finished, Moses directs here what should be the first sacrifice offered upon it.

Two lambs.] These were to be a burnt-offering; which was the most ancient of all other sacrifices, being the same that Abel offered.

Of the first year.] See xii. 5.

Day by day continually.] There were other occasional sacrifices of various sorts; but these were stated, and so constant, that they were never intermitted. No, not upon festivals, when other sacrifices were added: as upon the sabbath this sacrifice was doubled, (Numb. xxviii. 9, 10.) and upon new moons, and other feasts, several other sacrifices were appointed, as may be seen there, (ver. 11.) and in the rest of that chapter. It appears by Lev. ix. 17. that this daily sacrifice was offered (at least for some time) in the wilderness; but after they began to wander to and fro, for eight-and-thirty years, some think it was omitted. Which was the reason that God renewed this charge in Numb. xxviii. 3, 4. (See Junius and Menochius on that place.)

Ver. 39. The one lamb thou shalt offer in the morning, and the other thou shalt offer at even.] At what time in the morning and even, is not here plainly prescribed: but the word in the Hebrew for the latter being between the evenings, which was about three o'clock in the afternoon; the morning sacrifice also was offered between the rising of the sun and noon, viz. at nine o'clock in the forenoon.

Ver. 40. And with one lamb a tenth-deal of flour.] Most understand the tenth part of an ephah, which was an omer: (concerning which see xvi. 36.) And so Moses afterward expressly orders by God's command, (Numb. xxviii. 5.)

Mingled with the fourth part of a hin of oil, &c.] A hin was the sixth part of an ephah; containing one wine gallon, two pints, and fifteen inches (as Bishop Cumberland computes, in his learned treatise of Scripture Measures). So that the fourth part of it was a quart, and something more than a quarter of a pint.

The principal thing here to be observed is, that this was ordained (as I noted upon the twenty-fifth chapter) to represent God's dwelling among them in the sanctuary; where this daily sacrifice was the constant provision made for his table (as the altar is called), and bread and wine a necessary attendant (as they are at all tables) upon the meat that was set before him.

Ver. 41. And the other lamb thou shalt offer at even, and shalt do thereunto according to the meat-offering in the morning, and according to the drink-offering thereof.] The same rites were to be observed in this, that were in the morning sacrifice, without any difference. For as Abarbinel observes, in his preface to the book of Leviticus, the true reason of these two sacrifices was, that all men, who live well, having two meals a day, so many sacrifices (which were his meat) were therefore appointed for the Divine Majesty.

For a sweet savour.] See Lev. i. 9.

An offering made by fire unto the Lord.] i. e. A burnt-offering, as the next verse explains it.

Ver. 42. This shall be a continual burnt-offering throughout their generations, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] For there the altar of burnt-offerings stood, as we read, xl. 6. 29. Lev. xvii. 6, &c.

Before the Lord.] Who dwelt in the most holy place, in the upper end of the tabernacle.

Where I will meet you.] Their coming to worship in that place, is called drawing nigh to God: accordingly he promises to vouchsafe his gracious presence to them. (See xxv. 22.)

To speak with thee.] More especially, he promises to meet Moses there upon occasion; and to declare his mind and will to him, in such cases wherein he should consult him.

Ver. 43. And there I will meet with the children of Israel.] That they might not think his meeting with them (beforementioned) was only by revealing his mind to Moses, and so to them (as the last words of the foregoing verse might seem to intimate), he explains his meaning to be, that there he would grant tokens of his special love and favour to them all, when they approached unto him.

And the tabernacle shall be sanctified with my glory.] The glorious presence of God, which filled this house, (xl. 35.) was that which sanctified it, or made it a holy place. But some refer this not to the tabernacle, but to Israel (which is just before mentioned, and the word tabernacle not in the text), and the truth is, they were made a holy people also, by this glorious presence of God among them, in the tabernacle.

Ver. 44. And I will sanctify, &c.] That is, manifest them to be sanctified; or still more completely sanctify them, by the appearance of the Divine Glory in the tabernacle, (Lev. ix. 24.)

The tabernacle of the congregation.] In the Hebrew, the name is ohel moed, which signifies exactly the tabernacle of meeting; so called, not from the people's meeting there (as we seem to take it when we translate it, tabernacle of the congregation), but from God's meeting there with them, which is mentioned just before; and in the next chapter, (xxx. 36.) is expressly called the tabernacle of meeting (as I think it should be translated), where I will meet with thee. Which shews that this was the reason of its name. (See also Numb. xvii. 4. and Mr. Mede, book ii. p. 436.)

Now all the people could not come to attend upon the daily sacrifice, which was offered for them, and so to meet with God here; and yet it was a maxim among them, that no man's sacrifice was accepted, unless he was present at it: therefore, there were certain select persons chosen to wait upon God, in the name of all the rest (and there were twenty-four classes of them, as of the priests in David's time), called by the Jews stationary men; who never missed, when their course came, to attend on the Divine Majesty at the tabernacle, as the representatives of all their brethren.

Concerning which see Pet. Cunæus, lib. ii. de Repub. Jud. cap. 10. and our learned Dr. Lightfoot, in his Temple Service, chap. 7. sect. 3.

I will sanctify both Aaron and his sons, to minister to me in the priest's office.] He declared them to be sanctified to be his priests, by the appearance of his glory at their first sacrifice after their solemn consecration; and by fire coming from heaven to consume their burnt-offering, (Lev. ix. 23, 24.)

Ver. 45. And I will dwell among the children of Israel.] The Chaldee renders it, I will place my divinity (i. e. the Schechinah) among them. In the Hebrew it is, in the midst of them: for the tabernacle was situated in the very middle of their camp, while they were in the wilderness, (Numb. ii. 17.)

And will be their God.] Bestow special blessings upon them; such as he did not vouchsafe to other people.

Ver. 46. And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell among them.] By his special favour towards them, it was evidently manifested to them, that he brought them out of the slavery of Egypt, to make them a select people unto himself; among whom he settled his habitation, and appeared, by a most glorious symbol of his presence, to be in the midst of them.

I am the Lord their God.] How could they doubt of it, when they remembered, in what a wonderful manner he had brought them out of Egypt; and what they had heard him declare from his own mouth at Mount Sinai? (xx. 2.)

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND thou shalt make an altar to burn incense upon.] This is commonly called the golden altar; upon which sweet incense was as constantly burnt every day, as the morning and evening sacrifice of a lamb (beforementioned, xxix. 38, 39.) was offered at the brazen altar.

Of shittim-wood shalt thou make it.] See xxv. 5.

Ver. 2. A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, (four-square shall it be.)] It was a square of not much more than half a yard; because it served only to offer incense upon twice a day, and had no other use.

And two cubits shall be the height thereof.] It was as high again as it was broad; that the priest might minister there without stooping.

The horns thereof shall be of the same.] At each corner there was a spire, rising out of the same piece with the corner-post. (See xxvii. 2.)

Ver. 3. And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, &c.] The top of it, and the frame on all sides, with the horns, were to be covered with plates of gold, as the table was, (xxv. 24.)

The top thereof.] The Vulgar Latin translating the Hebrew word gag, by craticula, hath led many into a conceit that there was a grate upon this altar, as there was upon the other. But as the word for that is quite different (viz. micbar), so there is not the least mention here made, of cleansing this altar from the ashes, or of any thing to receive them; and therefore Fortunatus Scacchus ingenuously acknowledges, there was no grate on this altar; but a golden pan, or dish, was set upon the top of it (as we translate it rightly), with coals therein, when incense was to be burnt; and taken away with the coals, when that was done.

And thou shalt make unto it a crown of gold round about.] A border of gold which went about the brim or edge of it. (See there, xxv. 24.) This seems to have been made of massy gold, not of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold.

Ver. 4. And two golden rings shalt thou make to it, under the crown of it.] The golden crown arose upward above the table, and these rings were fixed below it.

By the two corners thereof, upon the two sides thereof shalt thou make them.] On each side of the altar, near the corners of it, were these golden rings annexed; at each of the four corners, one.

And they shall be for places for the staves to bear it withal.] This shews the use of the rings.

Ver. 5. And thou shalt make the staves of shittim-wood, and overlay them with gold.] Just like the staves for the carriage of the ark and the table, (xxv. 13. 28.)

Ver. 6. And thou shalt put it before the veil.] In the midst of the house, between the candlestick and the table; though not just between, but something higher, towards the veil; where it was placed directly before the most holy place.

That is by the ark of the testimony.] See xxv. 22.

Before the mercy-seat.] Towards which the priest looked when he offered incense; recommending to God the people and their prayers, which they were making without, while he burnt incense within. There is no ground to think that this altar stood in the most holy place, as St. Austin and some others have conceived; for these words are a plain demonstration to the contrary. (See Cunæus, lib. ii. de Repub. Jud. cap. 5.)

That is over the testimony.] That is, the ark; which is here simply called the testimony, as it is ver. 36. because it was the principal thing in the ark, xl. 20. (See xxv. 22.)

Where I will meet with thee.] Though Aaron and his sons might go no farther than the holy place (except only once a year, when Aaron alone went into the most holy) to offer incense, before the mercy-seat; yet Moses had the privilege to consult the Divine Majesty, in the most holy place, where the Divine glory shined, as these words, and xxv. 22. Numb. vii. ult. seem to intimate. For since he was admitted into the mount (as P. Cunæus argues, in the place beforementioned) to speak with God face to face, for many days together; it is not unreasonable to think that he was admitted to speak with him, upon occasion, in the most holy place in the tabernacle.

Ver. 7. And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense.] He did it at first; but afterward his sons in their courses performed this service: as appears from Luke i. 8, 9. where Zacharias, who was not high-priest, offered the incense when it came to his turn, according to the custom of the priest's office.

Sweet incense.] For it was a compound of several spices, which were very fragrant, as appears by the latter end of this chapter.

Every morning when he dressed the lamps.] At the rising of the sun, the priests went in to look after the lamps which they had lighted in the evening before. The dressing of them, as the Hebrews describe it, consisted in cleansing the snuff-dishes, and snuffing those lamps they found burning, and supplying them with new oil; and in putting new cotton (as we now speak) and oil into those that were gone out, and lighting them at some of the lamps which still continued burning.

He shall burn incense upon it.] The manner of it is described by Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. 9. sect. 5.

Ver. 8. And when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even.] See concerning this xxvii. 20.

He shall burn incense upon it.] As he did in the morning.

A perpetual incense.] In the same sense that the morning and evening sacrifice is called a continual burnt-offering, (xxix. 38. 42.) this is called perpetual incense, because it was never intermitted twice a day. And one reason why it was thus continually burnt, was, because of the vast number of beasts that were slain, and cut to pieces, and washed and burnt every day at the sanctuary: which would have made it smell like a shambles (as Maimonides speaks), if this sweet odour had not perfumed it, and the garments of the priests who there ministered. Whence, saith he, that speech of our rabbins, this sweet odour might be smelt as far as Jericho. Whereby the reverence due to God's house was preserved; which would have been contemptible, if there had been an ill smell constantly in it, as he truly observes, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45.)

Throughout your generations.] In all future ages.

Ver. 9. Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon.] None but that, which by God's own order is directed to be made, in the latter end of this chapter.

Nor burnt-sacrifice, nor meat-offering, neither shall ye pour drink-offering thereon.] There was another altar appointed, without the holy place, for all these: which as they might not be offered any where else, so this altar was appropriated for an offering more grateful than all their burnt-sacrifices, or meat and drink-offerings. So Porphyry seems to have learnt from this place (for he was acquainted with these books): "It is most fit to worship the gods with incense, both because it is more grateful, and also more pure than a hecatomb: for blood doth not at all delight the gods." Accordingly we find in Numb. xvi. 46, 47. that the wrath of God was appeased, when it broke out in a plague upon the people, merely by offering incense, whereby he is said to make an atonement for them.

Ver. 10. And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of it once a year, with the blood of the sin-offering of atonement.] Only once a year, the blood of that great sin-offering, which was made for the general atonement of the people, was to be put upon the horns of this altar; though no sacrifice might be burnt upon it.

Once in the year.] Upon the great day of expiation, which was the tenth day of the seventh month: when the high-priest was first to go with the blood of the sin-offering into the most holy place, and sprinkle it before the mercy-seat; and then come out into the sanctuary, and there put the blood upon the horns of this altar, and sprinkle it upon it also with his finger seven times, as we read Lev. xvi. 18, 19.

Shall he make atonement upon it.] The atonement mentioned so often in this verse, seems to relate to the altar itself, (as it is explained Lev. xvi. 18.) which was hereby cleansed from the impurities, which it was supposed to have contracted by the sins of those who constantly officiated there.

It is most holy unto the Lord.] This may be meant of that solemn expiation, upon the day of atonement; which was the most holy rite in all their religion: for that sacrifice is called by the peculiar name of the sin-offering of atonement, or expiation, (Numb. xxix. 11.) Or, it may be expounded of this altar itself; which by this was declared to be separated to the most holy service, in which none should presume to officiate, but they who were thereunto consecrated. Which was the reason of the heavy punishment upon king Uzziah, for attempting that which belonged to the priests only, as we read 2 Chron. xxvi. 18—20.

Ver. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This is often repeated in this chapter (ver. 17. 22. 34.) and in the next; to shew that God did not deliver all his precepts to Moses in the mount without intermission; but gave him some time to rest, and then spake to him again.

Ver. 12. When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel, after their number.] This was done twice by God's own order, (Numb. i. and xxvi.) From whence it doth not follow that it could not be done lawfully, without a special command: for there might be reasonable causes, why the rulers of the people might think fit to order them to be numbered, especially in time of war.

The reason why this is here mentioned seems to be, because, besides the offerings made voluntarily (xxv. 2.) every man also paid half a shekel towards the building of the tabernacle, and providing all the furniture of it: for which directions had been given in the foregoing chapters. This appears from xxxviii. 25, 26.

They shall give every man a ransom for his soul.] This was a homage, whereby they acknowledged they were God's redeemed ones; and whereby they also preserved their lives, which were in danger if they did not pay it.

Unto the Lord.] To be employed about his house.

That there be no plague among them, &c.] Which God might have justly inflicted, if they had not made him this acknowledgment, for increasing and multiplying them according to his promise.

Ver. 13. This shall they give, half a shekel.] A shekel wanted not much of our half crown. (See Gen. xxiii. 15. and Bishop Cumberland's treatise of Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. iv.)

After the shekel of the sanctuary.] There the standard was kept, by which such money was to be examined; as Justinian commanded the weights and measures, whereby all others were to be regulated, to be kept in the great church of every city. For I see no reason to think, that there were two sorts of shekels among the Jews, one sacred, and the other common; but much reason against it: for a shekel of the sanctuary, which is the rule of the rest, (Lev. xxvii. 25.) was in value but twenty gerahs; which is the same with aguroth, (1 Sam. ii. 36.) and is by the LXX. translated ὀβολός.

A half shekel shall be the offering of the Lord.] This was a tax, which was continued in following times, for the reparation of the tabernacle, and afterward of the temple, (Matth. xvii. 24.) For Cicero, in his oration pro Flacco, speaks of gold, sent every year, in the name of the Jews, out of Italy and all the provinces to Jerusalem; which Mr. Selden thinks was this half shekel, paid for the maintaining the public sacrifices, and such-like uses, (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 8.) And he shews, (lib. iv. cap. 5.) out of the Misna, in the title Siklim, and other authorities, that on the first day of the month Adar, men were appointed to sit in every city of Judea to receive this payment. Which is the tribute mentioned by Titus in his oration to the Jews; wherein he puts them in mind how kind he had been to them, in permitting them to take tribute, and to gather gifts for God, δασμολογεῖν τὸ ὑμῖν ἐπὶ τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἀναθήματα συλλέγειν ἐπετρέψαμεν, (Josephus, lib. vi. Halos. cap. 34.)

Ver. 14. Every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord.] Every man was bound to offer, whether priest or Levite, Israelite or stranger; except women, servants, and such as were under age. Yet, if any one of these did make a voluntary offering, it was accepted: only from a gentile, who was an idolater, they would not accept it, as Maimonides tells us. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 4. p. 291.)

Ver. 15. The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel.] They were all equally concerned in this tax, being for the support of the daily, weekly, monthly, and annual sacrifices; and for the providing salt, and wood, and the shew-bread, &c. whereby all Israel came to have an interest in whatsoever was done at the house of God all the year long. The priestly garments also were provided out of this money, and other things belonging to the Divine service, and to the reparations of the house of God. See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 10. n. 2, 3, 4. where he shews, that if any thing remained in the end of the year, after all these charges were defrayed, it was spent in extraordinary burnt-offerings; which were called the second sacrifices of the altar.

When they give an offering unto the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls.] Whence this money is called in the next verse keseph hakippurim, the money of expiations. Which made every man, though never so poor, endeavour to raise it, though he sold his clothes to get it; and he that failed to pay this tribute, was separated from the congregation, and not comprehended in the expiation, (as R. Levi, of Barcelona, speaks, Præcept. cv.) that is, was not partaker of the benefit of the expiatory sacrifices.

Ver. 16. And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.] See the verse foregoing, and Nehem. x. 32, 33, where we read of ordinances made, to charge themselves with the third part of a shekel, for the forementioned uses; because the expenses were then so great, that half a shekel was not sufficient to maintain them.

That it may be a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord, to make an atonement for their souls.] A testimony of their gratitude to God; who graciously accepted this acknowledgment of him, and spared their lives, which by their sins they had forfeited: this being a propitiation for them, because it purchased propitiatory sacrifices to be offered on their behalf.

Ver. 17. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt also make a laver of brass.] There is nothing said, either here or xxxviii. 8, concerning the form or bigness of it. But we may probably think, that though Solomon made a sea of brass, much bigger than this vessel (which was to be carried about with them in their travels in the wilderness), yet he made it of the same form; and that was circular, as we read 2 Chron. iv. 2, 3, &c. And after their return from the captivity of Babylon the laver was restored (as L'Empereur observes out of Maimonides, in his Annotations on Codex Middoth, cap. 3. sect. 6.) but there is nothing to be found in the Talmudists concerning its dimensions.

And his foot also of brass.] The basis of it was so contrived, as to receive the water which ran out at the laver at certain spouts.

To wash withal.] At those spouts the priests washed their hands and their feet, before they entered upon their ministration. For if they had put their hands and feet into the laver, the water in it would have been defiled by the first man that washed therein. And the sea of brass made by Solomon was so high, that they could not put their feet into it.

And thou shalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar.] It stood, according to the Talmudists, between the porch of the temple and the altar; and consequently, in the tabernacle, at the entrance of it, but a little on the south side, and not just before the altar. That is, it was placed like our fonts, which stand at the lower end of our churches, towards the door. So that the priests coming into the court immediately went to the laver, and there washed, and then ascended to the altar.

And thou shalt put water therein.] The heathens were so superstitious, as to think there was a greater virtue in some waters than in others for their lustration: particularly the Greeks (as Fort. Scacchus observes) would admit of no other water, in some of their greatest solemnities, but that from the fountain Callirrhoe. But the Divine institution was more simple, requiring merely spring-water, for all manner of purifications: only this water here mentioned was put into a vessel sanctified by a solemn unction, (xl. 11.)

Ver. 19. For Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet therein.] Which, that it might be done more conveniently, the Talmudists tell us there were twelve spouts or cocks, in the form of a woman's breast (whence they call them paps or dugs), to let the water out of the laver: so that the twelve priests, who attended upon the daily sacrifice, might wash there altogether. See L'Empereur in the place abovenamed, where he treats at large of this, and of the conveyance of water into the laver: which in the tabernacle (at least while they were in the wilderness) was brought thither every day in other vessels, and put into it, according to the direction in the conclusion of the foregoing verse.

Every one knows that the gentiles took great care of washing their hands, before they sacrificed, as appears by many places in Homer (to name no other authors), who, in the first book of his Iliad, speaking of the great sacrifice that was preparing to be offered, for the appeasing of Apollo, saith, Χερνίψαντο δ' ἔπειτα, καὶ οὐλοχύτας ἀνέλοντο.

Upon which words Eustathius observes it as the ancient custom, before they sacrificed, to wash their hands, δεῖ γὰρ καθαροὺς τῶν θείων γίνεσθαι, for none but those who were clean and pure might meddle with sacred things. And again in the third book, Ἀταὰρ βασιλεῦσιν ὕδωρ ἐπὶ χεῖρας ἔχευαν.

They poured water upon the hands of the kings: ὡς μέλλουσι θύειν, saith Eustathius, as being about to sacrifice. But I do not find in any author, that they were concerned for more than washing their hands (from whence came the proverb of doing things illotis manibus, see Erasmus in his Adages), there being no mention of washing their feet: which was an extraordinary degree of purity, which God required in his priests, who ministered in his house barefoot: and so they did among the gentiles also, as appears by that saying of Pythagoras, mentioned by Jamblicus, ἀνυπόδητος ϑύε καὶ προσκύνει, sacrifice and worship without shoes; which St. Ambrose thinks was borrowed from Moses, lib. i. Epist. 6. (See Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 185.)

Ver. 20. When they go into the tabernacle of the congregation, they shall wash with water.] This washing was not to be repeated before every act of their ministration; but it sufficed for all the service of that day, if they washed once at their entrance upon it. Only on the great day of expiation, before five of the various duties then to be performed, the washing was to be renewed.

That they die not.] By the hand of Heaven, as the Jews speak; that is, of God, who punished such profanation, as ministering to him in their uncleanness, with death. And the service performed by such a person, was all without effect; whether he were the high-priest, or a common one, as R. Levi of Barcelona saith, (Præcept. cvi.)

Or when they come near to the altar to minister, to burn offering made by fire unto the Lord.] Whether they were to go in to minister at the altar of incense in the tabernacle (of which he speaks in the first words of this verse), or to offer sacrifices at the brazen altar in the outward court, they were to wash before they entered upon their service.

Ver. 22. So they shall wash their hands and their feet, that they die not.] There was no need of doing more, being washed once all over before they were consecrated, (xxix. 4.) but their hands and feet were to be washed, upon pain of death, every day, before they ministered.

And it shall be a statute for ever to them.] As long as the tabernacle or temple stood.

Ver. 23. Take thou also unto thee principal spices.] So we rightly translate the Hebrew word roschim, which literally signifies heads; but thence, the chief of any kind of thing: the head being the principal or chief member of the body.

As for the word besamin, which we translate spices, it seems to be a general name for all the following species, which are comprehended under it. (See ver. 34.)

Of pure myrrh.] The Hebrew word mor, according to Maimonides, signifies musk; and David Kimchi commends their exposition, who take it for a kind of frankincense: but the general opinion of the Hebrews, as well as of later writers, is, that it signifies myrrh, which seems to be derived from the ancient word mor. And that being the best which flows from the shrub of itself, Moses is required to make use of such myrrh. For the word deror (which we translate pure, or not adulterated) properly signifies freely flowing or dropping myrrh: which was far better than that which came out from the tree by incision. The fragrancy of this is taken notice of by a great number of authors; who also mention it as having a principal part in the composition of the most costly ointments, as Fort. Scacchus observes, (lib. i. Myroth. Sacr. Elæochrysm. cap. 51, 52. and lib. ii. cap. 8.)

Five hundred shekels.] That is, in weight; which was two hundred and fifty ounces: a shekel being as much as half an ounce of our weight.

Of sweet cinnamon half so much.] There were two sorts of cinnamon: one that doth not smell very much; another which was very aromatic, and rarely to be found (Galen saith, in his time) but in the closet of kings. And therefore God commands Moses here to take not mere cinnamon, but with the addition of bosem, which signifies sweet-scented.

Salmasius in his Plin. Exerc. treats of both these spices.

And of sweet calamus two hundred and fifty shekels.] This spice hath also the same addition of bosem to it, because there was a calamus that was not sweet-scented; and that which was they held very precious, being not of the growth of Judea, but coming from distant places. So we read (Jer. vi. 20.) of "sweet cane from a far country;" and Isaiah intimates in xliii. 24. that it was a foreign commodity of great value: and Salmasius is positive, that there was no aromatic calamus grew out of India, (Plin. Exercit. p. 1052.) But Bochartus very well observes that there was no traffic, in all likelihood, with India in the days of Moses: and therefore they had it then from Arabia: where Dionysius Periegetes, together with frankincense and myrrh, mentions (in one and the same verse) εὔοδμος κάλαμος, sweet-smelling calamus. (See Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6.)

Ver. 24. And of cassia five hundred shekels.] There is no mention of this spice (which the Hebrews call kidhah) but here and in Ezek. xxvii. 19. where it is joined with calamus, and reckoned among the precious things which were brought to the marts of Tyre. Therefore, it doth not signify that cassia which is now used among purging medicines, but another mentioned by Pliny, together with cinnamon, (lib. xii. cap. 19.) There being one sort of it called isocinamomum, because it was equal to cinnamon in virtue and in value: (see Salmasius in his Plinianæ Exercit. in Solin. p. 1302.) But this sort of cassia differing but little from cinnamon, Fort. Scacchus thinks, for that very reason, we are here to understand by kidhah that aromatic plant which the ancients call costus: the best of which was brought out of Arabia, and was of a white colour, as he proves out of Avicenna, Dioscorides, and Pliny. And it appears by Propertius it was used by the ancients to be burnt on their altars, as well as frankincense:

"Costum molle date, et blandi mihi thuris honores."

(Myrothec. Elæochrysm. par. ii. cap. 11, 12.)

After the shekel of the sanctuary.] See ver. 13.

And of oil-olive.] Which was clear, and free from all dregs. (See xxix. 40.)

A hin.] I observed there that it contained a wine-gallon and two pints, and something more.

Ver. 25. And thou shalt make it.] From hence, and from those words, (ver. 23.) "take thou unto thee sweet spices," &c. the Hebrew doctors conclude, that Moses made this holy oil with his own hands. Of which there is no certainty; much less that none ever adventured to make it after him: nay, it is evident that Bezaleel made it, as well as all other things beforementioned, (xxxvii. 29.)

An oil of holy ointment.] To anoint with it all the things mentioned in the next verse; whereby they were sanctified (that is, set apart) for the service of God. It was not thick, like those compositions which we now call ointments, but thin as oil is; being nothing but oil, with an infusion of these strong spices, which made it have a comfortable scent. For it is observed by Dioscorides, that oil was very proper, εἰς τὴν τῶν μύρων κατασκευὴν, for the preparation of ointments: odours being better preserved in oil than in any other liquor, as Pliny observes, (lib. xiii. cap. 2.) And this oil, no doubt, was the purest they could get (such as they brought for the light of the tabernacle, xxvii. 20.) which would best imbibe the tincture.

After the art of the apothecary.] Or ointment-maker; of whose art Theophrastus and Dioscorides give an account. But the manner of making this ointment, as Maimonides describes it, was thus: the spices were beaten severally (he should have excepted the myrrh, which was liquid), and then they were mixed together, and macerated in pure water, till all the virtue of them was extracted. Which being done, the hin of oil was poured upon them, and all was boiled upon the fire till the water was evaporated, and the oil alone remained: (see Guil. Schickkard in his Mischpat hamelek, cap. 1. p. 24.)

It shall be a holy anointing oil.] Wherewith none were to be anointed but sacred persons and things.

Ver. 26. And thou shalt anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, &c.] This and the following verses shew the use of the holy oil; which was to consecrate or set apart every thing hereafter mentioned, to the service of God, whereby the majesty of God's house (as the Jews speak) was set forth: for anointing belonging only to kings and princes, this ceremony begat in people's minds a greater fear and reverence towards God himself, as Maimonides's words are, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45.)

Ver. 27. And the table and all his vessels, &c.] Here being such a particular mention of every thing that was in the sanctuary, he only saith, when it was erected, (xl. 9.) "Thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein," &c.

Ver. 28. And the altar of burnt-offering, &c.] In this verse he mentions all that was without the sanctuary, in the court of the Lord's house; of the unction whereof he also gives a particular charge, (xl. 10, 11.) And accordingly when he gives an account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons, he also tells us how he executed these commands of anointing the tabernacle, and all that was in it; but more especially this altar, which he sprinkled seven times with the holy oil, (Lev. viii. 10, 11.) See there.

Ver. 29. And thou shalt sanctify them.] Separate all the forenamed things from common uses, to the service of God alone, by anointing them with this holy oil.

That they may be most holy.] They were made hereby most holy, because, as it here follows, they made other things to be holy.

Whatsoever toucheth them shall be holy.] As the gift was made holy by the altar, upon which it was laid. (See xxix. 37.)

Ver. 30. And thou shalt anoint Aaron and his sons, &c.] (See xxix. 7, 8.)

Ver. 31. This shall be a holy anointing oil unto me, throughout your generations.] The Jews understand this, as if it were meant of this individual oil now made by Moses; which lasted till the captivity, or till the time of Josiah. But this seems to be as fabulous as that Josiah hid it so, that it could never be found after his death. For there were so many things to be anointed with it at present, and in future times (all the high-priests being anointed, not with a drop or two, but with such a plentiful effusion of it, that it ran down to their beards, nay, the skirts of their garments, Psal. cxxxiii. and their kings also, when there was any doubt of their title), that this oil could not last so long, much less retain its scent for so many generations, without a miracle, of which there was no need. For though there was near half a hundred weight of the spices, yet there was but five or six quarts of oil; and therefore the ointment could not be more: the odours of these spices being only extracted by infusion, and the substance left behind. And such a quantity as this, one may well suppose, was near spent in the anointing of so many things and persons, as are here mentioned: and therefore it was upon occasion to be made again, as the perfume was, which follows here, ver. 34.

Yet it must be confessed that there hath been a very ancient opinion among the Jews, that in the second temple there was no holy oil: for which one can see no reason, but that they did not think it lawful to make this composition, and therefore consecrated their high-priests, only by putting on their robes. How they came to fancy it unlawful doth not appear; but the omission of this unction after their return from their captivity, seemed to foretell that there should be another and better kind of unction, which was by the Holy Ghost; the variety of whose gifts might perhaps be fore-shadowed by these several spices.

A holy anointing oil unto me.] There was no rite or ceremony ordained whereby this oil became holy; but it was consecrated by this Divine institution, which appropriated it unto God alone in these words, unto me. Which separated it to God's uses and service; and made it unlawful for any body to employ it to other purposes.

Ver. 32. Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured.] Here follow two prohibitions, to breed in the people the greater reverence to this holy ointment. The first is this, that it should not be poured on man's flesh, i. e. on common men, who were not priests, or were not appointed by God to be anointed with it. It is well known, that in the eastern countries (whom the Greeks and Romans also imitated) men were wont to anoint their heads and faces, and that with very precious ointments, especially at their feasts, and when they would make a splendid appearance: and therefore they are here forbidden to make use of this oil for such uses.

Neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it.] This is a second prohibition, not to make any ointment of these spices, for private and common use.

It is holy.] It is set apart for my use alone.

And shall be holy unto you.] And therefore you shall not employ it to any other.

Ver. 33. Whosoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, &c.] That is, if any man broke either of the foregoing prohibitions, by making the like composition, or putting any of this upon one who was not a priest, he was liable to be cut off from Israel. What that is, see Gen. xvii. 14. The reason of these prohibitions is manifest, as Maimonides excellently discourses, (More Nevochim. par. iii. cap. 45.) which was, that this sweet odour being smelt no where else, men might be more in love with it in the sanctuary: and that none, by being anointed with the like, might fancy themselves better than others, from whence great dissensions and mischiefs might have arose. The same may be said concerning the perfume, (ver. 37, 38.)

Kings, indeed, are said to have been anointed with this very oil; at least Solomon was, (1 Kings i. 39. though we may doubt of David, when he was anointed king of Judah, 2 Sam. ii. 4.) which was, I suppose, by a special direction of the prophets; that the people might look upon them as sacred persons, and special ministers of God, for their good. The Jews also will have it, that he whom they call the anointed of war, that is, say the Jews, the priest mentioned Deut. xx. 2. but I should rather think, the general who commanded their forces, in any sudden danger, was anointed also with this oil, that he might be inspired with courage, when he fought as a sacred person. So that they interpret the first words of the foregoing verse [upon man's flesh shall it not be poured] in this sense: None shall be anointed with it but the high-priest, the anointed of war, and the kings of the house of David. For the kings of Israel were not anointed with it, but with simple balsam, as they also tell us.

Ver. 34. And the Lord said unto Moses, Take unto thee sweet spices.] There are the same words here in the Hebrew, that we had before, (ver. 23.) save only that there he saith, Take to thee rosamin (with the addition of rosch, principal, or most excellent), and here, Take to thee samim, which we translate sweet spices. How these two differ, interpreters of all sorts extremely vary: but they both seem to be general words, which contain the following species under them; and samim to signify spices of less value than besamim. The latter of which denotes such spices as were either liquid or most proper to mix with oil, or other liquid things, to give them a fragrancy, as Fort. Scacchus thinks, who hath discussed these two words with great diligence, in his Elæochrysm. Myroth. par. ii. cap. 7.

Stacte.] The Hebrew word signifies something that drops, which some have taken for balsam; but the LXX. translate it as we do; and Salmasius hath shewn that it is the liquid part of myrrh (not which flows of itself) which drops from it when it is pressed out by art. (See Plin. Exercit. p. 520.) The same Fort. Scacchus, cap. 8. observes, out of Dioscorides, who calls it προσφάτου σμύρνης τὸ λιπαρὸν, &c. the most unctious part of fresh myrrh, pressed out with a little water, (cap. 74.) This was used in the perfumes which the heathen burnt upon the altars, as appears by that of Euripides in Troad. where he mentions, Σμύρνης αἰθερίας τὸν κάπνόν.

Onycha.] The Hebrew word secheleth is translated by Jonathan ceseth, which the famous Bochartus proves by many arguments to be ladanum, which was one of the principal aromatics among the Arabians. The stream of interpreters indeed carry it for onycha, but are not agreed what that is: for some take it for the hoof or claw of an animal (as Maimonides), others (as Jarchi) for the root of a plant, which is smooth and transparent as the nail of a man's hand, which the Greeks call onyx; but there are others, and more numerous, who take it for the shell of a fish, in the fens of India, that are full of spikenard, upon which this fish feeding, it makes the very shell odoriferous. (See Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. ult.) He observes also, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 1. that there was such a shell-fish in Babylonia, which was nearer to the Jews than the Indians. The Greeks called it onyx, from the form of it; and the Hebrews secheleth, from its colour, which was black.

And galbanum.] That which is sold in our shops is of an offensive smell; but there was another in Syria, in the mount Amanus, which had an excellent scent. And, therefore, to distinguish it from ordinary galbanum, there is a word added to it, as the Vulgar Latin takes it, in which it is called galbanum boni odoris. For that translation joins the next word (which we translate sweet spices) unto galbanum: as if he had said, aromatic galbanum.

With pure frankincense.] It was gathered twice in the year; in the spring and in the autumn: and Pliny tells us, that gathered in the autumn was the purest and whitest; with which the other (that was reddish) was not to be compared, (lib. xii. cap. 14.) Every one knows that this was very much used by the gentiles upon their altars.

Of each shall there be a like weight.] This is the common interpretation of the Hebrew words; and I will not trouble the reader with any other. But we have no certain knowledge what weight this was: for I see no authority for what the Hebrew doctors say, that there were seventy pounds of each of these four spices. And they add (which makes all they say of this matter questionable), that there were also several pounds of cinnamon, and cassia, and crocus: in short, of thirteen several spices, which Josephus (lib. vi. Haloseos, cap. 6.) affirms were in this composition. Of which Moses, they say, made in the whole three hundred and sixty-eight pounds; that is, one pound for every day in the year, and three for the day of expiation. And, accordingly, R. Levi Barzelonita saith, the priests made every year as much as would suffice for every day of it; and that the ordinary priests might make it, as well as the high-priest, (Præcept. ci.)

Ver. 35. And thou shalt make it a perfume.] Some think the last words of the foregoing verse signify, that each sort of spice was to be pounded, one by one: and then they are all ordered here to be put together.

A confection after the art of the apothecary.] Made with great care, and according to this Divine prescription. Thus Plutarch, speaking of the aromatic Μίγμα among the Egyptians, which was burnt morning and evening on their altars, saith it was not put together, ὅπως ἔτυχεν, on any fashion, or as it happened; ἀλλὰ γράμματα ἱερῶν τοῖς μυρεψοῖς, &c. but the sacred books were read to those who compounded it, when it was mixed, (lib. de Isid. et Osiride.)

Tempered together.] Both the Chaldee and the LXX. render this mingled; just as salt is with any thing upon which it is sprinkled.

Pure.] Without any other mixture.

And holy.] To be used only in the Divine service. For this was one of the most ancient ways of worshipping God; the word θυσία, i. e. sacrifice (as Porphyry saith, lib. ii.)

being derived ἀπὸ θυμιάσεως: the first men making a fume, by burning parts of trees, and shrubs, and seeds, and fruits. And the sweeter their scent was, the more grateful they fancied the fume was to their gods. So that though at first they contented themselves with simple herbs and plants, and Moses here prescribes only some few spices fetched from foreign countries, yet, in aftertimes, they increased them to a greater number: for that aromatic mixture I mentioned before among the Egyptians, called Κῦφι, was a composition of sixteen things, which Plutarch reckons up in the forenamed book. And Sophocles brings in Clytemnestra (in his Electr. ver. 637.) calling for θύματα πάγκαρπα, fumes of all sorts of seeds, to be offered to Apollo, that she might be delivered from her terrors.

Ver. 36. And thou shalt beat of it very small.] Reduce it to powder.

And put it before the testimony.] Burn it upon the altar of incense, which was placed before the ark, as we read ver. 6. This seems to be the meaning; and not that he should put it in a dish upon the table, ready to be burned: for the table did not stand before the ark of the testimony.

Where I will meet with thee.] See xxix. 42.

It shall be unto you most holy.] Employed only in the worship of God, before the most holy place.

Ver. 37. And as for the perfume which thou shalt make, &c.] Or rather, And the perfume which thou shalt make, you shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof. For any private use; which is imported in these words, to yourselves.

It shall be unto thee holy for the Lord.] Entirely separated to the Divine worship; and therefore not to be touched by any but the priests, and that when they ministered in the sanctuary, before the mercy-seat.

Ver. 38. Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto.] For his own pleasure: (see ver. 33.) R. Levi of Barcelona hath well explained this: no man was to make this composition with the same spices, and the same weight, and with an intention to burn it. So he interprets those words to smell thereto; that is, to make a perfume with it by burning it: (Præcept. cxi.) yet if any man (as Maimonides observes) did smell this perfume, but did not make it, he was not guilty of being cut off.

Shall even be cut off from his people.] See ver. 33. Their opinion is not improbable, who think by this is meant not only the excision of the transgressor, but of his whole race; none of which should remain to keep up his name in Israel. By which severe threatening, the people were deterred from profaning these holy things.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After all the foregoing directions from the twenty-fifth chapter unto this (in which, as I said before, xxx. 11. one may well think there was some intermission), the Lord proceeded to give Moses this following information, to encourage him to go about this work.

Ver. 2. See I have called.] Be not solicitous where thou shalt find workmen, who have skill enough to make all the things which I have commanded; for I have taken care of that; and pitched upon one who shall be the chief director of the whole business.

By name.] Made a particular choice of one man above all others, whom I have designed for this work. It appears by other places, that this phrase (to call him by name) gives Bezaleel the pre-eminence above all other artificers. See xxxiii. 12. 17. where he saith the same of Moses; and Isa. xlv. 3. where he saith it of Cyrus.

Bezaleel the son of Uri.] See 1 Chron. ii. 18—20. Though he was particularly chosen and fitted for this work, yet there was another joined with him to be his assistant, (ver. 6.) Which two did not do all the work with their own hands (as appears from xxviii. 3. where he speaks of many persons endowed with extraordinary skill), but they were the principal artists, and the chief directors and overseers of the work. And therefore, after the mention of Aholiab, (ver. 6.) he speaks also of others into whose hearts he had put wisdom, to do all that he commanded.

The son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah.] This Hur is thought by some to have been the husband of Miriam, the sister of Moses: (see xvii. 10.) And then the observation of Abarbinel is not impertinent, that God did the more particularly declare his choice of Bezaleel, and Moses the more punctually remember it, to take away all exceptions from the Israelites; who might have been apt to think that Moses had too much regard to his own kindred, if he had appointed him to be the chief governor of this work, without the special call of God unto it. For thus they might have cavilled (as some of them did afterward, in part)—he makes himself king, and Aaron his brother high-priest; and now delivers into the hands of his nephew all the oblations and collections that have been made for the tabernacle. For which there could be no colour, after God had solemnly declared it was done by his special order. He adds also (which is not so justifiable) that there was a strife among the Israelites who should undertake this work; for which, though Moses knew the fitness of Bezaleel, yet he durst not mention him, for fear they should think him partial; till God commanded him, saying, Do not regard what the people say, for thou, and they all, shall see that he is chosen by me, and not by thee, unto this work; for I will give him extraordinary wisdom, &c.

Ver. 3. And I have filled him with the spirit of God.] i. e. With an excellent spirit; or with Divine inspiration. Which was but necessary; because the Hebrews being long kept in slavery under the Egyptians, cannot be supposed to have been bred up to the learning of those ingenious arts mentioned in the next verses. For they were acquainted only with the making of bricks, during that heavy servitude; and therefore God instructed several men, particularly Bezaleel, in those arts which they had no master to teach them, and with their natural genius, though never so great, could not attain, especially on a sudden, without inspiration.

In wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge.] Here wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, do not signify as they do in other places, particularly in the Proverbs, and in Isaiah xi. 2. (where the Messiah is said to be "filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and the spirit of knowledge,") but skill in the arts of engraving, and setting jewels, and weaving, and needle-work, &c. How wisdom differs from understanding and from knowledge, is not much material; they may be many words used only to express their skill in all sorts of arts, that might make them accomplished workmen, as it follows in the latter end of the verse, to work in all manner of workmanship. They that would see how the Hebrews distinguish them, may look into Paulus Fagius upon the place, or Buxtorf's Historia Arcc, cap. 2. n. 3.

Ver. 4. To devise cunning works, &c.] There are two things required in an excellent artist: good invention, and ability to do what he hath contrived. The first of these seem to be intended in this verse; and the other in the next: together with a dexterity to teach other artificers, who were to be employed under Bezaleel and Aholiab.

Ver. 5. And in cutting of stone, &c.] There were no stones employed about the tabernacle; and therefore this must be meant of cutting and setting the precious stones mentioned chap. xxviii. and in graving on them what God commanded, ver. 11. 21.

And in carving of timber.] We do not read in the foregoing chapters of any carved work about the tabernacle; and therefore this word may better be rendered (as it is in the beginning of the verse) cutting, rather than carving timber. For it signifies, in general, doing all the work of carpenters and joiners.

To work in all manner of workmanship.] That was necessary for the making of every thing God had commanded.

Ver. 6. And I, behold, I have given with him.] Lest Moses should think one principal contriver and director not to be sufficient, God joins another with him.

Aholiab, of the tribe of Dan.] It is observed by R. Bechai, that God chose one out of the lowest tribe (for so they accounted that of Dan), as well as one out of the chief, which was Judah; that Bezaleel, saith he, might not be lifted up with vain conceit; for great and small are equal before God. And he truly observes, that one of the same tribe, of Dan, by the mother's side, was the most skilful person that could be found, for the building of the temple by Solomon, (2 Chron. ii. 14.)

And in the hearts of all that are wise-hearted, I have put wisdom.] That is, God endued the minds of all ingenious persons among them with an extraordinary skill; which they never learnt, either by their own study or any master, but had it by an inspiration from above. There were several, no doubt, who had a natural genius to such arts as were necessary in this work; but they could not, by their own industry, have attained such skill as God bestowed on them; at least not so soon, as to go immediately about the building of the tabernacle, and all things belonging to it.

That they may make all that I have commanded thee.] Not to imitate the Egyptian contrivances, as some have fancied (for which no such great skill, one would think, was necessary), but to make all exactly according to the model which Moses had seen in the mount, and he described to them; which could not have been done without God's extraordinary assistance.

Ver. 7. The tabernacle of the congregation, and the ark of the testimony, &c.] These things are here mentioned, according to the order of nature; which is first to build a house, and then to provide its furniture. And it is observable, that there was but one house, or tabernacle, one ark, and one altar, either for sacrifice or incense, to preserve in their minds the belief of the unity of God; contrary to the gentiles, who had their temples and altars every where, and each family its domestic gods, and particular superstitions.

Ver. 8. The pure candlestick.] It is hard to tell why this is particularly called pure, unless it be because it was entirely of pure gold, (xxv. 31.) which the table and altar of incense were not; for they were only overlaid with pure gold, (xxv. 24. xxx. 3.) Some have thought that it is called pure, because no blood was ever sprinkled upon it, as there was on the altar of incense; but this is not a good reason, for we do not find there was any sprinkled on the table.

Ver. 9. The altar of burnt-offering, &c.] Concerning this and the laver he had received orders, xxvii. 1. xxx. 17.

Ver. 10. And the clothes of service.] Wherewith the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the golden altar were covered (Numb. iv. 6, 7. 9. 11, &c.) when the camp removed.

The holy garments for Aaron, &c.] Which are ordered chap. xxviii.

Ver. 11. And the anointing oil and sweet incense, &c.] These were ordered in the foregoing chapter, ver. 23. 34.

Ver. 12. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After he had delivered him all the foregoing orders, about the tabernacle, its furniture, and the workmen to be employed in making them; he added what follows.

Ver. 13. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths shall ye keep.] This hath been mentioned thrice already (see xvi. 23. xx. 8. xxiii. 12.) but here seems to be repeated again, upon this special occasion, that they might not think this sacred work would warrant them to break the sabbath. On which he bids Moses tell them, they must not do this work no more than any other: for the tabernacle was built for the service of God, which was principally performed upon this day. And he uses a word of the plural number, not to signify any other sabbath but this; which recurring so often as once in seven days, he might well admonish them to keep his sabbaths. And so the apostle plainly speaks, Coloss. ii. 16.

For it is a sign between me and you.] This plainly shews he speaks of the weekly sabbath; the observation of which testified to all the world what God they worshipped: as all nations signified, by their rites and ceremonies, what their gods were to whom their services were paid. Now the Israelites stood in a double relation to God; as his creatures, and as those who were redeemed by him from the Egyptian bondage: in both which regards the sabbath was a sign or token between him and them. For by observing one day in seven, after six days' labour, they signified that they worshipped the Creator of the world; who in six days made all things, and then rested: and by observing such a seventh day, (see xvi. 5.) after six days' labour, rather than any other, they signified they owned him to be their deliverer from Egyptian slavery. This is opened excellently by our Mr. Mede, Discourse xv. p. 73, 74.

Throughout your generations.] During this polity which God now establishes among you.

That ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you.] To be my peculiar people, by observing this solemnity. For it was peculiarly enjoined to them, and to no other nation; and was looked upon as a singular benefit conferred on them above all people; as appears by the devout acknowledgment Nehemiah makes of this, among the rest of the Divine favours to them, that he made known unto them his holy sabbath, ix. 14. and see Ezek. xx. 11, 12.

Ver. 14. Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore.] Since it is such a distinguishing mark, be the more careful to observe it.

For it is holy unto you.] This depends upon what was said in the conclusion of the foregoing verse, that hereby they were sanctified, or separated to God as a peculiar people; and therefore, in all reason, should look upon this as a holy day.

Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death.] If there were credible witnesses of his profanation.

For whosoever doth any work thereon.] This was to defile or profane it.

That soul shall be cut off from among his people.] God seems to threaten that he himself would shorten his days, if the judges, for want of witnesses, could not punish him. So Eliah ben Moseh (one of those whom the Jews call Karaites) most excellently expounds this, and all the rest of the punishments threatened to the violation of this precept, which Mr. Selden hath given us out of a MS. lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 6. The sense is this, in short: he that violates a negative precept, as they call it, either doth it secretly, which is most frequent, or openly, which happens seldom, unless a man be one of those profligate wretches whom we call apostates. Now him that secretly broke the sabbath, the Scripture threatens with cutting off, viz. by the hand of God, according to what is written here in this place. In like manner, incestuous and unlawful conjunctions are threatened, (Lev. xviii. 29.) because they were wont to be committed secretly. But if any man did any work openly on the sabbath, so that there were witnesses of it, he was to be stoned, according to what is said Numb. xv. 35. Though if he did it out of mistake, either secretly or openly, he was only to bring a sacrifice for his error: and if he offended against any of the decrees of the wise men about the sabbath, he was to be beaten. Or if there was no court of judgment in the place (as now, in their present condition), then all such transgressors were left to God to punish them, of whatsoever sort they were.

Ver. 15. Six days may work be done, but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord.] So it is called also xxxv. 2. and Lev. xxiii. 3. And so the sabbath wherein the land rested, is likewise called, Lev. xxv. 4. But the Hebrew words schabbat schabbaton (sabbath of rest) properly signify sabbath above all sabbaths, i. e. the greatest sabbath; on which a rest was to be most punctually observed from all manner of work, which the Jews, as De Dieu notes, call the weighty sabbath; as if other days of rest were but light in comparison with this. According to that saying of R. Josee, great is circumcision, because the weighty sabbath gives place to it; that is, admits of this work, though the rest on this sabbath be so very great.

Shall surely be put to death.] As an idolater, who did not acknowledge the Creator of the world. See before, ver. 14.

Ver. 16. Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout all their generation, for a perpetual covenant.] The most literal interpretation of this verse seems to me to be that of Lud. de Dieu, the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath by making the sabbath a perpetual covenant throughout their generations. That is, by never suffering it to be interrupted, they made it a perpetual covenant between God and them throughout all ages.

Ver. 17. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever.] A badge and livery that they were the servants of the Most High, who made the heavens and earth. A mark of their being devoted to him, and continuing in covenant with him, no less than circumcision.

For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth.] In memory of which the sabbath was first instituted, "to preserve perpetually and establish that most precious history and doctrine of the creation of the world," as Maimonides speaks, More Nevoch par. iii. cap. 43.

And on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed.] Delighted in the contemplation of all his works, which he saw were very good, (Gen. i. 31.) The same Maimonides observes, that the word jinnaphash (which we translate was refreshed) comes from nephesh, which, among other things, signifies the intention of the mind and the will; and therefore the sense of this phrase is, "all the will of God was perfected and brought to a conclusion: his whole good pleasure was absolutely finished on the seventh day," (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 67.)

Ver. 18. And he gave unto Moses, when he made an end of communing with him upon Mount Sinai.] When he dismissed him, having said all that is before related during his forty days' stay with him in the mount, he delivered unto him two tables of testimony, to carry down with him to the people.

Two tables of testimony.] Wherein God testified to them his mind and will, in the principal things which concerned their duty. (See xvi. 34.)

Tables of stone.] That what was written upon them might be more durable. There is no ground to think that these tables were made of some precious stone (as the author of the book Cosri, and other Jews fancy), for the word eben in the Hebrew simply signifies any sort of stone, and is wont to have some other joined to it, when precious stones are meant, as in 2 Sam. xii. 30. 1 Kings x. 2. 2 Chron. iii. 6.

Written with the finger of God.] i. e. By God himself. Just as the heavens, saith Maimonides, are said to be the work of his fingers, (Psal. viii. 4.) which he interprets in another place (xxxiii. 6.) "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made." Therefore written by the finger of God, is as much, saith he, as by the word; that is, the will and good pleasure of God, (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 66.) In short, this phrase signifies, that God employed neither Moses, nor any other instrument, in this writing, but it was done by his own powerful operation. For all things that we do, being wrought by our hands and our fingers, these words are used to express God's power. (See xxxii. 16.)

This was a thing so notorious in ancient times, and so much believed by those who were not Jews, that many other nations pretended to the like Divine writings, that they might gain the greater authority to their laws. Thus the Brachmans report in their histories, that the book of their law (which they call Caster) was delivered by God to Bremavius, upon a mount in a cloud: and that God gave also another book of laws to Brammon in the first age of the world. The Persians say the same of those of Zoroaster; and the Getes of Xamolxis. Nay, the Brachmans have a decalogue like this of Moses, and accurate interpretations of it, in which they say there is this prophecy, That one day there shall be one law alone throughout the world. This evidently shews how well the world was anciently acquainted with these books of Moses, and what a high esteem they had of them. (See Huetius, lib. ii. Alnetan. Quæst. cap. 12. n. 19.)

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. AND when the people.] Not the whole body of the congregation; but so many of them, that the rest durst not appear to oppose their desires.

Saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount.] The Jews fancy that he stayed beyond the time that he had appointed for his return to them. But that is not likely; for he himself was not told how long God would detain him there. (See xxiv. 14.) The meaning therefore is, that he stayed longer than they expected; so that they did not know what to think of it. And having as yet received no directions about the service of God, for which they were called out of Egypt (vii. 16. and other places), they thought it was time to desire Aaron to set about it, in such a way as other people served their gods.

The people gathered themselves together unto Aaron.] They applied themselves to him, as being left by Moses, to be the chief director and governor of affairs, together with Hur, during his absence, (xxiv. 14.) And according to the computation made concerning the time of his going up into the mount, (see xxiv. 18.) this happened upon the fifteenth of our July; which month the Hebrews call Tamuz.

And said unto him, Up.] One cannot think that they spake thus to him at the very first words; but other discourse passed before this: unto which Aaron, in all probability, making some difficulty to consent, and persuading them not to persist in their demand, they would not be denied any longer, but said in a seditious manner, Up, make no further delay, for we will have what we desire.

Make us gods.] Or rather, make us a god: for so Nehemiah expresses it in the singular number, ix. 18. and so Elohim is often translated, Gen. xx. 13. xxxv. 7, &c. For their meaning was, make us a sacred symbol or sign, as other nations have, that may represent God in a visible manner to us. So the Jews expound it in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 45. "They said to Aaron, The Egyptians extol their gods, they sing and chaunt before them; for they behold them with their eyes. Make us such gods as theirs are, that we may see them before us." And so R. Jehudah, in the book Cosri, par. i. sect. 97. "They desired a sensible object of Divine worship to be set before them; not with an intention to deny God, who brought them out of Egypt, but that something in the place of God might stand before them, when they declared his wonderful works." Such, no doubt, was their meaning: for they could not be so senseless as to imagine the true God could be made by a man; or that an image could go before them (as it here follows), which may have feet, but cannot walk, as the Psalmist speaks. And therefore Aben Ezra judiciously interprets it, some corporeal image, in which God may reside.

Which shall go before us.] Conduct us through the wilderness. God himself, in a pillar of cloud and fire, hitherto went before them: but that cloud now covering the mount where Moses was, and not stirring at all from thence, they imagined, perhaps, that Moses being lost, it would no longer lead them as it had done.

For as for this Moses, &c.] This doth not seem to be the language of those who had any regard to him.

We wot not what is become of him.] They thought, perhaps, that he was consumed in the mount, by the fire which shone from the face of God, as Jonathan paraphrases it. Greg. Nyssen's reflection upon this demand of the people is very natural; that they were like schoolboys, who, in the absence of their master, were carried ἀνοήτοις ὁρμαῖς εἰς ἀταξίαν, with senseless impetuous motions, into rudeness and disorder, (p. 183. de Vita Mosis.) For there were many among them who were infected with the Egyptian idolatry, as we learn from Josh. xxiv. 14. Ezek. xx. 7, 8. xxiii. 3. 8. And, therefore, hankering after that way of worship by images, which they had learnt there, they took this opportunity to desire a visible representation of God among them, as the Egyptians had. And so St. Stephen looks upon this as a turning back in their hearts unto Egypt, (Acts vii. 39, &c.)

Ver. 2. And Aaron said unto them, Break off the golden ear-rings, &c.] This confirms what I said, that there was some debate about this matter, before they spake those words to him, (ver. 1.) Up, make us gods, &c. For it is not credible that Aaron would immediately consent to so foul a fact as this, without the least argument against it. Which is so unlikely, that the Jews have devised this tale: that Hur rebuking them in his presence, the people fell upon him and killed him; which affrighted Aaron into a speedy compliance.

The golden ear-rings.] These, it is probable, were some of the jewels which they borrowed of the Egyptians, (xii. 35.) and possibly might have worn superstitiously, as I observed (Gen. xxxv. 5.) they did very anciently. There are those who think Aaron hoped they would not have easily parted with these; and so their design might have been broken.

From the ears of your wives, of your sons, and your daughters.] Men wore these ornaments in the eastern countries, as well as women; as we find in the story of the Ishmaelite and Midianite soldiers, (Judg. viii. 24. and Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 31.) "In oriente quidem et viris aurum eo loci," &c. In the east it is esteemed an ornament for men to wear gold in that place; speaking of their ears. (See Bochart. Hierozoic. par. i. lib. i. cap. 34.)

Ver. 3. And all the people.] All that were engaged in this design; who were so many (as I said ver. 1.) that the rest it is likely durst not oppose it.

Broke off the golden ear-rings which were in their ears, and brought them to Aaron.] So zealous is superstition, which prevails over pride and covetousness.

Ver. 4. And he received them at their hands.] They seem to have presented them as an offering, towards the making of a representation of God; wherein every one of them might have an interest; and accordingly Aaron accepted them.

And fashioned it with a graving tool.] The Hebrew word cheret (which we translate graving tool) is used for a writing pen, (Isa. viii. 1.) and for a crisping pin, which women used about their hair, (Isa. iii. 22.) And therefore interpreters take it here for an instrument of engraving. And some think that Aaron made such marks with it in this calf as there were in the Egyptian Apis: which was a cow that had a spot on her right side like a crescent, (as some writers say, though Herodotus saith otherwise, and the marks are variously reported; see Pignorius in his Mensa Isiaca, p. 18, &c.) and a square white spot in the forehead. But others think it more likely, that the calf coming rough out of the mould, Aaron only polished it with a proper tool. For though Apis was in great honour among the Egyptians, yet it was a living cow, and not the image of one, which they had in such veneration. Therefore Mr. Selden (in his Syntagma, i. de Diis Syris, cap. 4.) takes it to be more probable, that this golden calf, or ox, or bullock (for so the Psalmist differently calls it, cvi. 19, 20.) was made in imitation of that golden ox that represented Osiris; which was very famous among the Egyptians: who had a mighty veneration for the river Nile, called in Hebrew Sichor (from whence came Syris), and for the dog-star (called Syris likewise), at whose rising that river began to swell; and for the sun (which was principally meant by this name), to whom both the bull at Heliopolis, and the ox at Memphis were consecrated, as Macrobius tells us, lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 21. But though all this be very ingenious, yet the truth of it may be well questioned, as I shall shew presently; when I have noted that this translation, fashioned it with a graving tool, is not so agreeable to what here follows, as another which the Hebrew words will as well bear.

After he had made it a molten calf.] The words in the Hebrew are, and he made it, &c. we translate them after, &c. to make this agree with what goes before, according to our translation, he fashioned it with a graving tool: which may as literally be translated, he bound them up in a bag. For we find the word jatzar, which we here translate fashioned, to have the signification also of binding or tying up: and cheret in the plural number to signify a bag, (2 Kings v. 23.) And thus the prophet Isaiah (as Bochart observes) describes the making of images, (xlvi. 6.) "They lavish gold out of the bag, and they make it a god." Which agrees with what is here said of Aaron—he received the ear-rings, and put them in a bag; and then having made a mould, cast them into it, and made a golden calf. (See ver. 24.)

A molten calf.] So he calls it, because it was no bigger than a calf, though the head was like an ox: and therefore, as I observed before, so called by the Psalmist. What moved Aaron to represent God in this figure, is hard to resolve. Most think he imitated the Egyptians, among whom he had long lived: which seems not to me at all likely, since he had seen the judgment that God executed against all their gods, (xii. 12.) Yet so great a man as I. Gerh. Vossius hath taken a great deal of pains to prove, that Joseph was adored by them under the name of Apis and Serapis; and that his symbol was an ox. This he hath laboured to support by many ingenious conjectures. But it is not likely, if he were thus publicly honoured as a god, that a king should arise who knew not Joseph, i. e. had no regard to him, (Exod. i. 8.) and another succeed him, who endeavoured to ruin all his kindred. The worship of Serapis also was not so ancient, for Herodotus saith not a word of it, nor any body else, till the time of Alexander the Great; and many authors say it was brought into Egypt out of Pontus by Ptolemy: (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic. par. i. p. 338.) And though Apis was more ancient, yet not of such antiquity as Moses, as a very learned person of our own (Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury) hath shewn in his book of idolatry, chap. vi. part 4, 5, &c. And as for Osiris, both Plutarch and Strabo say he was the same with Apis: which was not then known, as I have said, in Egypt, no more than Typhus or Typhon, whom Philo thinks to be here intended; but was certainly a later invention, and, as Bochartus imagines, represented Moses himself, though very much disguised.

Cuperus, indeed, hath made it probable (in his Harpocrates, p. 83, &c.) that there was a Serapis worshipped in Egypt, before that brought out of Pontus: but whether it be so or no, I do not take it to be at all material, because it is not likely that Aaron would make such a representation of the Divinity as was in use among them, from whose slavery God had lately delivered them. For how could he think the Lord, to whom he proclaimed a feast, would be pleased to be represented by any of those idols, on whom, as I said before, he had executed judgment, at their departure out of Egypt? Or what reason is there to think the Israelites themselves could be inclined to think their God to be like any thing which that people worshipped, who abhorred the sacrifices which the God of Israel required? Their conjecture seems to me far more likely, who think that Aaron, in making this calf, took his pattern from some part of the Schechinah which appeared to him and the elders of Israel (when they ate before God, xxiv. 10.) attended with the angels: some of which, called cherubims, they think appeared with the faces of oxen. But as there is no mention in that place of cherubims, nor of the angels appearing in any shape whatsoever; and Moses expressly saith, the Israelites saw no manner of similitude on the day when the Lord spake to them in Horeb (Deut. iv. 15. and therefore Aaron and the elders, in all probability, saw none afterward), so I think there is no evidence that the heavenly ministers at any time appeared in this shape, till the Schechinah departed from the temple, in the days of Ezekiel. (See xxv. 18. 20.)

After all this considered, Aaron seems to me to have chosen an ox to be the symbol of the Divine presence, in hope the people would never be so sottish as to worship it; but only be put in mind by it of the Divine power, which was hereby represented. For an ox's head was anciently an emblem of strength, and horns a common sign of kingly power. So they were among the Phœnicians, (as Pignorius observes in his Mensa Isiaca, p. 15. out of Eusebius's Præpar. Evang. lib. i. cap. ult.) and among the Egyptians, (as Diodorus Siculus relates, lib. i.) and among the Romans, as appears by that famous story of Genucius Cipus, (in Val. Maximus, lib. v. cap. 6.) who, when he was prætor, had horns come out of his head on a sudden, as he was going out of the city to the wars; whereupon he was told, "Regem eum fore, si in urbem revertisset;" that he should be a king, if he returned into the city. And something like it is related by Julius Capitolinus concerning Clodius Albinus, at whose birth a cow brought forth a calf with purple horns, which they looked upon as signum imperii, a token of empire. Which made the ancient fathers, perhaps, when they spake of this calf or ox of Aaron's, mention only its head. For so doth Tertullian: (lib. adversus Judæos, cap. 1.) "cum processisset eis bubulum caput;" and St. Cyprian, Lactantius, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and others: not because they thought Aaron made only the head; but because this was the principal part whereby God was represented.

And they said.] The people cried out aloud.

These be thy gods, O Israel.] Or, as Nehemiah expresses it, (ix. 18.) This is thy God, &c. the image or symbol of the Divine Majesty: or, as Abulensis interprets it, his Divine virtue resideth in this golden body. The plural number is commonly used for the singular, especially when God is spoken of, as I observed before, Gen. xx. 13. xxxv. 7. 2 Sam. vii. 23.

Which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.] This shews they looked upon this ox only as a representation of the Almighty Lord their God: for it being but newly made, they could not imagine they were brought by it from the Egyptian slavery, but by his power, which perhaps they fancied now resided in it.

Ver. 5. And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it.] As at the people's request he made it, so he, seeing them receive it with such applause, presently consecrated it; by building an altar, offering sacrifices, and keeping a solemn feast in its honour.

And Aaron made proclamation.] Caused it to be publicly proclaimed throughout the host; that every one might have notice of the solemnity.

And said, To-morrow is a feast.] Which was a part of worship ordained by his authority.

To the Lord.] Not to this ox, but to the Creator of the world, whom they worshipped in this image. Notwithstanding which, this was no better than an idol, (Acts vii. 41.) and they gross idolaters, (Psal. cvi. 19, 20. 1 Cor. x. 7.) Some think, indeed, that Moses being gone, and, as they imagined, either burnt up or famished, they desired this representation of God to go before them, and direct them, as a kind of teraphim: but God allowed no such visible sign to be made of his presence with them, which he knew would in a short time have their adoration.

Ver. 6. And they rose up early on the morrow.] The next day, which was the sixteenth of our July, they kept their festival. And to shew their devotion, they began betimes in the morning, and seem not to have stayed for Aaron: but, as it follows, offered sacrifices themselves.

And offered burnt-offerings.] Which always preceded others. See xviii. 12. xxiv. 5. where I observed, that whole burnt-offerings were entirely consumed on the altar, being wholly God's.

And brought peace-offerings.] This intimates that some persons received what they brought; and perhaps they were the young men mentioned xxiv. 5. where I noted also, that of peace-offerings the people that brought them had a share, that they might feast with God; and they invited their friends likewise to feast with them. There is no mention either here, or in the other places, of sin-offerings: whereof the priests had a part, but not the people.

And the people sat down to eat and to drink.] Upon the sacrifices of peace-offerings; whereof the people, as I said, had their part: and by partaking of it, had fellowship with the idol, to whom they were offered, as the apostle shews, (1 Cor. x. 20, 21.) Thus the Egyptians kept a Πανδαισία at the feast of Apis; in imitation rather of the Israelites, than otherwise.

It may be fit here to note, that this custom of sacrificing, and also of feasting on the sacrifice, in token of their communion with him to whom the sacrifice was offered, was so very ancient, that it is not easy to believe the observation of St. Chrysostom to be true, that God gave no commandment about sacrifices, till after this sin of worshipping the golden calf: when, seeing their proneness to offer such sacrifices, he thought fit to ordain them himself, and direct them to their right object. Much less is it true, that before this οὐδαμῶς θυσίας ὄνομα, we do not find any where the name of sacrifice, (as he speaks Homil. xvii. upon Acts vii.) no, not with the qualification of Grotius, who says (upon Exod. xv. 26.) that there was no law about sacrifices, except that of the Passover, till after they had committed idolatry. For, besides that, there is an order how to make an altar, on which to sacrifice their burnt-offerings, (xx. 24.) which supposes God's intention about them; and the building of an altar, and actual sacrifice upon it, at the sealing of the covenant between God and Israel, xxiv. 4, 5. &c. (which surely was not without God's command) there is a whole chapter in this book about sacrifices at the consecration of Aaron and his sons, before this sin was committed, (chap. xxix.) and particular directions given in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth verses of that chapter, about the daily burnt-offering. I omit what might be said concerning the oblation of sacrifices from the beginning of the world, which it is hard to believe was without a Divine institution. St. Jerome's words therefore are also too large, who saith, in his commentaries upon Ezek. xx. that the Israelites received only the decalogue before this offence of the calf: after which, God gave them multiplices legis ceremonias, abundance of legal ceremonies. All that can justly be said in this matter is, that Moses had not yet delivered to them the commands beforementioned, which God had given him; and that they had received but a few commands about sacrifices till after this sin: when the precepts were multiplied, that they might upon all occasions offer sacrifice to God, and not to demons, as they were inclined to do. The daily burnt-offerings were appointed before (as I said) though not delivered to them; and so was the sin-offering for the consecration of Aaron and his sons, and the altar, (xxix. 36, &c.) But the sin-offering for particular persons, and for the whole congregation of Israel, and the great variety of sacrifices, with the manner of them, were not yet prescribed; and perhaps were ordained upon this occasion to preserve them from idolatry; though not merely for that, there being respect in them to the great sacrifice of Christ, especially in that sacrifice upon the day of expiation. But in general, it may be reasonably thought, that if they had not been perverse, they might have been left more at liberty to do these things at pleasure, according to the law of nature; and they might perhaps have been permitted to offer sacrifices every where, as the patriarchs did, though there is no certainty of such speculations.

And rose up to play.] So God commanded at their festivities; and when they offered solemn sacrifices, to rejoice before him, (Deut. xii. 6, 7. xvi. 11.) as David did before the ark, after he had sacrificed oxen and fatlings, (2 Sam. vi. 13—16.) Thus they now expressed their joy, by music, and dancing, and songs, and such-like tokens of mirth, which was wont to be very great upon their feasts. (See ver. 18.) There are those who think, that after they had eaten of the sacrifices to the idol, and drunk liberally, they committed fornication, after the manner of heathen worshippers. Thus Tertullian expounds this phrase, (L. de Jejunio, cap. 6.) "Intellige Scripturæ verecundiam;" the Scripture modestly expresses their lewd filthiness. And so this very word which we translate here play, is used by Potiphar's wife; (Gen. xxxix. 17.) the Hebrew servant came in, to mock me, i. e. to violate my chastity. So that the Israelites did now, as they did afterwards when they worshipped Peor, (Numb. xxv. 1, 2.) And the truth is, these sacrifical feasts were turned among the gentiles into drunkenness and lasciviousness, which are wont to be companions; insomuch, that the ancient Greeks, even Aristotle himself, as Athenæus tells us, (lib. ii.) derived the word μεθύειν, to be drunk, from μετὰ τὸ θύειν, after the sacrifice, when they were wont to drink very largely. And it is also true, that nothing enticed men to idolatry more than these filthy pleasures, which were a part of that worship. Yet I think it is not credible, that the Israelites, at the very dedication of their idol, when they pretended much religion, fell into such foul practices, which were not at first committed among the heathen. Nor is there any signification of it in this story; but only of their singing and dancing, ver. 18, 19. (accompanied, it is likely, with music) which Philo indeed calls χοροὺς ἀχορεύτους, unseemly dances; but that was only, I suppose, because they were in honour of a calf. Nor did the gentiles themselves, as I said, run at first into such excess of riot, as Athenæus observes, (lib. viii. Deipnosoph.) where, in the conclusion of it, he describes all the city full of the noise of pipes, and cymbals, and drums, and the voice of those that sung in a great festival; and thence takes occasion to remember, that the ancients observing what a great inclination people had to pleasure, took care they might enjoy it εὐτάκτως καὶ κοσμίως, orderly and decently, by setting apart certain times to entertain them with it. When in the first place they sacrificed to their gods, and then were left to take their ease: that every one believing the gods came to their sacrifices, μετὰ αἰδοῦς τὴν συνουσίαν ποιῆσαι, might behave themselves at such meetings with modesty and reverence. For we are ashamed, saith he, to speak or do any thing unseemly before a grave person: and therefore, supposing the gods to be nigh them, τὰς ἑορτὰς κοσμίως καὶ σωφρόνως διῆγον, they passed their festival days, in ancient times, decently and soberly. And so he proceeds to shew how much the world was altered in his time, when nothing but mad revelling was to be seen on such occasions. He observes it also as a sign of the ancient modesty at these feasts, that they did not κατακλίνεσθαι, lie along, ἀλλὰ δαίνυνθ' ἑζόμενοι, but they sat down to eat and drink, as the Israelites here did.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go, get thee down.] He had dismissed him before, having done communing with him, (xxxi. 18.) and now sends him away from the mount in some haste, at the end of the forty days mentioned in the twenty-fourth chap. ult.

For thy people, which thou broughtest out of Egypt.] These words are generally looked upon, as God's abandoning the Israelites, and disowning them to be his people. But then, they would not have been Moses's people neither, but utterly destroyed, (ver. 10.) Therefore the true meaning is explained by St. Stephen, who calls Moses their λυτρωτὴς, deliverer, (Acts vii. 35.) because by his hand God redeemed them; and in that regard they became his people.

Have corrupted themselves.] He doth not mention Aaron, though he was very angry with him also, (Deut. ix. 20.) because the people were the beginners of the revolt, and he complied with them out of fear.

Ver. 8. They have turned aside quickly out of the way, which I commanded them.] It was not much above six weeks since they heard God charge them, in a terrible manner, not to worship any image, (xx. 4.) and they solemnly promised to do whatsoever Moses commanded them from God, (ver. 19.) Immediately after which, this command is in a peculiar manner repeated, (ver. 23.) Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold. Which, with all the rest of his judgments, they covenanted also to observe, (xxiv. 3. 8.) And therefore such a speedy revolt, from such obligations, made their crime exceeding heinous.

They have made them a golden calf.] For what Aaron did was at their instigation.

And have worshipped it.] By kissing it (saith R. Eliezer in his Pirke, cap. 45.) and bowing down to it; and then offering sacrifice to it (as it here follows) and acknowledging it to be their conductor out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 9. And the Lord said unto Moses.] He added this further before he went down from the mount.

I have seen this people.] Long observed their disposition.

And behold, it is a stiff-necked people.] This character of them is repeated, xxxiii. 3. 5. xxxiv. 9. being a metaphor from untamed heifers, who draw their necks and shoulders back when they are put under the yoke. The prophet Isaiah alludes to this, when he saith of this people, (xlviii. 4.) Thy neck is an iron sinew, which would not bend. And Jeremiah v. 5. where he saith, the great men had broken the yoke and burst the bonds.

Ver. 10. Now therefore let me alone.] Do not interpose in their behalf, with thy prayers and deprecations for them.

That my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them.] That the just indignation I have conceived against them, may proceed to punish them with utter destruction.

And I will make of thee a great nation.] Or, I will set thee over a great nation; make thee prince of a mightier nation than they, (as the words are Numb. xiv. 12.) for so the word asah (to make) signifies, 1 Sam. xii. 6. where we translate it, advanced Moses and Aaron. Which seems to be the meaning here, because Moses urges (ver. 13.) the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as if that would not be made good if the people were all destroyed. Whereas there would have been no danger of that, if God had made a great nation to spring from Moses, who was of their seed.

Ver. 11. And Moses besought the Lord.] The Hebrew word challah, from whence comes vaichal (which we translate besought) importing something of sickness and infirmity; denotes that Moses besought the Lord with much earnestness, and great agony of mind.

His God.] He hoped he had not lost his interest in God, which the people had justly forfeited.

And said, Why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people.] There was great reason for this high displeasure against them, which God threatened, ver. 10. and Moses himself was not only angry, but his anger waxed hot; (ver. 19.) yet he hoped other reasons would move the Divine mercy to moderate his anger; that is, not to punish them so severely as they deserved.

Which thou hast brought out of the land of Egypt, with great power and with a mighty hand?] This is one ground of hope, that God would not on a sudden destroy what he had employed so much power to preserve.

Ver. 12. Wherefore should the Egyptians say, For mischief did he bring them out.] This is another reason, that the Egyptians might not be led into a misbelief, or confirmed in their infidelity.

To slay them in the mountains.] There were many mountains besides Sinai (where they now were) in that desert into which God led them: and they were the most dangerous part of it.

Turn from thy fierce wrath, &c.] Let these considerations prevail for a pardon.

Ver. 13. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, &c.] This is the great argument of all, the promise made to their forefathers, who were his faithful servants, and this promise confirmed by an oath (often repeated) which he hoped God would faithfully fulfil.

I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven.] Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17. This part of the promise he had fulfilled; which made him hope he would fulfil the other part which here follows.

And all this land that I have spoken of will I give to your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever.] Gen. xii. 7. xiii. 15. xv. 7. xxviii. 13.

Ver. 14. And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people.] He did not change his mind; for there was not a peremptory decree or definitive sentence (as they speak) pronounced against them; but only a signification of what they deserved, (ver. 10.) which, unless it had been for the forenamed reasons, and Moses's intercession, he would have inflicted upon them.

Ver. 15. And Moses turned.] From the presence of God, with whom he had been forty days.

And came down from the mount.] From the place where he was with God, to that where he left Joshua waiting for his return. (See xxiv. 13.)

And the two tables of the testimony were in his hand.] Which God promised to give him, and one would think had readily prepared for him before he went up into the mount, (xxxiv. 12.) and when he was coming down, delivered into his hands, (xxxi. ult.) They are called tables of testimony, because God declared and testified therein what his mind and will was, as I have often noted.

The tables were written on both their sides.] Some fancy that the writing was both on the fore-part and the back-part of them; that so the ten commandments might be read by those who stood either before or behind, when they were set up; being written (according to this conceit) twice over. But they were not made to be set up, but to be reposited in the ark: and therefore the meaning is, they were written on both the leaves (as I may call them) which were to be folded up and shut like a book, when they were laid in the ark.

On the one side and on the other were they written.] On the right hand, and on the left. How many were written on the one, and how many on the other, is variously disputed, but cannot certainly be determined.

Ver. 16. And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven on the tables.] The tables were made and planned by God himself; as well as the letters written by him, (xxxi. 18.) and no creature employed in either work; much less Moses, who seems to have found them ready prepared for him, when he came into the mount, as I observed before from xxiv. 12.

Ver. 17. And when Joshua heard the noise of the people, as they shouted.] Being come to the foot of the mount, they could easily hear the noise which the people made in their festival.

He said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp.] Knowing nothing of the occasion, he took it for the noise which soldiers make (called by the Hebrews teruah, by the Greeks ἀλάλαγμα) who make a great shout when they give the onset; and much greater when they get the victory.

Ver. 18. And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome.] Being before instructed by God what the people were a doing, (ver. 7.) Moses could easily correct his mistake; assuring him, it was neither the cry of strength, nor of weakness (as the words are in the Hebrew), i. e. of conquerors, as we rightly translate it, or of those that are overcome.

But the noise of those that sing do I hear.] Out of merriment in a festival. For thus Apis was brought in solemn pomp to Memphis, the royal city; the children going before in procession, and singing a song of praise to the deity. Which was not the pattern to the Israelites, nor borrowed, perhaps, from them; but the common practice of the world on such occasions, from ancient times, as I observed before out of Athenæus, (ver. 6.) whose words are, ἐγένετο κατὰ πᾶσαν τὴν πόλιν αὐλῶν βόμβος, καὶ κυμβάλων ἦχος, ἔτι δὲ τυμπάνων κτύπος; μετ' ᾠδῆς ἅμα γενόμενος. And this was part of the entertainment in private feasts; as appears by those known words of Homer:

Τερπόμενοι, μετὰ δέ σφιν ἐμέλπετο δῖος ἀοιδός.

They feasted upon excellent cheer, and were very merry; and then the Divine songster sung among them.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, as soon as he came nigh unto the camp.] Which was at some distance from the mount, (xix. 21. 23. xx. 21. xxiv. 1.)

That he saw the calf, and the dancing.] Which began early in the morning, and continued all day: for we may presume it was towards the evening before Moses got to the camp; having spent a considerable part of the day in beseeching God for them.

And Moses's anger waxed hot.] The sight of their madness turned the compassion he had for them (ver. 11, 12, &c.) into a kind of rage.

And he cast the tables out of his hands, and he brake them

beneath the mount.] He did not do it till now (though he knew their guilt, and no doubt was affected with it before he came nigh to the camp, and saw the calf, and dancing), because he would have the people see how he resented their wickedness, and with what indignation it filled him. And now he did it, no doubt, by the same Divine impulse, or heroic motion, which stirred him up to kill the Egyptian. (See ii. 12.) For he is never blamed for this; and therefore did it by a Divine incitement: to shew the Israelites how unworthy they were to be espoused to God (as some have expressed it) by these instruments or deeds, which were most precious tokens of God's love to them. To this effect Abarbinel discourses: "Moses did not leave the tables in the mount where they were delivered to him, when he heard how the people had revolted; but brought them along with him, that he might make all Israel sensible what they had lost, by breaking them before their eyes."

Ver. 20. And he took the calf, which they had made, and burnt it in the fire.] Melted it down; so that though the matter remained (i. e. the gold), yet the form and external shape of the calf was so destroyed, that it might be said properly enough to be burnt. For the Romans (as Bochart observes) called that place where they melted their metal Ustrina.

And ground it to powder.] Some have pretended to the knowledge of an herb, which will dissolve gold, and reduce it to ashes: but they do not say what it is, or that it was to be found in that wilderness. And if Moses had known, and used this secret, what need was there of his grinding it again, after it was dissolved to ashes? it is most likely, therefore, that this was done with a file, whereby it was grated into dust as small as flour, which is ground in a mill. With such dust some powdered their own hair, and the manes of their horses, (as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.) which made them glitter and sparkle when the sun shone upon them.

And strawed it upon the water.] Of the brook which descended out of the mount, (xvii. 6. Deut. ix. 21.) By which means the calf was utterly abolished; and demonstrated (as Abarbinel notes) to have no more divinity in it than the dust or water hath.

And made the children of Israel drink of it.] He did not constrain them; but having no other water, they could not avoid, when they were thirsty, to drink with this mixture. Which Moses threw into it, not to discover who were guilty of idolatry, as the Jews fancy, who say this was like the water of jealousy, (Numb. v. 27.) which made their bellies swell, or their beards, as some have since fabled, turn yellow, (for it was a general apostacy, ver. 1. 3.) but to make them sensible how vile a thing this idol was; which was gone into their draught, and mixed with their dung and their urine. They that have a desire to see the conceits of the Jews about it, may look into Selden de Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 4. and J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 1128.

Ver. 21. And Moses said unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee?] It was not sufficient that the idol was destroyed, but he thought fit to call his brother to an account, for his misgovernment in his absence. Who makes a very weak defence, as all commentators observe, to whom I refer the reader. And shall only note, that the best apology he could have made had been this (if it had been true), that he only represented God unto them, as he had represented himself to him and the elders of Israel; when the cherubims, in the form of oxen, made part of the train of the Schechinah, or Divine Majesty. But he says not a word of this; which I suppose therefore is a groundless opinion.

That thou hast brought so great a sin upon them.] If they had made or built a house for Divine worship (saith Sepher Cosri in the place abovenamed), according to their own fancies, that they might have offered their sacrifices there, and directed their devotions thither, it would not have seemed to me so grievous a sin: for at this day we make such houses, and have a veneration for them, and promise ourselves the Divine benediction in them, &c. But to make an image was directly against the command of God; and to fancy that he would be present with that which he abhorred, very much aggravated the crime.

Ver. 22. And Aaron said, Let not the anger of my lord wax hot.] He beseeches him in a very humble manner to hear him calmly.

Thou knowest the people.] He had been long acquainted with their rebellious and obstinate humour: which made them fall a murmuring as soon as ever they were delivered from Pharaoh at the Red Sea, (xv. 24. xvi. 2, &c.)

That they are set on mischief.] The words in the Hebrew, bera hu, are more emphatical, they are in wickedness, or in idolatry: like that expression in St. John, 1 Epist. v. 19. the whole world lieth in wickedness. Or, as we say in our language, they were stark naught.

Ver. 23. For they said unto me, Make us gods, &c.] This verse is but a recital of what the people said to him, ver. 2. (See there.)

Ver. 24. And I said unto them, Whosoever hath any gold, let him break it off: so they gave it me.] This is the sense of ver. 2 and 3.

Then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf.] He speaks as if he did not make the calf, but the gold being cast into the fire, out it came in this form. Which made Dr. Jackson think it more than probable, that th erewas some magical or demoniacal skill practised in the sudden moulding of this idol, which very much increased the people's superstition to it. For what else, saith he, could Aaron mean by these words, I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf, than that there was some secret invisible operation whereby it was moulded into this form in an instant? which raised, as I said, the people's devotion to it. Herein he follows some Jews, who go a great deal further, saying, that the devil entered into it, and made it roar like a bull, to strike a greater awe into the people, as R. Juda saith, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 45. And in Tanchuma they say, it not only roared, but danced also. Which seem to me to be conceits invented for the excuse of Aaron; who is said plainly enough (ver. 4.) to have made this molten calf. Which he could not have done without designing it, and running the gold into a mould of this figure.

Here is no account at all given what judgment Moses made of this defence; but it appears by Deut. ix. 20. that God was so angry with him, that he had been destroyed, if Moses had not interceded for him, and beseeched God to pardon his weakness, in complying with a people set on mischief; (ver. 22.) for, no doubt, in his own mind he was against this fact, as the Levites were, of whom he was the chief.

Ver. 25. And when Moses saw that the people were naked,] Without the Divine protection. For the glory of the Lord in the cloud, it is likely, departed and went up from them; which we read descended again, xxxiii. 9.

For Aaron had made them naked, &c.] Laid them open, by this sin, to the scorn of all their enemies, who should hear of such a shameful revolt from their God.

Ver. 26. Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp.] Where the courts of judgment were wont to sit, to hear causes, and to punish offenders. So it was in their cities, in aftertimes, which it is likely was derived from the usage now: as now they did but follow the practices of their forefathers. For in the days of Abraham, the city gate was the place where all public and private business was transacted, (Gen. xxiii. 10. 18.) which seems to have been the manner in all the country; for at Shechem we find, as well as here at Hebron, when Hamor and his son proposed to make an alliance with the Israelites, they motioned it to the people at the gate of the city, (Gen. xxxiv. 20.) Which was the same thing with the forum or exchange among the Romans: the market being also held here, where there were seats for the judges and elders.

And said, Who is on the Lord's side?] Abhors this idolatry, and cleaves to the worship of the Lord only?

Let him come unto me.] To receive his commands; who was under God their leader.

And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him.] If not the whole tribe, yet as many as had any zeal for the Lord; who were the most. This is an argument there was a general defection of the people to this idolatrous worship, that none but the sons of Levi appeared to join with Moses on this occasion.

Ver. 27. And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side.] The Lord himself, by his command, warrants what I bid you do.

And go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp.] They were not to go into their tents (where they who were sensible of God's displeasure, it may be presumed, were bemoaning their sin), but to kill every one they met in the street.

And slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, &c.] All the Israelites were brethren; and they are commanded to spare none they met withal, because they were near relations, or friends, or next neighbours. Some may imagine this too hazardous an undertaking, the Levites being but a very small number in comparison with the people of Israel; but having God's warrant, they were confident none would have the courage to oppose them; for guilt makes men timorous: and the Levites also found them, as men used to be at the conclusion of a festival, weary with their dancing and sports. Besides, there are those who, by their being naked, (ver. 25.) understand they were unarmed: for Aaron had disarmed them to their shame, by setting up the calf for them to dance about; which made them lay aside all thoughts of their arms, and so were more easily slain by the Levites.

Ver. 28. And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses.] Who being, under God, their chief ruler, passed this extraordinary sentence upon the offenders, without the common process in courts of judgment, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 2. in the end of it.

And there fell of the people that day about three thousand men.] The Vulgar hath twenty-three thousand, contrary to the LXX. as well as the Hebrew text, and all the eastern versions, except the Arabic, printed at Rome in this age, and manifestly out of the Vulgar Latin, as Mr. Selden hath observed in the same place, and Bochart shews largely to be against all the ancient translations and writers, Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. p. 353. where he notes also out of Philo, these three thousand to have been ἀρχηγέτας μάλιστα τῆς ἀσεβείας, the principal ringleaders of this impiety.

In memory of these disasters, the breaking of the tables, and this slaughter, the Jews keep a fast every year on the seventeenth of Tamuz, which, by Jac. Capellus's computation, answers to the sixteenth of our July.

Ver. 29. For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves today to the Lord.] Or, Moses said, ye have consecrated yourselves, &c. Which way soever we take it (either as spoken before the execution, to encourage them to it, or afterward, to commend them for it), the meaning is, that this act was as acceptable to God as a sacrifice, and had procured them the honour to wait upon him as his ministers.

Every man upon his son, and upon his brother.] This seems to signify that some of the tribe of Levi had also prevaricated, to whom these pious Levites had no regard, but killed them indifferently with the rest, though they met with one of their own children; for which they are highly commended by Moses in his blessing, Deut. xxxiii. 9. But it may signify no more, but that they went out with this sincere resolution to spare none, though never so dear to them.

That he may bestow upon you a blessing this day.] This blessing was the preferment of the tribe of Levi to be God's ministers in his house, and to enjoy all the tenth of the land for an inheritance, (Numb. xviii. 21. 24.)

Ver. 30. And it came to pass on the morrow.] Which was the eighteenth day of Tamuz, or our seventeenth of July.

That Moses said unto the people.] Whom he assembled together, that he might make them sensible of their sin.

Ye have sinned a great sin.] He set their sin before them, it is likely, in all its aggravating circumstances.

And now I will go up unto the Lord.] But he would not have them despair of recovering God's favour, though he could not absolutely assure them of it.

Peradventure I shall make an atonement for your sin.] That God might not inflict any further punishment upon them.

Ver. 31. And Moses returned unto the Lord.] Not, as yet, to the place where he was before with the Lord for forty days; but to some part of the mount, where he might put up his most fervent prayers to God, by which his anger was turned away, as well as by sacrifices.

And said, Oh! this people have sinned a great sin.] He begins his prayers with a confession of their guilt in a most pathetical manner.

And have made them gods of gold.] Contrary to the express repeated command of God, (xx. 4. 23.)

Ver. 32. Yet now.] Here follows his earnest and most affectionate deprecation for them.

If thou wilt forgive their sin.] Be thou pleased, or, O that thou wouldst forgive them! See Dr. Hammond upon Psal. xcv. not. 6.

Or if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.] Let me die, rather than live to see the evils that are coming on them, if thou punish them as they deserve. God hath no need of a book, wherein to register and record any of his purposes; but the Scripture uses the language of men, as the Jews speak, who, to this day, retain this form of speech, in their prayer wherewith they begin the new year. O, our Father and our King, write us in the book of the best life, in the book of righteousness, in the book of redemption. They desire, that is, to be preserved that year in a happy condition, free from sin, from want, and from danger. See Theodoric Hackspan, in his annotations on this place.

Ver. 33. And the Lord said unto Moses, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book.] This was all the answer Moses could obtain: that they only should perish who had offended the Divine Majesty. Which doth not deny them a pardon, if they ceased to offend him.

Ver. 34. Therefore now go.] Speak no more of this matter, but return to the camp.

Lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken unto thee.] Take the conduct of the people upon thee to the land which I promised to bestow on them. This supposes God would not punish them as they deserved; though, by the words following, it appears he abated something of his wonted kindness to them.

Behold, mine angel shall go before thee.] Not the angel spoken of, xxiii. 20. but some lesser minister in the heavenly court, as appears from the next chapter, ver. 2. where he saith only, I will send an angel before thee, viz. in the pillar of cloud and fire, (xiii. 22.)

Nevertheless, in the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them.] Upon the next occasion to punish other offences, I will further punish this. Whence the saying of R. Isaac, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 11. "There hath no vengeance come upon the world, in which there hath not been half an ounce of the first calf." To which R. Uschajah there hath respect, in these words: "Till the days of Jeroboam, the Israelites sucked but of one calf, but afterward of three." That is, their punishment was twice as great; for they made two calves, though they had seen the terrible punishment which came upon their forefathers from making one.

Ver. 35. And the Lord plagued the people.] With the pestilence, as some imagine, though it be not mentioned in Scripture. Or, he means all the evils that afterward consumed them in the wilderness. But there are those who understand this of the slaughter made by the Levites; which he briefly repeats (as the manner sometimes is in these writings) as a conclusion to this history of the golden calf.

Because they made the calf which Aaron made.] Provoked him to make.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Moses, Depart, and go up hence, thou and thy people, &c.] This is a renewal of the order he had already given, (xxxii. 34.) which he further explains, by expressly assuring him he would make good his promise to their forefathers, of which Moses had remembered him, (xxxii. 13.) But they were not by this ordered presently to remove, till Moses had been again in the mount, and the tabernacle was set up, and all the service of it prescribed.

And I will send an angel before thee, and I will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, &c.] I will not wholly withdraw my protection from you (as he had for the present, xxxii. 25.) but send one of my ministers to discomfit your enemies, till you get possession of their land.

Ver. 3. For I will not go up in the midst of thee.] For though I intended to have dwelt among you myself, by my special presence, (which was in the Schechinah, xxv. 8. xxix. 43. 45, 46.) you have justly forfeited that favour. The Chaldee gives the true sense of this speech, I will not make my majesty (so the Schechinah or Divine Glory was called) to go up in the midst of thee. And accordingly it follows, (ver. 7—9.) that he did remove to a distance from them. Concerning that phrase, in the midst of thee, see xvii. 7.

For thou art a stiff-necked people.] See xxxii. 9.

Lest I consume thee in the way.] It is not fit for me to see myself affronted to my face by stiff-necked offenders, and not punish them with utter destruction. This is an argument that the angel, he saith he would send before them, was not God himself (as the eternal ΛΟΓΟΣ is), for then he would have had the same reason to consume them for their disobedience.

Ver. 4. And when the people heard these evil tidings.] This threatening of such a grievous punishment.

They mourned.] Fasted, perhaps, and wept; and hung down their heads with shame and sorrow.

And no man did put on him his ornaments.] But every one laid aside his usual attire, and appeared in the habit of penitents; which, in aftertimes, was sackcloth.

Ver. 5. For the Lord had said unto Moses, Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiff-necked people: I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee.] This verse gives a reason of their mourning, because Moses had by God's order said to them, what God said to him, that they were such a perverse people, it was not safe for them that he should stay among them; and be provoked by their transgressions suddenly to destroy them.

Therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee.] These words shew that he had not peremptorily resolved to forsake them (as he threatened, ver. 3.) but might be moved by their repentance to continue with them. And therefore he orders them to put themselves in a mourning habit, in token of their hearty sorrow for their sin.

That I may know what to do unto thee.] Deal with you according as I find you disposed. (See Gen. xxii. 12.)

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments.] Not only of those wherewith they had decked themselves, at their late festival, but of all other that they ordinarily wore; which they, who were not dressed, forbore to put on, (ver. 4.)

By the Mount Horeb.] Or rather (as the Hebrew word mehar imports) from the mount; that is, a great way off from the place where God appeared; as unworthy to come into his presence.

Ver. 7. And Moses took the tabernacle.] His own tent, as the LXX. interpret it, τὴν σκηνὴν αὐτοῦ: meaning, I suppose, not his own private tent, where he and his family lived; but a public tent, where he gave audience, and heard causes, and inquired of God; which Bonaventura C. Bertramus calls castrorum prætorium, in his book de Repub. Jud. cap. 4. For such a place, we cannot but think there was, before that tabernacle was erected, whose pattern he saw in the mount; where all great affairs were transacted, and where religious offices, in all probability, were performed.

And pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp.] At the distance of two thousand cubits, as R. Solomon interprets it. Which was done to humble them, when they saw the displeasure of God and of his servant against them, declared by this departure far from them: for they might justly fear he would remove quite out of their sight.

And called it the tabernacle of the congregation.] Gave it the same name which was afterward appropriated to the tabernacle built for Divine service alone. Because here God met with Moses, and communicated his mind to him; and hither they were all to resort, who had any business with Moses; or would receive an answer to their inquiries from God.

And it came to pass, that every one which sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp.] This is commonly understood of those who came to desire resolution in any case of difficulty; which they could not have, as formerly, within the camp; but were forced to go and seek it without. Which, as it shewed God's displeasure, so withal gave them some hope of mercy; because it plainly appeared, God was not quite alienated and estranged from them.

Ver. 8. When Moses went into the tabernacle, all the people rose up, and stood every man at his tent-door.] In reverence to him, as their leader, whom they had lately despised. Or, it may be thought also, a posture wherein they implored his intercession for them, that God would be graciously pleased to return to them: which is expressed by what follows.

And looked after Moses.] Expecting what would be the end of this business; both God and his minister being removed from them.

Until he was gone into the tabernacle.] As long as they could see him.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass, as Moses went into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended.] In which the Schechinah, or Divine Majesty, was, (xl. 35.) which was gone up before, because of their idolatry, whereby the camp was become unclean; but now came down again upon the removal of the tabernacle. Where, it is very probable, it used to be settled, as the token of the Divine presence among them: and afterward was translated to the tabernacle, made after God's appointment, where this cloud stood just as it did here, at the door of it, (Numb. xii. 5.)

And stood at the door of the tabernacle.] Openly to assert the authority of Moses, with whom God shewed himself present, though he had forsaken them.

And the Lord talked with Moses.] Which shews the Divine Glory was within the tabernacle, where Moses now was: and so the people understood it, as appears by the next verse.

Ver. 10. And all the people saw the cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle-door.] Which they knew was an evident token that God was there.

And all the people rose up and worshipped, every man in his tent-door.] Bowed themselves unto the Divine Majesty, and humbly deprecated his displeasure; acknowledging, we may reasonably think, his great goodness, in condescending to appear again to them, though at a distance from them.

Ver. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses, face to face.] In a familiar manner, which did not affright or astonish him, by a dreadful appearance of his majesty; which, in the sight of the children of Israel, looked like devouring fire, (xxiv. 17.) but appeared to Moses in a milder and more cheerful brightness. The like expression in Numb. xii. 8. seems to relate only to the discourse he had with Moses, which was clear and plain, and by a voice; not in visions and dreams, and obscure resemblances: and so it may be understood here, as Maimonides takes it, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45.) But Abarbinel thinks that these expressions signify, God treated with Moses in his own person, not by an ambassador; just as one friend converses with another. And this is a common notion among the Jews, that God did not speak to Moses by an angel, but by himself: which they take to be the meaning of this phrase, face to face. Which seems to me rather to import the clearness and evidence of that Divine light, wherein God revealed himself to Moses; whether it was by himself, or an angel, it matters not. Yet the New Testament determines this question, when he tells us, the law itself was given by angels, in the hand of a mediator. And accordingly the old tradition was, that Moses saw things in a clear and bright glass; but the rest of the prophets, in a glass that was dim and cloudy.

As a man speaks to his friend.] This is added, to shew how differently God treated Moses from all other men. For he is said to have talked face to face with all the Israelites, (Deut. v. 4.) but it was out of the midst of the fire, which struck a terror into them: whereas he spake to Moses out of the midst of a glorious but comfortable light, which gave him high satisfaction.

And he turned again into the camp.] After some time spent in conversation with the Divine Majesty, he went to comfort the people, it is likely, with hopes of recovering his favour; of which they might have quite despaired, if he had stayed long from them.

But his servant Joshua, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.] It is hard to tell for what end Joshua should stay behind his master; and it seems not decent that Moses should return alone without his servant to attend him. They that say he stayed to guard the tabernacle, have no foundation for it; and they have not much, who say he stayed to give judgment in small causes, which needed not Moses's resolution, (according to xviii. 26.) For we never read that Joshua was a judge, but a constant attendant upon Moses's person. And therefore the words may better be translated, as they plainly run in the Hebrew, he turned again to the camp, and his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man. At which there is a stop in the Hebrew (over the word naar, young man) to distinguish these from the following words; which are,

Departed not out of the tabernacle.] That is, the Lord departed not from thence, but his presence remained there; and would not come into the camp, as Moses did. And this interpretation is the more likely, because the last words in the Hebrew are, out of the midst of the tabernacle: which cannot refer to Joshua, because he did not go thither; but only Moses, who conversed alone with the Divine Majesty.

Why Joshua is called a young man, when he was near sixty years old, is not easy to resolve. Perhaps it signifies a valiant man, for so he was; or, he had waited on Moses from his youth: or, as Maimonides, this is the phrase of the Hebrew nation, who call all men young, till they begin to decay; as Joseph is called, when he was thirty years old, Gen. xlii. 2. More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 32.

Ver. 12. And Moses said unto the Lord.] When, or where Moses spake what follows, we are not here informed. It is likely, that after he was satisfied the people were very penitent, he returned to the tabernacle; and there made this address unto the Divine Majesty, for a perfect reconciliation with his people.

See.] A word imploring attention and regard to his petition.

Thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people.] Lead them to the land of promise, (xxxii. 34. xxxiii. 1.)

And thou hast not let me know whom thou wilt send with me.] Thou hast only said, thou wilt send an angel before me; but I hope to obtain greater favour from thee, which thou hast not yet declared to me. And I have no heart to proceed, if thou thyself wilt not guide us in the pillar of cloud, as thou hast done hitherto, and dwell among us, as thou hast promised, in thy sanctuary. This seems to be the sense (if this verse be compared with the fifteenth), and not barely that he did not know what angel he would send with him.

Yet thou hast said, I know thee by name.] The Chaldee takes it to be the same with what is said of Bezalcel, whom God called by name, (xxxi. 2.) that is, particularly designed to make the tabernacle, and all belonging to it. But to know is more than to call; signifying God's special love and kindness to Moses above all men, as the LXX. interpret it.

And thou hast also found grace in my sight.] God had often heard his prayers for this people, as he hoped he would do now. For that was the effect of his being an acceptable person unto him; which is the proper signification of this phrase.

Ver. 13. Now therefore I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight.] If I still continue in thy favour.

Shew me now thy way.] The interpretation of Maimonides (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 54.) is too much strained, who thinks he here desires the knowledge of God's attributes, as ver. 18. he desires the sight of his essence. The plain meaning of this prayer is, that God himself would conduct him, and shew him the way wherein he should lead his people unto their rest in the land of Canaan, (xxxii. 34.)

That I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy sight.] That I may be fully assured of thy gracious acceptance of me.

And consider that this nation is thy people.] I do not beg this merely upon my own account, but for those who have been redeemed by thee out of the land of Egypt, and have engaged themselves to be thine by a solemn covenant, (xxiv.) and now return unto thee by repentance, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 14. And he said, My presence shall go with thee.] In the Hebrew, my face, i. e. I myself, as the LXX. translate it: my majesty, as the Chaldee. He promises, that is, to continue with them, as he had done hitherto, and not merely send an angel to accompany them: but to lead and guide them himself, by the pillar of the cloud, and his glorious presence in the tabernacle.

And I will give thee rest.] Some think these words are particularly spoken to Moses; and signify, that God would give him ease in this point, and quiet his spirit (which was now very solicitous about his departure from them) by returning to them. But as the foregoing words are a promise, that he would take the conduct of the people again; so is this, that he would not leave them till he had brought them to their rest.

Ver. 15. And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with us.] Some translate the words, for he (i. e. Moses) had said unto him, i. e. to God, If thy presence, &c. So that these words and the following are the reason of God's answer to him, ver. 14. And if they be not thus taken, one would have expected Moses should rather have given God thanks for his gracious promise, than further pressed him to it. But the seventeenth verse doth not well agree with this; and therefore these words are to be looked on only as part of what Moses said to God after his promise, that his presence should go with him. Which he acknowledged to be the greater favour, because otherwise he had rather never stir from the place where they now were.

Carry us not up hence.] Let us go no further, if thou thyself dost not lead and guide us in our way.

Ver. 16. For wherein shall it be known here, that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight?] How shall all the people round about us be convinced that we are not abandoned by thee in this wilderness?

Is it not in that thou goest with us?] Is not this the great demonstration of it, that thou leadest us in a pillar of cloud and fire, day and night?

So shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.] This will distinguish us, while it continues with us, from all other people whatsoever; none of which have such a token of thy presence with them. The manna, indeed, continued all this time to descend for their sustenance, which was a miraculous food: but it might have been ascribed to other causes, if this glorious token of God's presence had not still appeared among them.

Ver. 17. And the Lord said unto Moses, I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken.] Distinguish you from all other people; not only by leading you in a pillar of cloud and fire, but dwelling among you, as I designed, xxv. 8.

For thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name.] He owns Moses still to be most acceptable and dear to him as he had been, (ver. 12.) and therefore, at his intercession, promises to be perfectly reconciled, and return to his people.

Ver. 18. And he said, I beseech thee.] Having obtained so much favour of God, he presumes to ask something beyond all this, but with all humility.

Shew me thy glory.] In the Hebrew the word is hareni, make me to see thy glory. Where Maimonides takes the word see to signify, apprehend with the understanding, not with the bodily eye, (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 4.) For by glory he there understands (cap. 54.) the Divine essence, which he makes Moses to be desirous to apprehend; which is not likely such a man as he should think possible. For thus he explains himself in his book de Fundamentis Legis, cap. 1. n. 10. "Moses desired to know the truth of the Divine essence, as one man knows another, whose face he beholds, and his image is so engraven in his mind, that he exists there distinguished from all other men: so he begs that the Divine essence might be distinct in his mind from all other essences, till he knew the truth of it, as it is in itself." But he confesses, in another place of that book, (cap. 64.) that by the glory of the Lord, is many times understood a created light or splendour, whereby God miraculously set forth his majesty, (xxiv. 26. and other places.) And I can see no reason why it should not so signify here, and the meaning be, that he desired to see that glorious presence (or face of God, as it is called) which he promised should go with them; not veiled in a cloud, but in its full splendour and majesty. For hearing him speak from the Schechinah, he supposed, perhaps, that God appeared therein, in some visible shape, which he desired to be acquainted withal. To confirm this, it is observable that God himself, in his answer to Moses, calls this glory his face, (ver. 20.) as he had done, ver. 14, 15. And thus R. Jehudah, in the book Cosri, pars iv. sect. 3. (towards the latter end of it) seems to have understood it. (See upon ver. 20.)

Ver. 19. And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee.] Which Maimonides thinks signifies his making Moses to understand the nature of all creatures, and how they are knit and united together, and after what manner they are governed, both in general and particular; because when God had made all his works, he saw that they were very good, (Gen. i. 31.) But that text is a very slender ground for such an interpretation. The LXX. seem to come nearer to the matter, who interpret this passage, παρελεύσομαι πρότερός σου τῇ δόξῃ μου, I will pass before thee with my glory. That is, he promises to give him a transient view of his glory, while it passed by him, (ver. 22.) though it could not be seen in its full majesty. And then the word tobh (which we translate my goodness) must rather be rendered my beauty, it being the same with glory, only a softer word, to express such a degree of its splendour as would not hurt him, but be delightful to him. And thus the word tobh is used in the second chapter of this book, ver. 2. and 1 Sam. ix. 2. Or, if this be not the meaning, all his goodness must signify his gracious intentions concerning the children of Israel, to whom, he assures him, he would fulfil all his promises, which was sufficient for him to know.

And I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee.] The LXX. seem to have understood this right, when they translated it, I will call to thee by my name (saying), The Lord is before thee. That is, lest, when I pass by thee, thou shouldest not observe it, I will admonish thee, by a voice calling to thee, and telling thee, that now the Lord is presenting himself to thee. And so we find he did, xxxiv. 6.

And will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy.] This is the substance of the words, which he tells him he would proclaim, after notice given him of his coming to pass by him. And their meaning is, that he would dispense his favours, according to his own good pleasure, as he did now to Moses; unto whom he vouchsafed such a revelation of himself, as he did not make to others. For thus he explains it, xxxiv. 6, 7. where he tells him, he would be very gracious, patient, and long-suffering, unto some; but punish severely the iniquity of others.

Ver. 20. And he said, Thou canst not see my face.] But as for thy request, that I would make thee see my glory in its full splendour, thou art not capable of it. I know none that hath explained this whole matter better than R. Jehudah, in Sepher Cosri, par. iv. sect. 3. "For the glory mentioned in Scripture, there is one of such a nature, that the eyes of the prophets could sustain it; another all the Israelites saw (as the cloud and the consuming fire); but another so pure and bright to such a high degree, that no prophet is able to apprehend it: but if he venture to look upon it, his composition is dissolved, i. e. he dies." Such was the glory here spoken of, a splendour so great and piercing, that none could behold it.

For there shall no man see me, and live.] Accordingly we find, when the Schechinah, or Divine Glory, filled the tabernacle, Moses was not able to enter into it, (xl. 35.) that is, he could not, with safety to his life, look upon it. And so it was after the temple of Solomon was built and consecrated by solemn prayer to God, "The glory of the Lord filled the house, and the priests could not enter into the house, because the glory of the Lord had filled the Lord's house," (2 Chron. vii. 1, 2.)

From this speech to Moses, it is likely that men, in future times, imagined they should die immediately, when they saw only an angel appear in such a high glittering manner that it amazed them.

Ver. 21. And the Lord said, Behold, there is a place by me.] It doth not plainly appear by the story, from whence God now spake to Moses. It is most likely from the mount, where he had long conversed with him. Or, if it was from the tabernacle, (where his glory appeared, ver. 9. and continued, ver. 11.) that was not far from the mount; where he tells him, he would make his glory pass before him.

And thou shalt stand upon a rock.] It is probable, this was the rock in Horeb, where the Lord had formerly appeared to Moses, (xvii. 6.)

Ver. 22. And it shall come to pass, that while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock.] Perhaps it was in one of the clefts which was made in the rock, when God brought water out of it, (Psal. lxxviii. 15.) into which he directed Moses. For that is meant by putting him in the cleft; shewing him the place where he should be, while the Divine Majesty passed by.

And I will cover thee with my hand, &c.] That he might not be hurt by the splendour of that glory, as it passed by the cleft. This doth not certainly signify, that the glory of the Lord appeared in a human shape: for hands are ascribed to God (in accommodation to us) when nothing is meant but this invisible power: which now, perhaps, cast a cloud about him, that he might not be struck dead by the inconceivable brightness and force of those rays which came from the face of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 23. And I will take away mine hand.] As soon as the face (as it is called, ver. 20.) of the Divine Majesty was gone by him (which it was impossible for him to behold, and live), he promises to remove that cloud which covered him: so that he should look upon the hinder parts of his glory, though not upon the face.

And thou shalt see my back parts.] In which the glory of the Divine Majesty shone in a lower degree of light; which was not so piercing, as to put out the eyes, and take away the life of the beholders: and yet there was such a resplendent brightness in it, that Moses's face shone when he came down from the sight of it, (xxxiv. 29.) For that lustre in his countenance is to be ascribed, in all probability, to that sight which he had of the Divine Majesty at that time. Some little particles of light remaining upon his face, and sticking to it (if I may so speak) from that exceeding great splendour which shone upon him, and passed before him, as he lay in the hollow place of the rock.

But my face shall not be seen.] My glory in its full lustre, without any veil before it, cannot be seen. (See ver. 20.) There are many other interpretations of this verse, as well as of the 18th and 19th Maimonides, in his book de Fundam. Legis, cap. 1. n. 11. takes it thus: "God revealed that to Moses, which no man, either before or after him, ever knew: he making him to apprehend something of his very essence, whereby God was separated in his mind, from all other beings; as a man discerns another man, when he sees his back parts, and by his mind discerns his proportions distinct from all other men." But in his More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 21. he takes this discovery to Moses, to be the knowledge God gave him of his works and attributes, viz. those mentioned xxxiv. 6. And thus Gregor. Nazianzen. (Orat. xxxiv. p. 559.) expounds it, ταῦτα γὰρ τοῦ Θεοῦ τὰ ὀπίσθια ὅσα μετ' ἐκείνον, &c. Those things are the back parts of God which are after him; whereby he is known as the sun is by its image in the water, &c. upon which Elias Cretensis hath this ingenious gloss, "That the face of God signifies his essence before the beginning of the world: and his hinder parts, his creation and providence in the government of the world." But Maimonides, in the same place now mentioned, acknowledges also, that this may be interpreted according to the Targum; that God made his majesty, that is, an exceeding bright representation of himself (though not in its fullest glory) to pass before him. Which Onkelos sometimes calls Jekara, Glory; sometimes Memra, the Word; and sometimes Schechinah, the Majesty. Which seems to be the most literal meaning; that God himself, particularly the eternal Word, in a visible glory or majesty, appeared unto him in so much splendour, as human nature was able to bear; but not in his unveiled brightness, which is, as the apostle speaks, inaccessible.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Moses.] Having obtained a promise of a pardon for the people, and of greater favour to himself, than had been hitherto shewn him; God directs him here to dispose things for the performance of both.

Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first: and I will write upon these tables the words that were in the first tables, which thou breakest.] Every attentive reader must needs observe the difference between the first tables, which Moses brake, and those which he is now ordered to prepare. For God did not only write his laws with his own finger upon the first tables, but the tables themselves also were the work of God, (xxxii. 16.) Whereas in these, as Greg. Nyssen well expresses it, (de Vita Mosis, p. 183.) ἡ γραφὴ μὲν ἐκ θείας δυνάμεως ἦν. ἡ δὲ ὕλη, διὰ τῆς Μωϋσέως ἐξησκήθη χειρός: the writing, indeed, was by the Divine power, but the matter of them framed by the hand of Moses. So that, at the same time God shewed he was reconciled, he put them in mind that he had been offended; and restored them to his favour with some abatement.

Ver. 2. And be ready in the morning.] On the eighteenth day of July. (See xxxii. 30.)

And come up in the morning unto Mount Sinai.] From whence God spake to the Israelites (Deut. v. 4, &c.) those very words which he intended to write upon the tables. He orders him to come up in the morning, that all the people might see him ascend, and carry the tables with him.

And present thyself there to me, in the top of the mount.] Where the Divine Majesty appeared before in its glory; and where Moses stayed with him forty days and forty nights, (xix. 26. xxiv. 17, 18.)

Ver. 3. And no man shall come up with thee.] The same precept is renewed, which was given at his first ascent, (xxiv. 1, 2.)

Neither let any man be seen throughout the mount.] See xix. 12. 21, &c.

Neither let the flocks nor herds feed before the mount.] He seems to require their removal to such a distance, that they should not be within view of the Divine Majesty. By which means the people were naturally led to stand in greater awe of God, and there was the less danger of any beasts touching the mount, (xix. 13.)

Ver. 4. And Moses hewed two tables of stone, &c.] These and the following words only declare that he did as God bade him, (ver. 1, 2.)

And took in his hand the two tables of stone.] These he carried with him; but the first tables were given him when he came there, (xxiv. 12.) They seem to have been thin, being no heavier than that he could carry them in one hand.

Ver. 5. And the Lord.] The Schechinah, or Divine Majesty; called also the glory of the Lord.

Descended in the cloud.] Wherein it had been wont to appear from the beginning of their deliverance out of Egypt; and had lately appeared to Moses in the tabernacle, (xxxiii. 9.) when the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door of it, while the Lord talked with Moses there. And it seems, when that was done, the glory of the Lord in the cloud went up again towards heaven, and now came down upon this occasion.

And stood with him there.] The cloudy pillar, wherein the glory of the Lord was, rested upon the top of the mount where Moses now was, (ver. 2.)

And proclaimed the name of the Lord.] Gave him notice of his presence, as he had promised, (xxxiii. 19.) and is more fully expressed in the next verse.

Ver. 6. And the Lord passed by before him.] Which Onkelos translates, the Lord made his majesty to pass before him. Which exposition Maimonides acknowledges to be right; and confirmed by the Scripture itself, when it saith, (xxxiii. 22.) While my glory passeth by, &c. which he confesses signifies not the Divine essence itself; but some created splendour, which no eye was able to behold, (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 21.)

And proclaimed.] As the glory of the Lord passed by, he heard a voice proclaiming this description of the Divine nature.

The Lord.] Some join the next word to this, as if the voice said, The Lord, the Lord; the more to awaken his attention, to mind what he heard. (See xxxiii. 19.) And this name of his signifies his self-existence, and his absolute dominion over all creatures, which received their being from him. (See vi. 3.)

God.] The Hebrew word el signifies strong and mighty; in one word, his irresistible power, (Job ix. 4.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Merciful.] The word rachum signifies that which we call tender mercies; such as parents have to their children, when their bowels yearn towards them.

And gracious.] We call that chaninah (grace or favour), saith Maimonides, which we bestow upon any man to whom we owe nothing, (Gen. xxxiii. 5. 11.) And therefore God is here called chanum (gracious), with respect to those whom he created, preserves, and governs, but is not obliged by any right to these things; as his words are, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 45.

Long-suffering.] So slow to anger, that he doth not presently punish those that offend him, but bears long with them.

Abundant in goodness.] The Hebrew word chesed, which we translate goodness, signifies, as Maimonides saith, (More Nevoch. par. iii.) the excess and highest degree of any thing whatsoever it be; but especially, the greatest benignity. And therefore, with the addition of rabh (abundant), denotes long-continued kindness; as is more fully declared in the next verse.

And truth.] Most faithful and constant to his promises; which he steadfastly keeps throughout all generations. The word abundant refers both to this and to his benignity, (Psal. cxlvi. 6.)

Ver. 7. Keeping mercy for thousands.] The same word chesed, which before we translated goodness, we here translate mercy: and the Hebrews observing the letter nun to be greater in the word notzer (keeping) than is usual, fancy that it denotes the immense treasures of the Divine bounty. But the word thousands fully explains how abundant his mercy is.

Forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin.] Here are three words, to signify all sorts of offences, which he passes by, till men grow intolerably wicked. But some distinguish them by making iniquity signify offences against men; and transgressions, offences against God himself; and sin, all the errors, childishnesses, and follies, which men are guilty of, in the conduct of themselves. But they may as well signify the offences which were committed against the moral, ceremonial, and political laws.

And that will by no means clear the guilty.] These words, according to Maimonides, belong still to the loving-kindness of God, as all the foregoing do; signifying, that when he doth punish, he will not utterly destroy and make desolate. For so the Hebrew words, nakkeh lo jenakkeh, he thinks, are to be literally rendered, in extirpating he will not extirpate; as the word nakah he observes is used, Isaiah iii. 26. "She shall sit desolate on the earth." And to the same sense these words are expounded by many modern interpreters; particularly Lud. de Dieu: When he empties, he will not empty; or make quite desolate. For the maxim of the Hebrew is, (as Maimonides there observes, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 54.) that the property of goodness far excels that of severity. For here being thirteen properties of God mentioned (I can find but ten, besides the name of the Lord), there is but one of them that belongs to the latter (viz. that which follows), all the rest belong to the former. And, indeed, we find that Moses urges these very words, among other, why God should not destroy the Israelites as one man, (Numb. xiv. 18.) which had been very improper, if God would by no means clear the guilty.

Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children.] This is meant, saith the same Maimonides, only of the sin of idolatry; unto which God threatens, in the second commandment, this punishment to the third and fourth generation, upon those that hate him. For no man is called a hater of God, but only an idolater; according to what we read, Deut. xii. 31. "Every abomination which the Lord hateth," &c.

Unto the third and fourth generation.] He mentions, saith the same author, none beyond these; because the utmost that any man can live to see of his seed, is the fourth generation. And therefore, when an idolatrous city was destroyed, the old idolater, with children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, were all cut off; according to the precept, (Deut. xiii. 15.) "Destroy it utterly, and all that is therein."

The sense of the whole seems to be, that this is the glory of the Divine Majesty: that he hath a sovereign dominion over all, because he is the fountain of being, the original of all things; most powerful to do what he pleases; and so merciful, that he delights to bestow his benefits unasked; and so gracious, as to continue them to the unthankful: bearing long with them, when they provoke him; multiplying favours on those who have no deserts; and faithfully performing his promises, though never so great; doing good unto a thousand generations of those who adhere faithfully to him, and do not apostatize from him: for he pardons innumerable offences, of all sorts, that are committed against his laws; and when the provocations are so great, that they are fit to be punished, he proceeds not to the utmost extremity till there be no remedy; then he punishes idolaters terribly, to the third and fourth generations.

Ver. 8. And Moses made haste, and bowed his head towards the earth, and worshipped.] Being transported with joy at so glorious a sight, and such gracious words, he immediately worshipped God with the humblest reverence, acknowledging his great condescension to him.

Ver. 9. And he said.] Which encouraged him to renew his request to God.

If now I have found grace in thy sight, O Lord.] He doth not doubt of it; but the meaning rather is, since I have found grace, &c. as appears from what he granted him, (xxxiii. 17, 18, &c.)

Let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us.] Upon the mention of the last property of the Divine Majesty, [visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, &c.] Moses seems to have been afraid he might be provoked to proceed to such severity with the Israelites, who had lately apostatized from him: and again beseeches him he would be so gracious, though they should again offend him, as to continue his presence among them, which he had threatened to withdraw, (xxxiii. 3.)

For it is a stiff-necked people.] If we adhere to this translation, the meaning is, they needed such a governor, by whose authority and presence they might be kept in awe, and cured of their perverseness. But the particle ki, which we here translate for, often signifies though: and may be very fitly so rendered here: and then the meaning is, Though they be very refractory, (xxxii. 9.) yet do not forsake them, and leave them to themselves; but still conduct them as thou hast done.

And pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for thine inheritance.] Since thou art so ready to forgive, (ver. 7.) do not cut us off for our late offences; but still continue to own us for thy peculiar people. This Moses had begged of God before, and obtained a promise of it, (xxxiii. 16, 17. and see xix. 5.) and now he beseeches him, out of his goodness which he had proclaimed, to confirm that promise, and not to revoke it upon every new provocation.

Ver. 10. And he said, Behold, I make a covenant.] Herein God verified the truth of what he had proclaimed; being so merciful and gracious, as not only to confirm his promise, but to turn it into a covenant, like that at the giving of his laws from Mount Sinai, (xxiv. 3. 7, &c.) which he renews with them in the next verse: where he engages to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan before them; and then requires them to take care not to imitate their idolatry.

Before all thy people will I do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth, &c.] This seems to relate to all the wonderful works he intended to do, in their introduction into the land of Canaan, by making the waters of Jordan retire, and the walls of Jericho fall down; with the rest that followed, till they got possession of their inheritance.

For it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee.] Such as shall declare the almighty power of the Divine Majesty; and strike a terror into all those that oppose him, but demonstrate (in an astonishing manner) his fidelity to his people. For all this is said to confirm their belief of the covenant he said he would make with them, in the beginning of the verse.

Ver. 11. Observe thou that which I command thee this day.] Doubt not of what I say; but only mark, and take care to do all that I now enjoin thee.

Behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite and the Canaanite, &c.] To encourage them so to do, he premises what he intended to do for them; which he put at the conclusion of his covenant, when he first declared it, (xxiii. 23. 28.) but here puts it in the front of it, that they might be the more sensible of the reasonableness of those commands to which he expected obedience.

Ver. 12. Take heed to thyself.] He now renewing that covenant with them, which they had broken by the worshipping the golden calf, repeats the principal precepts which concerned his worship and service (which had been delivered to them before), and excites them to the observance of them, by the addition of a very gracious promise, (ver. 24.)

Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest.] Nothing could be more reasonable than this, that they should not enter into friendship with those nations, whom he commanded them to expel, for their abominable wickedness; unless they would renounce their idolatry, and come under their government. (See xxiii. 32. and Mr. Selden, lib. vi. de Jure N. et G. in the latter end of the thirteenth chapter and beginning of the next.)

Lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee.] Lest they inveigle thee to imitate their manners.

Ver. 13. But ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves.] This more largely explains what was briefly and summarily delivered in xxiii. 32. "Thou shalt not make a covenant with their gods." And, ver. 24. "Thou shalt quite break down their images." Which images and altars were usually set in groves, as sacred places; being the temples of their gods. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 24.) For when Tacitus saith (Lib. de Moribus Germanorum), that the old Germans went to war as if God commanded them, whom they believed to be present with them; he tells us, "Effigiesque et signa quædam detracta lucis ad prœlium ferunt," they carried with them into the battle certain images and signs, which they took out of their groves. These, in all probability, were the images of their gods, who they thought fought for them, as Joh. Filesacus conjectures, (lib. ii. Selectorum, cap. 5. de Ceremoniis, sect. 7.) where he observes, that these groves were impure places, not only because there were the images and altars of their false gods; but all manner of filthiness and lewdness was committed under those shades. Which made Horace call them, parum castos lucos, (lib. i. in the latter end of the twelfth Ode.)

Some of the Hebrews restrained this precept only to the land of Canaan: where they were bound to destroy all things belonging to the religion of those idolatrous people, in whose place they were planted, that they might not be infected with their impiety. (See Deut. xii. 2, 3.) But in other countries which they conquered, they fancied they were not bound to root it out. Yet afterward they saw it necessary to extend this precept to all idolatrous countries which came under their power, where they destroyed their idols, as they had done in Canaan: lest by imitation παρατροπή τις τῶν κατὰ τὴν πολιτείαν ἔσοιτο, their polity should have been quite subverted, as Josephus speaks. (See Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 2.)

Ver. 14. For thou shalt worship no other god.] This being the great principle of their religion, "the Lord thy God is one Lord," (Deut. vi. 4.) and there is no other God beside him.

For the Lord, whose name is Jealous.] So he calls himself, xx 5. and gave himself this peculiar name, because he could not bear any other god to be rival with him, after the manner of the gentiles: whose gods suffered a number of other gods to share in the worship that was given to them, by offering sacrifices, and burning incense, and bowing down to them.

Is a jealous God.] As is his name, so is he himself: he will not endure any other to be worshipped with him.

Ver. 15. Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land.] That is, a covenant of marriage, (for covenants in general were forbidden before, ver. 12.) which he commands them not to contract with the inhabitants of Canaan: no, nor with any idolaters whatsoever. For though some of the Jews would restrain this to the seven nations only, yet the generality of them resolve it is meant of all other idolatrous people. And there is an illustrious argument of it, in the ninth and tenth chapters of Ezra, and in Nehemiah, xiii. 25. This they will have to have been as old as the law of circumcision; which they gather from Gen. xxxiv. 14. and it held throughout all following ages; insomuch that Mahomet forbids any of his religion to marry any one that is not made a Mussulman, i. e. a believer of his doctrine. As for such as turned from idolatry, it was always lawful to marry them; but they were so far from having to do with others, that the Talmudists held it as unlawful to lie with a gentile woman, as with a woman in her uncleanness. Whence that character which Tacitus gives of the Jews, "Projectissima ad libidinem gens, alienarum concubitu abstinet." (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 12.)

And they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice to their gods.] Of which there was very great danger if they loved their wives; who would have great power over them (as appears by Solomon, 1 Kings xi. 2, 3, &c.) to entice them to their religion. Of this phrase, going a whoring after their gods, see Seld. Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 23.

And one call thee.] Invite thee (as the manner was) to the feast that was usually made, upon the sacrifices offered to their gods: as the Israelites ate of the peace-offerings, and invited their friends to partake with them.

And thou eat of his sacrifice.] By this we see how ancient and universal the custom was of feasting upon sacrifices: which Mr. Mede truly calls epulæ fœderales, federal feasts, (upon Malachi ii.) For the meat was God's, being set upon his table; of which he inviting the offerers to partake, they were his guests; whom he entertained at his table, in token of reconciliation and friendship with him. And therefore, whosoever ate of the sacrifices offered to other gods, professed themselves to be their worshippers and servants. Which made the Jews so cautious in this matter, that they would not so much as drink the wine, or the water, or use the salt of an idolater, not knowing but it might have been set before an idol. So R. Levi Barzelonita, in the explication of the 112th Precept. This explains that discourse of the apostle, 1 Cor. x. 20.

Ver. 16. And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, &c.] If they themselves married idolaters, there was the greater danger they might be content to let their sons and daughters marry with them; especially if they were rich or beautiful: and so the whole family be undone.

Ver. 17. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.] Images are called by the name of gods, because they were worshipped together with them, as symbols of their presence. And though molten be here only mentioned, (upon occasion of their late sin, in worshipping the molten calf, xxxii. 4.) yet all other images are intended, as appears by xx. 4. 23.

Ver. 18. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep, &c.] See all this explained, xii. 15, 16, &c. xiii. 6, 7. xxiii. 15.

As I commanded thee in the time of the month Abib, &c.] See xiii. 4. xxiii. 15.

Ver. 19. All that openeth the matrix is mine, &c.] See xiii. 12. xxii. 29, 30.

Ver. 20. But the first-born of an ass shalt thou redeem, &c.] See xiii. 13.

And none shall appear before me empty.] See xxiii. 15.

Ver. 21. Six days shalt thou work, &c.] See xx. 9. xxiii. 12. xxxi. 15. where this is sufficiently explained. But here, to shew the necessity of forbearing labour on this day, they are not permitted it in earing or in harvest: that is, in the two most busy times of the year; when they ploughed and sowed their ground, and when they reaped the fruits thereof. (See Gen. xlv. 6.)

Ver. 22. And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, &c.] This verse also hath been explained before, xxiii. 16. Only here observe, that the first-fruits of wheat-harvest being now offered at this feast, there was a harvest before this, which began at the Passover, when they offered the first-fruits of barley-harvest, (Deut. xvi. 9.)

Ver. 23. Three times in the year shall all your males appear before the Lord, the God of Israel.] This likewise was explained, xxiii. 14. 17. And nothing need be added, but that these peculiar laws are here repeated (together with those that follow, ver. 25, 26.) upon this occasion, because they were ordained to preserve the people in the worship and service of the true God, from whom they had lately departed. Who therefore puts them in mind, in the last words of this verse (which was not said before), that he was the God of Israel, to whom they were devoted by especial obligations.

Ver. 24. For I will cast out the nations before thee.] Till this was done, they were not bound to observe the precept, of appearing three times in the year before the Lord.

And will enlarge thy borders.] Beyond the land of Canaan, as he had promised before, (xxiii. 31.)

Neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord, &c.] To remove all fear out of their mind, that their neighbours might invade them, when all the men were gone, and none but women, and children, and old men left at home, he adds this promise to all he had made before (or rather makes it a part of his covenant, which he now renews), that he would lay such restraints upon their enemies, that they should not so much as think of invading them at those three feasts; much less make any actual incursions into their country.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice, &c.] At the Passover. See this fully explained, xxiii. 18.

Ver. 26. The first of the first-fruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the Lord thy God.] At Pentecost, which was the feast of the first-fruits. (See xxiii. 19.)

Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.] This concerns the other great feast, that of tabernacles. (See in the same place.)

Ver. 27. And the Lord said unto Moses.] Having recited the principal part of his covenant, mentioned ver. 10. he gives the following order.

Write thou these words.] From ver. 11 to this place: just as he did those words contained in the twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third chapters of this book, (see xxiv. 4.) out of which these words are extracted, as the chief things respecting the worship of God; which he requires him to write in a book by itself.

For after the tenor of these words have I made a covenant with thee, and with Israel.] See xxiv. 7. where the covenant, containing these words and many other, was sealed with the blood of a sacrifice.

The Jews are so blind as to found their oral tradition upon this place, and upon one small word (pi), which signifies, indeed, mouth; but withal is an expletive particle, denoting the manner and value of any thing, as appears from Gen. xliii. 7. Lev. xxvii. 18. and, therefore, here rightly translated the tenor of these words. Yet R. Johannes, in the very beginning of Halicoth Olam, gathers from hence, that God made a covenant now with their fathers, concerning all the unwritten laws delivered by word of mouth. Unto which, while they adhere, they can never understand their Divine writings: for what can be more plain that the covenant here mentioned was ordered to be written?

Ver. 28. And he was there with the Lord.] This, saith Maimonides, was the highest degree of prophecy, which none attained but Moses: whose thoughts were wholly taken off from all other things, and fixed upon God, while he was with him in the holy mount; that is, asked and received answers from the Lord: (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51.)

Forty days and forty nights.] As he had been at the first, (xxiv. 18.) Which was partly to make a new trial, how they would behave themselves in his absence; and partly to give the greater authority to the laws, he brought them from God, which he renewed, as we read in the end of this verse.

And did neither eat bread, nor drink water.] But was supported by influences from the Almighty, who kept up his spirits in their just height, without the common recruits of meat and drink: which, when they give us refreshment, likewise make us drowsy, (see xxiv. 18.) To which add what Maimonides saith in the place now named, that the joy wherewith he was transported made him not think of eating and drinking; for his intellectual faculties were so strong, that all corporeal desire ceased.

It seems to me very probable, that, during this time, he saw again the model of the tabernacle and all its furniture, with every thing else he was ordered to make when he went first into the mount, from the beginning of the twenty-fifth to the end of the thirtieth chapter, which are briefly summed up xxxi. 7—11. He seems also to have spent much of this time in prayer to God for the people, that he would restore them entirely to his favour, and bring them to their inheritance, (Deut. ix. 18, 19. 25, 26. x. 10.)

And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, &c.] That is, the Lord wrote, (as he said he would, ver. 1.) not Moses; who wrote the foregoing words in a book; but not these, which were written by the finger of God in the tables of stone. So Moses tells us expressly, Deut. x. 4. Jacobus Capellus, and others, following the Hebrew doctors, imagine that Moses was three times with God in the mount, for the space of forty days; and that this was the last time. Between which and the first they place another, which they fancy is mentioned, xxxii. 30, 31. compared with Deut. ix. 18, &c. But I see no solid ground for this; for God called him up into the mount but twice; and he durst not have adventured to go so near him, as he was both these times, without his invitation.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, when Moses came down from Mount Sinai.] Which was upon the twenty-fifth of our August, according to the former computation, (ver. 2.)

With the two tables of testimony in Moses's hand, when he came down from the mount.] So he came down at the first, (xxxii. 15.)

That Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone.] There was a radiant splendour in his countenance; which is the import of the Hebrew karan, which the Vulgar translates horned. Not imagining that Moses had horns, but rays of light which imitated horns. And therefore the Hebrew word karnaim signifies both; and R. Solomon Jarchi upon this place calls these rays on Moses's face, horns of magnificence; as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 6. p. 292.) It is not improbable that the hair of his head was interspersed with light, as well as that rays came from his face; which perstringed the eyes of beholders. And painters had done more reasonable, if, instead of horns upon Moses's forehead, they had represented him with a glory crowning his head, as the saints are usually painted in the Roman church. Which perhaps came from the ancient custom among the heathen, who thus represented their gods, as Tho. Bartholinus observes (de Morbis Biblicis, cap. v.) out of Lucian de Dea Syria, where he saith she did ἐπὶ τῇ κεφαλῇ ἀκτῖνας φορέειν, carry beams upon her head. Whence it was that the Roman emperors, who were raised so much above the rest of mankind, that they honoured them as a sort of deities, were thus represented; as appears by many testimonies, particularly Pliny, who, in his panegyric to Trajan, laughs and jeers at the radiatum Domitiani caput.

While he talked with them.] While he conversed so familiarly with the Divine Majesty, and both saw his glory and heard him proclaim his name, (ver. 5—7.) At his first being in the mount, there was no such brightness left upon his countenance; for he did not see the Divine Majesty in so great a splendour as he did now, when the Lord, upon his petition, vouchsafed him such a sight of his glory as he could bear, (xxxiii. 18. 23.) which was so exceeding piercing, that it altered the very skin of Moses's face, and made it luminous: of which Moses doth not seem to have been sensible, till some time after he came down from the mount (when Aaron, as well as others, were afraid to come nigh him), having his thoughts wholly possessed with the far more transcendent glory of the Divine Majesty, of which he had a glimpse.

From this familiar conference which Moses had with God, it is likely the heathen took occasion to invent the like stories of their Zamolxis, who pretended to receive his laws from Vesta; and Minos and Lycurgus, who said they received theirs from Jupiter and Apollo; with several others mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, lib. i. who then adds, Moses had his from the god Jao; so they pronounced the name Jehovah. But they had no such testimony as this of their communication with the Divine Majesty; much less were their laws confirmed by such miracles, as lasted for the space of forty years under the conduct of Moses, in the sight of all people.

Ver. 30. And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone.] This highly established his authority, and bred in them a reverence to the laws he brought, that they were all witnesses of the brightness or glory of his countenance, (as the apostle calls it, 2 Cor. iii. 7.) which demonstrated he had been with God, as he affirmed, and had beheld the glory of his majesty, and received from him the tables of testimony. By all the children of Israel, in this verse, seems to be meant all the rulers of the congregation mentioned in the next.

And they were afraid to come nigh him.] The light which shone from his countenance was so great, that it dazzled the eyes of beholders, even of Aaron himself, who did not know whether it would be safe to approach him. This was an illustrious testimony that he had been with God, who dwells, as the apostle speaks, in light inaccessible.

Ver. 31. And Moses called unto them.] Invited them to come near him, and not to fear any hurt.

And Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him.] viz. After he had put a veil upon his face, till which they could not steadfastly look upon it, (as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. iii. 7.) the light of it being so strong, that it hurt their eyes, if they fixed them there.

And Moses talked with them.] Acquainted them with what he had seen and heard.

Ver. 32. And afterward all the children of Israel came nigh, &c.] There was a general assembly of all the tribes summoned, that he might deliver to them all that which he had received from God. (See xxxv. 1.)

And he gave them in commandment all that the Lord had spoken with him in Mount Sinai.] All the orders he had given about the building of the tabernacle, and the rest contained in the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth chapters, and those that follow to the thirty-second. For at his first coming from the mount, finding them in an apostacy from God, he said nothing to them about these matters; but, in abhorrence of their foul idolatry, broke the tables of testimony which God had given him to deliver to them.

Ver. 33. And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face.] This seems to belong as well to ver. 31. as to the 32d, and accordingly I have interpreted it. Though there are those who think he persuaded Aaron and the rulers to approach without a veil; but put it on when he spake to the people, who were less able to bear it. But there seems to be the same reason for both; Aaron being no less afraid than any of them: and the majesty of his countenance appeared sufficiently, even when it was veiled; for the brightness was not quite obscured, though very much shaded by it.

Ver. 34. But when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with him, he took the veil off till he came out.] He went into the tabernacle, where he spake with him, face to face, as a man speaks to his friend, (xxxiii. 9—11.)

And he came out, and spake unto the children of Israel that which he was commanded.] This seems to relate unto the frequent occasions Moses had to go and consult with God in difficult cases, whose mind he declared to them when he had received it.

Ver. 35. And the children of Israel saw the face of Moses, that the skin of Moses's face shone, &c.] Some great men have thought that the brightness continued on Moses's face till his death; so that he spake to them with a veil on his face, from this time, as long as he lived: of which we cannot be certain; though thus much is evident, from this and the foregoing verse, that the splendour of his countenance did remain for some time after he came down from God's presence in the mount; during which, as oft as he went in to speak with God, he took off his veil, and when he came out to speak with them, he put it on, until he went in to speak with God again, as this verse concludes. How long it was before it vanished none can resolve: perhaps not till he had set up the tabernacle, and consecrated Aaron and his sons, and delivered all the laws he had received about the service of God, which are recorded in the book of Leviticus: that is, all the time they stayed near Mount Sinai; from whence they removed a little more than half a year after this, (Numb. x. 11, 12.)

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1. AND Moses gathered all the congregation of the children of Israel together.] Having told them what orders he had received from the Lord, and sufficiently convinced them of his authority, (xxxiv. 32, 33.) he now proceeds to put them in execution. And in order to it, he gathered col-hadath, all the congregation: which sometimes signifies all the elders and judges, &c. (the prime governors of the people) and sometimes the whole body of the people, as Corn. Bon. Bertram observes, de Repub. Jud. cap. 6. It seems here to be used in the first sense; for he could not speak these words to the whole body of the people, but to the principal persons of the several tribes, by whom what he said was communicated to all Israel.

These are the words which the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them.] Before they entered upon the work, he admonishes them that none of it must be done upon the sabbath.

Ver. 2. Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you a holy sabbath, &c.] This commandment was particularly repeated to Moses, at the end of all the directions about the building of the tabernacle, (see xxxi. 13—15.) and now repeated to them (as it was at his late renewing his covenant with them, xxxiv. 21.) that they might not imagine any of the work here commanded to be done about the tabernacle, &c. would license them to break the sabbath. The observation of which being the great preservative of religion, that is the reason it is so often enjoined, and particular care taken to secure it. And it is not to be omitted, that (to shew of what great concern it is) he calls it here, as he did xxxi. 15. where the end and use of it is set down, the sabbath of sabbaths, that is, the great sabbath or rest.

Ver. 3. Ye shall kindle no fire in your habitations upon the sabbath-day.] To dress their meat, or for any other work: otherwise they might kindle a fire to warm themselves in cold weather. This is sufficiently comprehended under the general command, thou shalt not do any work, (xx. 10.) Therefore the meaning is, Thou shalt not so much as kindle a fire for any such purpose. For that is the rule they give in Halicoth Olam, cap. 2. that such particular prohibitions forbid the whole kind, i. e. all manner of work whatsoever; which is here mentioned, to shew they might not kindle a fire for this work of the tabernacle.

Ver. 4. And spake unto all the congregation, &c.] See ver. 1.

This is the thing which the Lord commanded.] Having secured the observation of the sabbath, according to the direction given just before he came down from the mount the first time, (xxxi. 13—15.) he now relates to them what commands he received from God, concerning all that follows.

Ver. 5. Take ye from amongst you an offering unto the Lord.] And first he makes a motion to them from the Lord, that they would make a free oblation of materials for the building of the tabernacle, and all other things which the Lord commanded to be made, (ver. 10, &c.)

Take ye, is as much as bring ye, and so we translate it xxv. 2. (See there.) Where it appears that this was the very first thing God said to him (concerning a voluntary offering, which was the foundation of all the rest), and therefore is first propounded to the people by him.

Whosoever is of a willing heart, &c.] See xxv. 2.

Ver. 6—9.] All these have been explained in the twenty-fifth chapter, ver. 3—5, &c.

Ver. 10. Every wise-hearted among you shall come, and make all that the Lord hath commanded.] Every skilful person in the art of making the things following. The same is said of the women, ver. 25. The Hebrew word cochmah, which we translate wisdom, is used variously, as Maimonides observes; sometimes for the understanding of Divine things; sometimes for moral virtue; and sometimes for skill in any art (of which he alleges this place as an instance), and sometimes for craft and subtlety. (See More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 54.) The word leb (or heart) is used here according to the vulgar opinion of those days, that the heart is the seat of the understanding. And thus I observed before upon chap. xxv. that excellent artists are by the heathen called wise men. Since which I have observed, that this is the language of Homer himself; whose verses concerning Margites are quoted by Aristotle in more places than one, (lib. vi. Moral. ad Nichomach. cap. 7. et lib. v. Moral. ad Eudemum, cap. 7.) where he saith he was so foolish, that

Τὸν δ' οὔτ' ἄρ σκαπτῆρα θεοὶ θέσαν οὔτ' ἀροτῆρα
Οὔτ' ἄλλως τι σοφόν.

The gods neither made him a ditcher, nor a ploughman, nor any other sort of wise man. Upon which Aristotle notes, τὴν δὲ σοφίαν ἐν ταῖς τέχναις, τοῖς ἀκριβεστάτοις τὰς τέχνας ἀποδίδομεν, We ascribe wisdom in arts to those who excel in them; and then he instances in Phidias a stone-cutter, and Polycletus a statuary.

Ver. 11. The tabernacle.] This signifies sometimes the whole structure of the house of God; but here only the fine inward curtains, mentioned xxvi. 1, 2, &c.

His tent.] This signifies the curtains of goats' hair; which were laid over the other, (xxvi. 7, &c.)

His covering.] Of rams' skins and badgers' skins; which were thrown over the other two, (xxvi. 14.)

His taches, and his boards, his bars, his pillars, and his sockets.] All these are explained in that chapter.

Ver. 12. The ark and his staves, with the mercy-seat.] See xxv. 10. 13. 17.

And the veil of the covering.] Whereby the holy was separated from the most holy place. Which is here fitly mentioned between the mercy-seat, which was within; and the table, &c. which were without this veil.

Ver. 13. The table, and his staves, and all his vessels.] See all these explained, xxv. 23, 24, &c.

And the shew-bread.] This is a short expression, one word (as is usual) being cut off, viz. the dishes, in which the shew-bread was set. For Moses had not order to make the bread itself, but the dishes (as I said) on which the loaves were laid, (xxv. 29.)

Ver. 14. The candlestick also for the light, and his furniture, and his lamps.] See xxvi. 31, 32, &c.

With the oil for the light.] See xxvii. 20, 21.

Ver. 15. And the incense-altar, and the staves.] See xxxi. 1, 2, &c.

And the anointing oil.] See xxxi. 23, 24, &c.

And the sweet incense.] See xxxi. 34, &c. He mentioned before the materials for them, (ver. 8.) and now the things themselves.

And the hanging for the door, at the entering in of the tabernacle.] Of this, see xxvi. 36.

Ver. 16. And the altar of burnt-offering, with his brazen grate, his staves.] These are explained, xxvii. 1—7.

And all his vessels.] See there, ver. 3.

The laver and his foot.] See xxix. 17, 18.

Ver. 17. The hangings of the court, his pillars, and their sockets.] See xxvii. 9, 10, &c.

And the hangings for the door of the court.] See there, ver. 16.

Ver. 18. The pins of the tabernacle, &c.] See xxvii. 19.

Ver. 19. The clothes of the service, to do service in the holy place, the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and his sons, &c.] Of which there is an account in the whole twenty-eighth chapter. And Moses here makes this large enumeration of all the things which God had commanded, (ver. 10.) that they might be stirred up to be the more liberal in their offering, when they saw how many things were to be done.

Ver. 20. And all the congregation of the children of Israel.] Whom he had summoned to meet together, (ver. 1.)

Departed from the presence of Moses.] When he had reported to them what orders he had received from the Divine Majesty in the mount, (ver. 4, 5, &c.)

Ver. 21. And they came.] Being dismissed to their own tents, they went thither only to fetch an offering to the Lord; which they came and brought immediately.

Every one whose heart stirred him up.] Whose mind was raised to a free and cheerful readiness. The Hebrew words are, lifted him up; that is, had animum excelsum, a noble mind; or was of a generous spirit; as the following words import, Every one whom his spirit made willing.

And they brought the Lord's offering.] An offering to the Lord, as Moses exhorted, (ver. 5.)

To the work of the tabernacle.] For the building a sanctuary, wherein God might dwell among them, (xxv. 8.)

And for all his service.] For all that belonged to the furniture of it, both within and without, which are mentioned in the verses beforegoing.

And for the holy garments.] That the priests might minister there in their office, (ver. 19.)

Ver. 22. And they came, both men and women, as many as were willing-hearted.] Who seem to have been the greatest part of the congregation.

And brought bracelets, and ear-rings, and rings.] They were no less forward to offer to the service of God, than they had been to the making the golden calf, (xxxii. 2, 3.) for which offence they now make some sort of satisfaction; being more liberal in contributing to this work, than they were to that. For we read there only of their ear-rings, which they brake off from their ears and brought to Aaron; but here of their bracelets also, and rings, with other things. For though they may be supposed to have parted with a great deal, on that wicked account; it did not make those who were touched with what Moses said, less willing to give afresh to a holy use.

Tablets.] The Hebrew word comaz, or camaz, is of very uncertain signification; for some make it an ornament of the arms, and others of some other part: but the Chaldee takes it for something about the breast; a fascia (saith Elias) wherewith women tied up and compressed their breasts, to make them appear more beautiful, by being round. This Bochartus approves, in his Canaan. lib. ii. cap. 5.

All jewels of gold.] All the four forenamed sorts of ornaments were of gold.

And every man that offered, offered an offering of gold unto the Lord.] The first oblations that were brought, either by the women or the men, were all of gold: and then followed meaner things, which the people of lower condition brought to the Lord.

Ver. 23. And every man with whom was found blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, &c.] The common sort of people also offered such as they had, yarn, and fine linen, goats' hair, and skins. (See xxv. 4, 5.)

Ver. 24. Every one that did offer an offering of silver and brass, &c.] Those of a middle condition offered silver, and brass, and shittim-wood. All which were necessary for several uses: for the ark and the table were to be overlaid with gold; of which the candlesticks and several other things were to be made. (See chap. xxv.) The inward cutains were to be made of the yarn; and the outward of goats' hair, and the covering of both of skins. The foundations of the tabernacle were of silver; and the taches of the curtains and altar of burnt-offering of brass; and shittim-wood was used about the boards of the tabernacle, the ark, table, &c. (See chap. xxv. xxvi. xxvii.)

Ver. 25. And all the women that were wise-hearted, did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, &c.] Not only the men, but the women also, brought materials for the house; and more than that, such as were skilful among them spun both yarn and thread; which was the proper work of women, not of men. Unto which work alone they were bound to apply themselves, if by the custom of the place no other work (such as knitting, and sewing with their needle, &c.) was usually performed by them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10. where he treats of all the employments of their women.

Ver. 26. And all the women whose heart stirred them up.] Whose minds were elevated to excellent contrivances.

In wisdom, spun goats' hair.] With great art spun goats' hair; which was not so easy as to spin wool and flax. For though their goats were shorn in those countries, as sheep are here (their hair being longer than ours), yet there was a great deal of skill required to work it into a thread, and to make stuff of it. (See Bochart. Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51.) In old time also women were wont to weave as well as spin, as appears not only out of the sacred books, but out of Homer, Plato, Cicero, and many other authors, mentioned by Braunius, in his book de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 17, where he observes (N. 33.) out of Herodotus, that he, shewing the Egyptian customs to be different in many things from those of other nations, mentions this among the rest, that their men κατ' οἴκους ἐόντες ὑφαίνουσι, sat at home and weaved, while their women went abroad and bought and sold, (lib. ii. cap. 35.)

Ver. 27. And the rulers brought onyx-stones, and stones to be set for the ephod, and for the breast-plate.] The great men also offered suitable to their quality; such things as the people could not furnish, viz. precious stones, for uses mentioned xxv. 7. xxviii. 9. 17, 18, &c.

Ver. 28. And spice, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, &c.] Such principal spices (as we translate it) mentioned xxx. 23. 34, together with oil for the light, (xxvii. 20.) which was so pure, that ordinary persons had it not. For there were several sorts of olives (as Fort. Scacchus shews, Myrothec. Sacr. Elæochrysm. par. i. cap. 4, 5.) some of which were not so common as the other, and therefore of greater value.

Ver. 29. The children of Israel brought a willing offering, &c.] To sum up all in a few words, they brought whatsoever was necessary, for all manner of work which the Lord had commanded to be made.

By the hand of Moses.] Whom he employed to deliver these commands to his people.

Ver. 30. And Moses said, See, the Lord hath called by name, &c.] Hath principally made choice of Bezaleel to undertake and perform this work. This he said, that they might not be solicitous about artists, to make all that was propounded; for they knew that there were none among them bred to such employments. Moses therefore informs them, in the first place, that God had provided himself of a master workman, as he told him xxx. 1, 2, &c.

Ver. 31. And he hath filled him with the spirit of God in wisdom, &c.] This verse is explained before, xxxi. 3. 6. only I shall add, that the extraordinary skill which any man had without teaching, in common arts, was by the heathens ascribed to their gods. There are several instances of it observed by Maximus Tyrius, Dissert. xxii. where he argues, that it should not be thought strange, if a man be made virtuous by a Divine inspiration, when some have no other ways become admirable artists. Among which he mentions Demodocus, a musician, whom Homer introduces speaking thus of himself:

Αὐτοδίδακτος δ' εἰμὶ, θεοὶ δέ μοι ὤπασαν ὁμφήν.

I was never taught by any body, but the gods bestowed on me the gift of singing. The latter end of which verse is a little otherwise in Homer, as we now have him, (Odyss. x.) but to the same sense, and it is Phemius, not Demodocus, who there speaks, as Petrus Petitus hath observed, in his Miscell. Observ. lib. i. cap. 19.

Ver. 32. And to devise curious works.] The Hebrew word chaschab signifies to devise and excogitate; whence macheschaboth, which we translate curious works (and in the end of the next verse cunning works), is as much as ingenious inventions, devised with much art. Such were the engines made by king Uzziah, which are said to be invented by cunning men, or excellent engineers, as we now speak, (1 Chron. xxvi. 15.) See xxxi. 4. where this verse hath been explained.

Ver. 33. And in the cutting of stones, &c.] See xxxi. 5.

Ver. 34. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach.] Instruct others in his arts. For this was a gift of God, as much as any of the rest, to be able to inform others dexterously, in those things which he knew himself: as it was, to be able to comprehend what Moses told him God had ordered, and put it in execution. For God gave Moses the pattern, according to which all things were to be wrought: and as it was a peculiar gift of God, which enabled him to represent to Bezaleel what had been set before him; so it was by an extraordinary operation on his mind, that he conceived presently what was represented, and had skill to perform it according to direction.

Ver. 35. Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, &c.] This is repeated so often, and such particular mention is here made again of their skill in every thing, though of ever so difficult contrivance, to assure the Israelites that they were so well qualified for the work, that they might be entrusted with the offerings they had made. And accordingly they were, (xxxvi. 3.)

CHAP. XXXVI.

Ver. 1. THEN wrought Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise-hearted man, &c.] This verse is only a general account of what follows more particularly, concerning the execution of that which God had commanded, and for the effecting of which the people had liberally contributed. It is not said where they wrought, but some think it was in that very space of ground where the tabernacle was set up when perfected.

Ver. 2. And Moses called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise-hearted man, in whose heart the Lord had put wisdom.] It appears by this, that all the lower artificers, who were taught by the master-workmen, Bezaleel and Aholiab, were also disposed by God to learn; he giving them a quickness of apprehension and sagacity beyond what was natural to them.

Even every one whose heart stirred him up, to come unto the work to do it.] Yet this signifies, they had also a natural genius, which inclined and prompted them to such employments.

Ver. 3. And they received of Moses all the offerings which the children of Israel had brought for the work of the sanctuary, &c.] Into the hands of all these artists, Moses delivered the offerings that had been made; and directed them what to do with them.

And they brought yet unto him free-offerings every morning.] The hearts of the people were so enlarged, that every day they brought new contributions unto Moses; who sent them (as appears by the next verse) to the workmen, as soon as he received them.

Ver. 4. And all the wise men, which wrought all the work of the sanctuary, came every man from his work which he made.] After they had continued some time at their work, they all agreed to desist awhile, and go to Moses, to let him know that there needed no further offerings, for they had sufficient already; nay, more than enough, as it follows, ver. 5.

Ver. 5. And they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, &c.] A wonderful instance of integrity, that there should not be one man found among them (for the words in the Hebrew are very emphatical, isch, isch [man, man], that is, none excepted) who was inclined to purloin any thing for his own proper use: but by common consent, they left their work, to put a stop to all further contributions. A sign they were men endued with extraordinary virtue, as well as skill in their employments.

Ver. 6. And Moses gave commandment.] To those that attended on him; or perhaps to Bezaleel and Aholiab, and the rest.

And they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp.] By some under officers, who, it is likely, were wont to execute such commands.

Saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary.] It seems some men prepared and made ready some of the things which they offered; as the women spun yarn and hair, and brought them to Moses. For it was not hard to plane boards (for instance) though the joining them together, as God appointed, was beyond the skill of common people.

Ver. 7. For the stuff they had was sufficient, &c.] There were materials of all sorts, for every thing that was to be made, beyond what was necessary.

Ver. 8. And every wise-hearted man among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle, &c.] They began first (as was but fit) with the house of God, before they made the furniture. For that was first ordered in general words, (xxv. 8.) though the structure of it be not directed till the twenty-sixth chapter. Where every thing mentioned in this is explained; and therefore there will need no more to be done here; but to point to a few things which are explained elsewhere, particularly in the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 14. He made curtains of goats' hair for the tent over the tabernacle.] What is here meant by tent, see xxxv. 11.

Ver. 19. He made a covering for the tent.] This curtain covered the tent, as the curtain of which the tent was made covered the tabernacle. (See xxvi. 14. xxxv. 11.)

Of rams' skins died red.] The particle mem here is cut off before skins; as it is in several verses of this chapter, (8. 34, 35. and others.)

Covering of badgers'-skins.] I observed on xxvi. 14. that thacas doth not signify a badger, but a certain colour, and alleged that place in Ezek. xvi. 10. for the proof of it; where God setting forth his kindness to Israel, under the figure of a most loving husband, who denies his wife nothing, though never so costly, saith, he shod her with thacas; which I since find translated by an anonymous author, with purple shoes.

CHAP. XXXVII.

IN this chapter Moses gives an account of the making of all the furniture of the tabernacle, with such exactness, as he describes the making of the tabernacle itself, in the foregoing chapter: to shew that God's directions about the making every thing was punctually observed; nothing being omitted or added, but all made according to the pattern in the mount, (xxv. 9. 40.) In which chapter most of the things here mentioned are explained; and there needs little to be added here.

Ver. 1. And Bezaleel made the ark of shittim-wood, &c.] Abarbinel fancies, that though other things were made by inferior artificers, whom Bezaleel directed; yet the ark, because of its dignity and pre-eminence, above all other things, was made by him, without the help of any other. And so Rambam also; from whence the Jews commonly called it (as Buxtorf observes), the ark of Bezaleel. But this hath no good foundation; for he is said to have made also every thing else in the tabernacle; the table, and all its vessels: in short, every thing mentioned in this chapter, and in the next also, and in the foregoing, (ver. 10, 11, &c.) He therefore is said to have made the ark, &c. because he gave directions to the under workmen, and saw them make it.

Ver. 10. And he made the table of shittim-wood, &c.] Next to the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubims which belong to it, the table and the vessels appertaining to it were the principal things within the tabernacle. See xxv. 23, &c. where all the things mentioned between this verse and the seventeenth are explained.

Ver. 17. And he made the candlestick, &c.] The orders which Moses received for the making this, the branches and the lamps thereof, and every thing appertaining to it, are set down xxv. 31, 32, &c. which Bezaleel exactly followed.

Ver. 25. He made the incense-altar, &c.] This, and all that follows in the three next verses, see explained, xxx. 1, &c.

Ver. 29. And he made the holy anointing oil, &c.] See xxx. 31, &c.

And the pure incense, &c.] See xxx. 34, &c.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND he made the altar of burnt-offering, &c.] Having given an account of the making of all the furniture of the house, he proceeds to shew how all things were made without doors with the same exactness, according to the Divine prescriptions. All which Bezaleel could not make with his own hands; but he was chief director in these things as well as the rest of the work.

Five cubits was the length thereof, &c.] See xxvii. 1, 2, &c. where this, and the six following verses are explained.

Ver. 8. And he made the laver of brass, &c.] See xxx. 18. where order is given for the making of this laver, and its situation directed: but neither there nor here are we told the figure or dimensions of it; but have a particular remark, in this place, concerning the materials out of which it was made, in the following words.

Of the looking-glasses.] So we interpret the Hebrew word maroth; because now such things are commonly made of glass; but anciently of polished brass: which they looked upon as far better than silver, for that made a weaker reflection, as Vitruvius informs us, (lib. vii. cap. 3.) And the best of these specula were, among the ancient Romans, made at Brundusium, of brass and tin mixed together, as Pliny tells us, (lib. xxxiii. 9. xxxiv. 17.) This shews the laver was made of the finest and most pure brass.

Of the women assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] The Hebrew word Hattzobeoth signifies that they came by troops to make this present to the Lord. And the LXX. and Chaldee understanding it of such women as came together to serve God, by fasting and prayer, (for there is the same word used in 1 Sam. ii. 22.) most interpreters think, they that made this oblation were very devout women, who were wont to spend much time at the tabernacle, where the presence of God was. For Moses's tent served instead of the tabernacle of the congregation, and was so called, till this tabernacle was built, (xxxiii. 7, &c.) Thus Aben Ezra also observes, upon these words; that these women making a free-will offering of the looking-glasses, wherein they were wont to behold the beauty of their faces, and to dress and adorn their heads, it seems to argue their very religious mind, despising the vanity of the world, and delighting far more in the service of God.

Ver. 9. And he made the court, &c.] All that follows from this place to ver. 21. is explained in the twenty-seventh chapter, from ver. 9. to ver. 20. except two or three words, which I shall here take notice of.

Ver. 17. The chapiters of silver.] There is no mention of rashim (chapiters) in the twenty-seventh chapter; but only of vauim (or hooks) which were of silver, ver. 10. and 17. But this verse shews that those hooks were in the chapiters, or heads of the pillars, out of which those arose, as an ornament to them.

Ver. 18. And the height in the breadth, &c.] This is a Hebrew phrase, signifying the height of the hanging itself: whose breadth, when it lay along, was called its height when it was hung up. And that was five cubits; proportionable to the hangings of the court, which was five cubits high, (xxvii. 18.)

Ver. 21. This is the sum of the tabernacle, even of the tabernacle of the testimony, &c.] Some will have this relate to the forenamed things, mentioned in this and in the foregoing chapters. But I take it rather to be a preface to the account which Moses ordered to be taken of all the gold, silver, and brass that was employed in building of the tabernacle. Which being summed up, amounted to so many talents as are mentioned, ver. 24, &c.

For the service of the Levites.] Rather, by the ministry of the Levites; whom Moses appointed to take the account of all the expenses.

By the hand of Ithamar, son to Aaron the priest.] Under the conduct of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron; whom he appointed to preside over the Levites, in taking this account.

Ver. 22. And Bezaleel, the son of Uri, made all that the Lord commanded Moses.] Which gold, silver, and brass was committed into the hands of Bezaleel (though in the presence of all the rest of the workmen, xxxvi. 2, 3.) as the principal person, who was to see it employed in making every thing which the Lord commanded Moses.

Ver. 23. And with him was Aholiab, &c.] Unto whom God joined Aholiab as his associate in so great an undertaking; who made use of several others, whom they taught in those arts, which God, by an extraordinary inspiration, had made them to understand, (xxxv. 30, 31. 34, 35.)

Ver. 24. All the gold which was occupied for the work, &c.] About the ark, the table, the candlestick, and all belonging to them, (xxxvii. 2. 11. 17. 24. 26.) and about the holy garments mentioned xxxix. 5, &c. 15. 25. 30.

What was not employed about this work (for the people brought more than enough, xxxvi. 5. 7.) it is very probable was laid up in the treasury, for sacred uses, as there should be occasion.

Twenty and nine talents, and seven hundred and thirty shekels.] It hath been noted before, that a shekel is near half-a-crown of our money: now it is evident (from ver. 25, 26.) that there were three thousand shekels in a talent; so that a talent of silver, as Dr. Cumberland, bishop of Peterborough, computes it (in his learned treatise of Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. 4.) amounts to three hundred and fifty-three pounds, eleven shillings, and some odd pence, in our money. And a talent of gold (reckoning gold to be above fourteen times in value) to five thousand and seventy-six pounds, three shillings, and tenpence.

Ver. 25. And the silver of them that were numbered of the congregation was a hundred talents, and a thousand seven hundred and threescore and fifteen shekels, &c.] There being six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty men, that offered each of them half a shekel (as the next verse tells us), they make three hundred and one thousand, seven hundred and seventy-five thousand shekels. Which, amounting to a hundred talents, with one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five shekels more, demonstrates that a talent contains three thousand shekels. For no number (as the same learned bishop hath shewn) but three thousand, dividing three hundred and one thousand, seven hundred and seventy-five, will produce a hundred, and leave one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five in remainder.

Ver. 26. A bekah for every man, that is, half a shekel, &c.] See xxx. 13. Some may possibly think it unaccountable, that so great treasures should be found among the Israelites in the desert; and especially that they should be furnished with such precious stones, as are mentioned in the next chapter, ver. 10, &c. as they were before, xxviii. 17, 18, &c. But such persons should consider, that their ancestors were very great men, and had gathered great riches, before they came into Egypt; where Joseph, it is likely, left them no small treasures: and though Pharaoh perhaps squeezed them (as I said upon chapter the first) yet they preserved most of their riches, and were reimbursed what they lost, by what they borrowed of the Egyptians. From whose dead bodies thrown on the sea-shore, we may well suppose they got still more; as they did also from the Amalekites, who being a people near to Arabia (from whence a great part of the precious stones came), we may likewise suppose were not unfurnished with them. And besides all this, they had shittim-wood good store in the wilderness; (as I noted chap. xxv.) and some of the Jews, particularly Abarbinel, think it not improbable, that they traded with the neighbouring nations, who bordered upon the wilderness, while they continued in it.

Ver. 27. And of the hundred talents of silver were cast the sockets of the sanctuary, &c.] It appears by the twenty-sixth chapter, that there were just a hundred of these sockets, which were the foundation of the house of God, (ver. 19. 21. 25. 32.) To the making of every one of which there went a talent of silver.

Ver. 28. And of the thousand seven hundred seventy-five shekels, he made, &c.] A hundred talents being spent in making the sockets, the remainder, which was one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five shekels, (ver. 25.) was laid out upon hooks, and chapiters, and fillets, about the pillars. Which make up the whole account of the silver.

Ver. 29. And the brass of the offering, &c.] This verse gives an account of the value of the brass, which the people offered; as the former verses of the gold and silver.

Ver. 30. And therewith he made the sockets to the door of the tabernacle, and the brazen altar, &c.] This verse and the next gives an account how the brass was employed, according to God's order beforementioned, (xxvi. 37. xxvii. 2—4.)

Ver. 31. And the sockets of the court, &c.] See xxvii. 10. 17—19. Here is not such a particular account given upon what things the gold was employed, (but only in general, in all the work of the holy place, ver. 24.) because all things that were not made of silver and brass were made of gold; and a great deal, it appears by the next chapters, was employed in making Aaron's glorious attire.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Ver. 1. AND of the blue, and purple, and scarlet.] These artificers proceeded, in the most natural order, to make all that God commanded. For, first, they made the house itself, in which he was to dwell, (chap. xxxvi.) then all the furniture belonging to it, (chap. xxxvii.) and then the outward court, and all that was therein, (chap. xxxviii.) and now Moses relates how they made the priestly garments, without which they could not minister to God in this house.

They made.] This shews how all that goes before (where it is said he made) is to be interpreted. Bezaleel and Aholiab, and all that were employed under them, had a hand (as we speak) in these garments; the principal artists directing, and the rest working all that is here mentioned.

Clothes of service.] To be put on when they ministered unto God, in the priest's office, (xxviii. 4. xxx. 10. xxxv. 19.) not to be worn abroad, but only in the sanctuary. As Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11. p. 145. where he looks upon the following words, to do service in the holy place (or, to serve in the sanctuary), as determining them to be used here, and no where else.

Ver. 2. And he made the ephod, &c.] Gave direction for the making it of such materials as here follow. (See xxviii. 6, &c.)

Ver. 3. And they did beat the gold into thin plates, &c.] The under workmen, by Bezaleel's direction, did first beat the gold into very thin plates, and then slice them into wires, or small threads of gold. For in those days they had not the art which we have now, of drawing a piece of gold into round wires or threads of what length we please; but, as Moses here describes it, they beat it first into broad thin plates, and then cut off lesser and narrower wires (as we call them), which were not round, but of a very small breadth; which they wove with the other materials here mentioned. But nothing is here said of silver thus wrought; for they had not the art of weaving silver in this manner, in ancient times, as Salmasius observes upon Vopiscus, in the life of Aurelian; in whose days the art of making silver into threads, and weaving it with their garments, was not known; but was much in use in the time of the latter Greek emperors.

To work it in blue, and in purple, &c.] The manner of it was thus (as Maimonides saith): "They took one thread of wire of gold, and joined it with six threads of blue, and twisted all seven into one. And so they mingled the like thread of gold with six of purple; and another with six of scarlet; and another with six of fine linen: so that there were twenty-eight threads in all." Which R. Solomon Jarchi expresses thus upon xxviii. 8. These five kinds (blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen, and gold) were twisted into one thread. For the gold being stretched into a thin plate, and threads cut out of it, they weaved a thread of gold with six threads of blue (and so they did with the rest), after which they twisted all these threads into one. (See Joh. Braunius de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 17. n. 26.)

Cunning work.] See xxviii. 6,

Ver. 4, 5.] See xxviii. 7, 8.

Ver. 6. They wrought onyx-stones.] See xxviii. 9.

Ver. 7. For a memorial.] See xxviii. 12.

Ver. 8. He made the breast-plate, &c.] See this explained, and all that follows to ver. 22. in xxviii. 15, 16, &c. only observe, that there is not a word here said of his making urim and thummim: which confirms what I said there, that they were not distinct things from the precious stones in the breast-plate.

Ver. 22. And they made the robe of the ephod, &c.]

See this and the two following verses explained, xxviii. 31—33.

Ver. 24. And twined linen.] In the Hebrew there is only the word twined: but the Masora rightly observes, that schesch is to be understood; which we have therefore justly supplied in the word linen. And so the LXX.

Ver. 25. Bells of pure gold, &c.] See xxviii. 33, 34. where this and the next verse are explained.

Ver. 27. And they made coats of fine linen.] Coats were ordered to be made for Aaron and his sons, xxviii. 40. but the matter of them not mentioned: which is here therefore ordered to be of fine linen. For white garments, being pure, bright, unmixed, and also splendid and stately (for anciently the greatest persons were so clothed, as appears by Joseph, when he was honourably arrayed by Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 42.) were used by all nations in the service of God. And what was most suitable to nature, God thought fit to continue in his service, though used perhaps by idolaters before this time. Only his priests wore these garments no where but in the sanctuary; whereas the priests of Isis (for instance) went every where clothed in white.

Of woven work.] Not sewed with a needle; for such coats may be made without any seam; and Braunius hath shewn the manner of weaving them, lib. i. de Vestitu Sacerdot. Hebr. cap. 16.

Ver. 28. Mitre of fine linen.] See xxviii. 39. And of bonnets and breeches. (See there, ver. 40. 42.)

Ver. 29. And a girdle of fine twined linen, &c.] See xxviii. 39.

Ver. 30. And they made the plate of the holy crown.] See xxviii. 36. To which I shall only add, that the priests, both men and women, among the gentiles, had ordinarily the epithet of στεφανοφόροι, from the crowns they wore upon their heads; which were sometimes of gold, sometimes of laurel. (See Cuperus, in his Harpocrates, p. 137.)

Ver. 31. A lace of blue, &c.] See xxviii. 37.

Ver. 32. Thus was all the work of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation finished, &c.] Every thing belonging to the house of God (which he commanded Moses to make) was completed exactly according to his directions: though they were not yet set in their place, which God orders in the next chapter.

Tabernacle of the tent, &c.] See xl. 2.

And all the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did they.] This hath a more particular respect to the workmen; yet all the materials being brought by the body of the people, they are also comprehended in this expression.

Ver. 33. And they brought the tabernacle unto Moses, the tent, and all its furniture, &c.] In this and the following verses he makes a recapitulation of all the particulars, mentioned in the foregoing chapter: which they brought to Moses, that they might see whether they were made according to his order. It is probable that the whole congregation, or the heads of them, accompanied Bezaleel and the other artificers, when they brought these things to Moses for his approbation.

Ver. 34. And the covering of the rams' skins, &c.] Of this covering, and of the next, see xxvi. 14. xxxvi. 19.

And the veil of the covering.] See xxvi. 36.

Ver. 37. The pure candlestick.] Of pure gold, as we read xxv. 31. xxxvii. 17.

Ver. 42. So the children of Israel made all the work.] Here again the whole body of the people are said to have made all the work forementioned, (see ver. 37.) because they contributed to it, and also helped to prepare some materials for the workmen, (xxxv. 25. xxxvi. 6.)

Ver. 43. And Moses did look upon the work.] Took a solemn view of it; and examined it carefully whether it was performed according to the order they had received.

And behold, they had done it as the Lord commanded.] This is the tenth time that Moses, in this one chapter, saith all was done as the Lord commanded, ver. 1. 5. 7. 21. 26. 29. 31, 32. 42. and here in this last verse; to shew how exact they were in their obedience; and that nothing was done according to their own reason and opinion, but all according to the Divine precept, without addition or detraction. They are the words of the author of Sepher Cosri, (par. iii. n. 23.) who well observes, that all was done and brought to perfection by two things, which are the pillars of the law: the one is, that the law is from God; and the other, that it be accepted by the church with a faithful heart. And thus was the tabernacle ordered by the Divine precept; and it was made by the whole church or congregation, (xxv. 2.)

And Moses blessed them.] Both the workmen, who had done their work faithfully; and the children of Israel, who had contributed the materials, and also now, together with Bezaleel and the rest of the artificers, presented the whole to him.

CHAP. XL.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After he had taken a survey of all the work beforementioned, God gave him the following command, in the latter end (it is probable) of the twelfth month.

Ver. 2. On the first day of the first month.] Of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, (ver. 17.) which was a complete year (within fourteen days) after that great deliverance.

Shalt thou set up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.] This is a full description of the place, which was made for a habitation of the Divine Majesty, (xxv. 8.) and therefore called mischchan, which we translate tabernacle, but properly signifies a dwelling. It was a moveable house, to be set up and taken down as there was occasion; and therefore called ohel, a tent; such as shepherds dwell in, (Gen. iv. 24. See xxix. 11. of this book.) Or, the word tabernacle may be thought to signify, the inward part of this house; as tent, the outward part, which covered the inward. (See ver. 17. 19. 29.)

Why it is called ohel moed [the tent of the congregation] see xxix. 44.

Ver. 3. And thou shalt put therein the ark of the testimony.] This was the principal end of building this house, that God (as was said before) might dwell among them; and his residence was over this ark. Which therefore is ordered, in the first place, to be brought into the holy of holies, prepared for it as soon as the house was erected. Why called the ark of the testimony, see xxvi. 20, 21.

And cover the ark with the veil.] Which hung before it; that nobody (not the priests themselves) might see it (xxvi. 33.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 4. And thou shalt bring in the table, &c.] When the ark was placed in the holiest of all, then the table, with all belonging unto it, and the candlestick (whose lamps were to be lighted) are ordered to be set in the sanctuary, which was divided by the veil from the other, (xxvi. 35.)

Ver. 5. And thou shalt set the altar of gold for the incense before the ark of the testimony.] See xxx. 6.

And put the hangings of the door to the tabernacle.] See xxvi. 36, 37. This is ordered to be hung up, when the table, candlestick, and altar of incense, were put into the holy place, because there were no more things but these three to be there.

Ver. 6. And thou shalt set the altar of burnt-offering, &c.] In this and the two following verses, he is ordered to place the altar of burnt-offering, and the laver, as he had been before directed, (xxx. 18.) and to set up the outward court, and the hanging at the gate of it, in order to place the altar and the laver there, (xxvii. 9, &c.)

Ver. 9. And thou shalt take the anointing oil.] Mentioned xxx. 23, &c. Every thing being disposed in its proper place, now follows their consecration. For they were not consecrated separately, before the house was erected, and its furniture brought in: but after every thing was set in the order which God appointed.

And anoint the tabernacle and all that is therein, &c.] As was before directed, and now ordered to be put in execution, xxx. 26—29. where this and the two following verses are explained.

Ver. 12. And thou shalt bring Aaron and his sons to the door of the tabernacle.] The laver being sanctified, (ver. 11.) many think that the sanctification of Aaron and his sons (i. e. their separation to their office) began in their being washed with water. But I look upon this as a mistake, there being a washing prescribed, before the laver was ordered, (xxix. 4.) where they were to wash only when they went in to minister, (xxx. 19—21.)

Ver. 13. And thou shalt put upon Aaron the holy garments.] Mentioned in the twenty-eighth chapter.

And anoint and sanctify him, &c.] See xxx. 30, 31.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt bring his sons and clothe them with coats.] See xxvii. 40, 41.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt anoint them, as thou didst their father.] See concerning this xxix. 7. where both their anointing and their father's is explained.

For their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood, &c.] Not only consecrate them to the priest's office as long as they live; but consecrate their posterity also, who shall need no other anointing in succeeding generations: but minister to God by virtue of this anointing, as long as that priesthood lasted. So the Hebrews interpret it. None of them needed in aftertimes, saith R. Levi ben Gersom (upon 1 Kings i.) to be anointed, but only the high-priest; whose successors were to be anointed, as they gather from Levit. vi. 22. "The priest of his sons, who shall be anointed in his stead," &c. (See Selden de Succession. in Pontificat. lib. ii. cap. 9.)

Ver. 16. Thus did Moses; according to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he.] He took the same care in erecting the tabernacle, and disposing every thing in its place, that the workmen had done in making all things according to God's mind, (xxxix. 43.)

Ver. 17, 18, &c. And it came to pass, in the first month, &c.] This and the following verses to ver. 34. give an account of the execution of what God commanded, in the foregoing part of this chapter. But it is not easy to resolve, whether every thing was executed at this very time, or no. For full understanding of which, it will be necessary to mark diligently the order wherein God requires all the foregoing commands to be performed. And first he bids him set up the tabernacle, and put every thing belonging to it in its place, ver. 2, 3. and so forward to ver. 9. And next, to consecrate it, and all the vessels thereof, with the altar of burnt-offerings and its vessels, &c. (ver. 9—11.) And then to proceed to consecrate Aaron and his sons, (ver. 12—15.) Now it is expressly here affirmed, that Moses did perform the first of these, that is, set up the tabernacle, and put every thing appertaining to it in its right place, on the first day of the first month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt. At which time we must suppose also he began to consecrate it, and spent seven days in the consecration of it and of the altar of burnt-offering, as is appointed xxix. 37. But the difficulty is to determine, when he consecrated Aaron and his sons, as he is here required, in which seven days were also spent, as we read Lev. viii. Some think there were but seven days in all set apart for this work, and consequently they were consecrated together. So Torniellus in his Annals, and Abulensis before him, who follow Seder Olam and other Jewish writers, who are of this opinion. The ground of which is, that the tabernacle being erected on the first day of the month beforementioned, and its consecration finished on the eighth, there was a solemn Passover kept upon the fifteenth, (Numb. ix. 1, 2, &c.) which could not be held, they suppose, unless there were priests to offer the Passover: who therefore were consecrated at the same time with the tabernacle; because on the eighth day another business began, which was the offering made by the princes of the tribes, every one in their day, (Numb. vii. 1.) But the principal ground is, that, in Lev. viii. 10, 11, &c. Moses speaks of the anointing (i. e. consecrating) the altar, and of consecrating Aaron and his sons, as done both at the same time. But there is a weighty objection against all this; which is, that in the consecration of Aaron and his sons, there were three sacrifices offered upon the altar, one for a sin-offering, another for a burnt-offering, and the ram of consecration for a peace-offering, (Lev. viii. 4. 18. 22.) None of which could be acceptable for their sanctification, till the altar itself was made holy. And therefore the seven days appointed for that purpose were ended, before the consecration of the priests began, which continued seven days more; and then the next day was the feast of unleavened bread. Which was famous on a double account; first, because it was the first day of unleavened bread; and then it was the octaves of the consecration. And this appears more plainly from Lev. i. 1 where we find the following commands were given to Moses out of the tabernacle by the Divine Majesty; who therefore dwelt there, when he commanded the priest to be consecrated, which he did not till the tabernacle was solemnly consecrated to be his habitation. There the priests also are commanded to abide during the seven days of their consecration, (Lev. viii. 33.) which shews that all things belonging to its sanctification were finished, before their consecration began. As to that which is alleged from Lev. viii. 10, 11, &c. I shall consider it there.

Ver. 19. And he spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle.] The ohel, which we translate tent, sometimes signifies the whole house of God, (see ver. 19.) but here only the external part of it, which covered that which was properly called mischchan [the tabernacle.] Which Moses having erected with all its sockets, boards, bars, and pillars, ver. 18. (and hung it, we must suppose, with the inward hangings, which were the richest), he spread abroad over them the curtains of goats' hair, called the tent, (xxvi. 11.) to be a covering over the tabernacle, (xxvi. 7. xxxvi. 14. 19.) So the tabernacle was a house within a house, inclosed with strong walls (as we call them) to secure it from the injury of the weather.

Ver. 20. And he took and put the testimony into the ark.] The two tables of stone, as he had been commanded, xxv. 16. which he mentions again in the repetition of the law, (Deut. x. 5.) Hence the ark is called the ark of the covenant or testimony, in the next verse, and ver. 3. of this chapter.

Ver. 21. And he brought the ark into the tabernacle.] It is probable that he had placed the ark, after it was made, in his own tent, which for the present was called the tabernacle of the congregation, and had the glory of the Lord in it, (xxxiii. 7. 9.) but now he brought it into this tabernacle, which by God's order was prepared for it.

Ver. 22. And he put the table in the tent of the congregation.] Here the whole house is called the ohel (or tent), as I observed upon ver. 19. But immediately the word mischchan (which we translate tabernacle) is used, as the most proper expression for the inside of the house, as the other most properly denotes the outside of it. All is made more clear in the thirty-fourth verse; where we read that the cloud covered the tent of the congregation, that is, the outside of the house; and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle within. Though afterward, (ver. 38.) the cloud is said to be upon the tabernacle, as (ver. 36.) it is said to be over the tabernacle, because it was over the tent which covered it.

Ver. 25. And he lighted the lamps before the Lord, &c.] In this, and all that follows, of burning sweet incense, (ver. 27.) offering the burnt-offering and meat-offering, (ver. 29.) Moses acted as a priest, appointed by an extraordinary commission from God, only for this time; that he might consecrate the house of God, and the priests that were to minister therein; which being done, his priesthood ceased. And he did all that is mentioned in these verses, when the tabernacle was consecrated, and the glory of the Lord had filled it; testifying the Divine presence to be there.

Ver. 31. And Moses, and Aaron, and his sons, washed their hands, &c.] This shews that Moses acted now as a priest, and therefore washed himself before he went to sacrifice at the altar, as the priests afterward were always bound to do, (xxx. 19—21.) But it must be understood, that neither this washing here spoken of, nor his offering sacrifice, mentioned ver. 29. was till some days after this. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 33 So Moses finished the work.] And then anointed the tabernacle, and all contained in it, according to God's order, (ver. 9—11.) The execution of which, though now not here mentioned in so many words, is expressly said to be on the same day that he had completely set up the tabernacle, (Numb. vii. 1.)

Ver. 34. Then a cloud (or, then the cloud) covered the tent of the congregation.] After it was anointed and sanctified for the Divine residence (and the princes, perhaps, had also finished that large offering which we read, Numb. vii. was made on this day), God was pleased to fill this place with his glorious presence. For the cloudy pillar, which descended upon Moses's tent, and stood there before the door of it, (xxxiii. 9.) removed now from thence, and came hither; not standing at the door of it in the form of a pillar, but spreading itself all over the outside of the tabernacle, so that it was covered with it, as we read also Numb. ix. 15.

And the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle.] See ver. 22. What God promised, (xxv. 8. 22.) he now performed, notwithstanding their revolt from him, by worshipping the golden calf. Which made him withdraw himself from them, (xxxiii. 7, &c.) till, upon Moses's earnest intercession for them, and their repentance, he graciously consented to return to them, and abide among them, (ver. 14, 15, &c.) As he now did by settling his glorious presence in this tabernacle, which was set up in the midst of them. For, whereas the other tabernacle of Moses was removed a mile or two from their camp, (xxxiii. 7.) this tabernacle was pitched (a month after this, Numb. i. 1.) in the midst of their camps, as we read Numb. ii. 2. 17.

Ver. 35. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation.] For the glory of the Lord shone so bright and so strong, beyond all that it had ever done, that no eye could look upon it. And it filled not only the most holy place, but the whole body of the tabernacle; so that he durst not adventure to come within it till he was called, (Lev. i. 1.) After which time he seems to have had liberty to go in unto God when he pleased, (Numb. vii. 89. ix. 8, 9.) For after this great day, the glory of the Lord retired into the most holy place, within the veil; and resided constantly there, over the ark of the testimony: from whence he spake to Moses, when he came to consult him in the holy place. (See the forementioned Numb. vii. 89.) Whence he is said to dwell between the cherubims; though, on some occasions, this glory appeared without upon the tabernacle, (but over the ark, it is likely, Numb. xvi. 42.) And so perhaps it did, (xi. 17. 25.) and sometimes at the door of the tabernacle, (Deut. xxxi. 14, 15.)

Because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the house.] The cloud and the glory of the Lord were not two different things; but one and the same, as the pillar of cloud and of fire were. For outwardly it was a cloud, and inwardly a fire: and, accordingly, here the external part of it covered the tabernacle without; while the internal part shone in full glory within the house. Thus it was upon Mount Sinai, where Moses is said to "draw near to the thick darkness where God was," (xx. 21.) that is, the glory of the Lord was in that thick darkness. And so we read before, that "the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud," (xvi. 10.) And so those words are to be interpreted, xxiv. 16. "The glory of the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it (that is, covered the glory of the Lord, not the mount) six days." After which, on the seventh day, the glory of the Lord broke through it, and appeared like devouring fire, in the sight of all the people, (ver. 17.)

Ver. 36. And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in their journeys.] That is, the Lord (whose glorious presence was in this cloud) led and conducted them in all their removals. And therefore they are said to have journeyed at the commandment of the Lord: because when the cloud (wherein the Lord was) was taken up, then they journeyed, (Numb. ix. 17, 18. 20. 23.)

Ver. 37. But if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up.] They were wholly governed by its motions, and followed its directions.

Ver. 38. For the cloud of the Lord.] So it is called also in Numb. x. 34. because the glory of the Lord was in it.

Was upon the tabernacle by day.] And so it was by night, but then had another appearance, as it here follows.

And fire was on it by night.] The fire and the cloud (as I said ver. 35.) were not different things; but the same pillar which was dark by day, when there was no need of light, shone like fire by night, when the dark part of it could not be seen, to lead and conduct them. It appeared, therefore, like a cloud by day, and turned the light side to them (which was as bright as fire) by night, that they might march, if there were occasion, by its direction, both day and night. And thus it is described, xiii. 21, 22. Numb. ix. 15, 16, &c. And so this verse may be translated, the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and the fire was [bo] in it (i. e. in the cloud) by night. For so they are elsewhere described, as one within the other: (Deut. v. 22.) "The Lord spake unto all your assembly out of the midst of the fire of the cloud, and of the thick darkness."

In the sight of all the children of Israel, throughout all their journeys.] The whole congregation had constantly this comfortable token of God's presence among them, by the cloud in the day-time, and fire in the night: which never left them all the time they were in the wilderness, but brought them to Canaan.

THIRD BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

LEVITICUS.

CHAP. I.

THE Greeks and Latins give it this name of LEVITICUS, not because it treats of the ministry of the Levites, properly so called (of which the book of Numbers gives a fuller account than this book doth), but because it contains the laws about the religion of the Jews, consisting principally in various sacrifices; the charge of which was committed to Aaron the Levite, (as he is called Exod. iv. 14.) and to his sons, who alone had the office of priesthood in the tribe of Levi: which the apostle therefore calls a Levitical priesthood, Heb. vii. 11.

Ver. 1. And the Lord called unto Moses.] That is, bade him draw near, and not be afraid, because of the glory of that light which was in the tabernacle, (Exod. xl. 35.) For this is a word of love, as the Hebrew doctors speak: who observe, that God is not said to call the prophets of the gentiles; but we only read that God jikar, met Balaam; not jikra, called to him, as he did here to Moses. Who, as Procopius Gazæus hath well observed upon this word, appointed no service of God, in his house which he had lately erected, without his order: whereas the worship performed in the honour of demons, was without any authority from him. Nay, there were magical operations in it, and invocation of demons; and certain tacit obligations which their priests contracted with them. For which he produces Porphyry as a witness.

And spake unto him out of the tabernacle.] Hitherto he had spoken to him out of heaven, or out of a cloud; but now out of his own house. Into which, it is not here said he bade him come (as he did afterwards when the glory of the Lord dwelt only in the inner part of the house, over the ark), but he stood, it is likely, without the door of the tabernacle, till the sacrifices were appointed (as it here follows), and the high-priest entered into it with the blood of expiation. I can find no time in which this can so probably be supposed to have been done, as immediately after the consecration of the tabernacle, as soon as the glory of the Lord entered into it. And so I find Hesychius understood it, who, observing this book to begin with the word And, which is a conjunction used to join what follows with that which goes before, thence concludes, that the beginning of this book is knit to the conclusion of the last; and consequently what is here related was spoken to Moses on the same day he had set up the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord filled it. When Moses might well think (as the Jerusalem Targum explains it), that if Mount Sinai was so exalted by the Divine presence there for a short space, that it was not safe for him to approach it, much less come up into it, till God commanded him; he had much more reason not to go into the tabernacle, which was sanctified to be God's dwelling-place for ever, till God called to him by a voice from his presence: nay, he durst not so much as come near the door, where I suppose he now stood, without a particular direction from the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] The tabernacle being erected, it was fit, in the next place, to appoint the service that should be performed in it: which consisted in such sacrifices as are here mentioned in the beginning of this book. There could not be a more natural order, in setting down the laws delivered by Moses, than this which is here observed.

If any man of you bring.] It is the observation of Kimchi, that in the very beginning of the laws about sacrifices, God doth not require them to offer any, but only supposes they would; having been long accustomed to it, as all the world then was. To this he applies the words of Jeremiah, vii. 21. and takes it for an indication, that otherwise God would not have given so many laws concerning sacrifices, but only in compliance with the usage of the world; which could not then have been quite broken, without the hazard of a revolt from him. And therefore they are directed to the right object, the eternal God; and limited to such things as were most agreeable to human nature.

An offering unto the Lord.] The Hebrew word korban, which we translate an offering, and the Greeks translate a gift, is larger than zebach, which we translate a sacrifice. For, as Abarbinel observes in his preface to this book, though every sacrifice was an offering, yet every offering was not a sacrifice. A sacrifice being an offering that was slain; but there were several offerings of inanimate things (as those mentioned in the beginning of the second chapter of this book), which therefore were not properly sacrifices; but were accepted of God as much as the offering of beasts, when they had nothing better to give. And therefore the same Abarbinel will have the name of korban to be given to these offerings, because thereby men approached to God. For it is derived from a word which signifies to draw near: from whence he thinks those words in Deuteronomy, iv. 7. "What nation is there that hath God so nigh unto them," &c.

Ye shall bring.] He speaks in the plural number, say some of the Hebrew doctors (who have accurately considered these things), to shew that two men might join together to offer one thing.

Your offering of the cattle.] I do not know what ground Maimonides had to assert, in his More Nevochim, (par. iii. cap. 46.) that the heathen in those days had brute beasts in great veneration, and would not kill them (for it is no argument there was such a superstition in Moses's time, because there were people in the days of Maimonides, as there are now, who were possessed with such opinions). But he thinks God intended to destroy this false persuasion, by requiring the Jews to offer such beasts as are here mentioned; that what the heathen thought it a great sin to kill, might be offered to God, and thereby men's sin be expiated. By this means, saith he, men's evil opinions, which are the diseases and ulcers of the mind, were cured; as bodily diseases are by their contraries. Yet in the thirty-second chapter of that book, he saith, God ordered sacrifices to be offered, that he might not wholly alter the customs of mankind, who built temples, and offered sacrifices every where; taking care (it may be added) at the same time, that they should be offered only to himself, at one certain place, and after such a manner, as to preserve his people from all idolatrous rites: which if they had considered, who contemned this book of Leviticus (as Procopius Gazæus tells us some did) because it treated too much of sacrifices, they would not have thought it unworthy the Creator of the world, especially if they had looked further to the wisdom hidden under these things; which were examples, shadows, and patterns of heavenly things, as the apostle speaks, (Heb. viii. 4. ix. 13.) And so was the tabernacle itself, a figure (as we read ver. 9.) "for the time present, of a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands."

Even of the herd and of the flock.] That is, bullocks, sheep, and goats. For under the word tzon (which we translate flock) both sheep and goats are comprehended. And so Moses expounds himself, ver. 10. These were the principal sacrifices, and most acceptable to God, as Abarbinel observes in the forenamed place. For though doves and turtles were accepted when men were not able to bring the other; yet in public sacrifices these birds were never allowed: but only the three sorts of four-footed beasts beforementioned. Which were therefore chosen (as he proceeds) because these were the most excellent of all brute creatures, on several accounts; and because they were not hard to be found, but easily procured: and therefore no wild beasts were required to be offered, because God would not impose upon his people (as his words are) so great a burden, as to bring him that which could not be got without some difficulty. For which cause, also, young pigeons and turtles were only offered among birds. He gives other reasons for this, which seem to me very far-fetched, and therefore I shall not mention them. But this I may further add, that as they were the most ready at hand, and in common use among men at their tables (which he should have noted as the plainest reason of all), so they had been in most ancient use among religious people in their sacrifices. (See Gen. xv. 9.) And it is very likely they were restrained peculiarly to these, that they might not follow the customs of the gentiles; as they would have done, had they not been abridged in their liberty. Now though we find in Homer mention made of hecatombs (which were a sacrifice of a hundred oxen), and of perfect lambs and goats, whereby Achilles hoped Apollo might be appeased, and moved to cease the plague he had sent upon the Greeks; yet there was no more ancient sacrifice among the heathen, if we may believe themselves, than that of swine. Which made that learned Roman, Varro, derive the word ὄς (which is the Greek word for that creature) from σῦς, i. e. from a sacrifice, because it was most anciently offered to their gods; there being no more delicious food at their own tables than swines' flesh. (See Petrus Castellanus de Esu Carnium, lib. ii. cap. 1.) And afterward they also sacrificed not only harts to Diana, but horses to the sun, wolves to Mars, nay, dogs to Hecate; whereby they destroy the very nature of sacrifices, or at least of sacrifical feasts; in which people had communion with the gods whom they worshipped, by partaking at their table. For who would endure to eat of such meat as horse-flesh, and the flesh of wolves, nay asses, which were offered to Priapus?

Ver. 3. If his offering be a burnt-sacrifice.] Having prescribed what sort of creatures should be offered, he first directs them about their holocausts, as the Greeks call them, which were wholly burnt upon the altar; and were the most ancient sacrifices that had been in the world. They are often mentioned by the Greeks, particularly by Xenophon in his Cyropædia, lib. viii. where he saith, ὡλοκαύτωσαν τοὺς ταύρους, &c. they sacrificed whole burnt-offerings of oxen to Jupiter, and afterward of horses to the sun. (See Bochart. lib. ii. Hierozoic. cap. 33. par. i.) Sometimes, indeed, the heathen burnt only a part, and reserved the rest to feast upon, as he there observes: but among the Jews no man ever partook of these offerings. For there being four sorts of sacrifices prescribed by the law, (Abarbinel observes in his preface to this book, cap. 2.) the whole burnt-offerings, the sin-offerings, the trespass-offerings, and the peace-offerings; there was this difference made between them; that, of the first of these, whether it was a public or a private whole burnt-offering, nobody partook, no, not the priests themselves; but it was entirely consumed except the skin. Of the second, some part was burnt; the rest the priests had, and were to eat it in the court of the tabernacle (though there was one sort of sin-offering which was wholly consumed, as the burnt-offerings were). The third sort, which were trespass-offerings, were only offered for private persons; some parts of which, as in the former, were burnt upon the altar, and the rest eaten by the priests. As for the last (the peace-offering), some parts of such sacrifices were burnt on the altar, the priest had the breast and the right shoulder; and the remainder, he that brought the sacrifice ate with his friends. I shall add no more, but that these whole burnt-offerings seem to have been simple acknowledgments of God, the Creator of the world, and testifications that they owned him to be their Lord, and continued in covenant with him, and implored his blessing upon them. And therefore, with respect to the first and last of these considerations, the gentiles were permitted to bring these sacrifices (as the Jews tell us), but no other whatsoever, to be offered unto God.

Of the herd.] As burnt-offerings were the principal sacrifices, and therefore mentioned in the first place, so those of beeves were the chief of all burnt-offerings, both among the Jews and among the gentiles. Whence βουθυτεῖν, to sacrifice oxen, became a proverb for a magnificent entertainment.

Let him offer a male.] These were accounted the best, and therefore principally appointed. And so they were among the heathen; insomuch, that the Egyptians offered only ἔρσενας τῶν βοῶν, (as Herodotus tells us, lib. ii. cap. 41.) and thought it unlawful to offer females. Which shews that Moses did not conform his laws to their customs, for he admitted the sacrifice of females, (iii. 1.) Nay, it was particularly prescribed in some cases, (Numb. xix. 2.)

Without blemish.] Or perfect, as the Hebrew word tamim signifies. Which word Homer expressly uses, when Achilles speaks about the sacrifice to Apollo, ——ἀρνῶν κνίσσην αἰγῶν τε τελείων.

For to the gods (as Eustathius there observes) who are most perfect, προσάγειν χρὴ τέλεια, the most perfect things ought to be offered. The like passage a very learned friend of mine, now with God (Dr. Outram), observes out of the scholiast upon Aristophanes's Acharnenses, (lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 9. sect. 3.) where more may be seen to the same purpose. Now that is perfect in which there is no defect in any part, and is not decayed by age. For which reason, Abarbinel observes, great care is taken in the law, that this sort of creatures were to be offered before they were three years old; and the other sorts before they were two.

He shall offer it of his own voluntary will.] In this translation we follow the opinion of the Jews, who refer this to the persons that brought this offering; which they might do when they pleased. The like expressions we read xix. 5. xxii. 19. But the LXX. thought it hath respect to God; and so the phrase may be interpreted, he shall bring it for his acceptation, i. e. that he may find a favourable acceptance with God.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where the altar of burnt-offering was placed, (Exod. xl. 6. 29.) And this was so necessary, that it is required upon pain of death to be brought hither, and offered in no other place, (xvii. 3, 4, &c.) For which cause, it is likely, the door of the tabernacle is here mentioned rather than the altar; that it might be understood to be unlawful to offer at any other altar, but that which stood at the door of the tabernacle.

Before the Lord.] With their faces towards that holy place where the Divine Majesty dwelt: unto whom the sacrifice was brought, and at the door of the tabernacle received by the priest, from the hand of the offerer.

Ver. 4. And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering.] Both his hands; as some gather from xvi. 21. and (as Maimonides saith) he was to do it with all his might. This was a right belonging to peace-offerings, as well as to burnt-offerings, (iii. 2.) and to sin-offerings also, (iv. 4.) The meaning of which, in this sort of offerings, seems to have been, that he who brought the sacrifice renounced all his interest in it, and transferred it wholly to God, unto whose service he entirely devoted it. It being like to the old ceremony among the Romans, who laid their hands upon their servants when they gave them their liberty, and abdicated their own right in them, saying, "Hunc hominem liberum esse volo," I will that this man be free: which is called manumission. In other offerings it had another meaning, as I shall observe in due place: and it was imitated by the gentiles, though not without the addition of impious superstitions. For they writhed back the head of the beast upward, when they sacrificed to the gods above; and thrust down its head towards the ground, when they sacrificed to their infernal deities; as J. Brentius hath observed in his preface to this book.

And it shall be accepted for him to make an atonement for him.] It shall be so acceptable, as to recommend him to the favour of the Divine Majesty. For so the Hebrew word caphar seems here to signify, not properly to make an atonement (which was the business of a sin-offering), but to own him to be in a state of reconciliation with God: unto whom he was supposed to give up himself wholly, as he did this beast. The Jews, indeed, who stick to the literal signification of the word, fancy that these burnt-offerings expiated evil thoughts and desires: but there is no ground for this in Scripture; and the most that can be made of it is, that God accepted his prayers which he made in general, for the forgiveness of all his sins, when he laid his hand upon the head of this sacrifice. For it must be here observed, that laying on of hands was always accompanied with prayer, as appears by Jacob's laying them on the head of Manasseh and Ephraim, (Gen. xlviii. 14. 16. 20.) and the high-priest's laying them on the scape-goat, (xvi. 21. of this book.) Insomuch, that laying on of hands signifies sometimes in the New Testament to pray, (Matth. xix. 15. Mark v. 23.) and other places. But if a man had committed any sin, there are other sacrifices peculiarly appointed by the law for their expiation; which he was bound to offer with confession of sin, and prayer to God for pardon.

Ver. 5. And he shall kill the bullock.] That is, the man himself who brought it, as Rasi interprets it; or one of the Levites, as others understand it: for they killed the paschal lamb at that great Passover mentioned 2 Chron. xxx. 17. as Bochart observes. But he should have added the reason of it, which Rasi there gives; that a great many of the congregation having not sanctified themselves (as we read in that place), therefore the Levites had the charge of the killing of the passover, for every one that was not clean, to sanctify them unto the Lord. Otherwise every man might kill his own passover, (Exod. xii. 6.) as they might do all their other sacrifices. For certain it is, this was none of the work of priests, as Maimonides shews in a passage mentioned by Dr. Cudworth (in his book concerning the Lord's Supper, p. 27.) out of Biath Ammikdath: where he quotes this very place to prove, that "the killing of the holy things might lawfully be done by a stranger; yea, of the most holy things: whether they were the holy things of private persons, or of the whole congregation." The common objection to this is, that none might come into the court where the altar was but the priests. To which the answer is plain, that upon this occasion other persons might come so far within the court, because it was indispensably necessary that the man who brought the sacrifice should lay his hand upon the head of it; which was to be done at the altar when it was to be slain.

And the priests, Aaron's sons, shall bring the blood.] Now begins the work of the priests: the receiving of the blood and that which immediately followed, belonging to their office. They received it in a bason, (Exod. xxiv. 6.) as the manner also was among the heathen; which our learned Sheringham observes upon Codex Joma (p. 85.) out of Homer's Odyss. lib. iii. where Thrasymedes is represented as cutting the ox asunder with a cleaver; and Perseus as receiving the blood in a bason, which he calls ἄμνιον. A word used in Crete, as Eustathius notes, for such kind of vessels; which some think was originally ἀῖμνιον, from the receiving of the blood.

And sprinkle the blood round about upon the altar, &c.] That this might be done readily, one priest received the blood, and another took it from him, and sprinkled it about the altar; or, as the Jews understand it, on every side of the altar; which they performed by two sprinklings, at the opposite corners of it. Which was a rite also used in peace-offerings and trespass-offerings: but in sin-offerings the blood was poured out at the foot of the altar: (see vii. 2.) Thus the heathen also themselves took care the blood of their sacrifices should not run upon the ground, but be received, as I said, in vessels prepared for that purpose; and then poured upon their altars, and so offered and consecrated to their gods. So Lucian, in his book of sacrifices, represents the priest, τὸ αἷμα τῷ βωμῷ περιχέων, as pouring the blood upon the altar. (See Dilherrus Disput. Philolog. tom. ii. p. 253.)

Ver. 6. And he shall slay the burnt-offering.] Next followed the taking off the skin; which God ordered to be given to the priests, (vii. 8.) Though the heathen burnt skin and all, in some places, as Bochart observes out of Plutarch and Lucian in the forenamed place, (Hieroz. par. ii. lib. i. p. 324.) But whose work it was to slay the beast, is not here expressed. The Jews say it belonged not to the priests to do this, but to the man himself, who brought the beast to be offered. For (to shew in brief what belonged to the owners of the sacrifice, and what to the priests) it may be fit to note out of Abarbinel, that each of them had five things to do. The owner of the sacrifice laid his hand upon it, killed, slayed, cut it up, and washed the inwards: and then the priest received the blood in a vessel; sprinkled the blood; put fire on the altar; ordered the wood on the fire; and ordered the pieces of the sacrifice upon the wood. And that the beast might more easily be slayed, there were eight stone pillars (as the Jews tell us in Middoth, cap. 3.) and beams laid over them; in each of which there were three iron hooks fixed; that the greatest beasts might hang upon the highest, the lesser upon the middlemost, and the least of all on the lowest: and so be more commodiously stripped of their skins. Concerning this excoriation both Homer and Virgil speak, as the aforenamed Dilherrus hath observed in the same book, p. 255.

And cut it into pieces.] This followed the excoriation among the gentiles also, as the same author shews. And it was done with such accuracy, that Homer saith they dissected the sacrifice ἐπισταμένως and περιφραδέως: from whence some great men have thought St. Paul borrowed the word ὀρθοτομεῖν, to express the care the ministers of the gospel should have, in dividing rightly the word of truth, (2 Tim. ii. 15.) These pieces were not the very same in bullocks and goats, that they were in sheep, as will appear afterward; and therefore the greater care was to be used in the cutting of them; especially when, besides those parts which were offered to God, the priests and the people were to have their share also.

Ver. 7. And the sons of Aaron the priest shall put fire upon the altar.] This, as I said before, was one of the works of the priests: who did not put fire daily upon the altar, (for being once kindled, they were to keep it always burning, vi. 13.) but stirred it up, and blowed the coals. Which is meant by giving fire, as the phrase is in the Hebrew; that is, disposing it so that it might burn quick. Yet, if the fire were taken off from the altar, as when they removed the camp, (Numb. iv. 14.) none might lay it on again but the priest. Or, if it were extinct, as it was in the days of Ahaz, who shut up the door of the house of God, which was not opened till Hezekiah reigned, (2 Chron. xxviii. 24. xxix. 34.) none but they might kindle it again.

And lay the wood in order upon the fire.] This the priests did every morning and every night, that the fire might be preserved from going out. And when the time of the morning and evening sacrifice came, they brought new wood, and laid it in such order upon the fire, that it might the better consume the parts of the sacrifice that were laid thereon.

Ver. 8. And the priests, Aaron's sons, shall lay the parts, the head and the fat.] The Hebrew word peder doth not simply signify the fat (for which they have another word, cheleb), but that fat which is separated from the rest of the flesh. So it is to be understood here, and in iii. 9. iv. 35. Which being gathered together, and thrown into the fire, fed the flame, and made it burn more fiercely: by which means the other parts, into which the sacrifice was divided, were the more easily and the sooner consumed. Particularly, St. Jerome takes it for that fat which adhered to the liver: and both Solomon Jarchi and David Kimchi observe, that this peder was thrown upon the head of the sacrifice (when it was cast into the fire), just in the place where the head was cut off from the body; because, otherwise, the gore which issued from it might have extinguished the flame. (See Exod. xxix. 17.)

In order upon the wood, &c.] That they might lie upon the wood, so as to have the same situation in the altar that they had in the beast when it was alive. So Maimonides in Maase Korban, cap. 6.

Ver. 9. But his inwards and his legs shall he wash in water.] These parts were not to be burnt upon the altar till they were well cleansed by washing them in water. For which end there was a private room afterward, in the court of the temple (as now, it is likely, there was in the tabernacle), called the washing-room, (as we find in Codex Middoth, cap. 5. sect. 2.) There they having washed them privately, and freed the inwards from their filth, they brought them into the court, where there were two marble tables, between the pillars beforementioned, (ver. 6.) and there they were washed more exactly, as we read in the same book, (cap. 3. sect. 5.) Where Const. L'Empereur observes, out of R. Hobadia, the reason why they used to lay the flesh upon such tables, was, because marble made it cold and stiff, and preserved it from stinking in very hot weather.

And the priest shall burn all on the altar.] From whence this sacrifice is called ischeh, an offering made by fire (from isch, which signifies fire), because it was altogether consumed in the fire; and no part of it left, so much as for the priest to eat of it.

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] i. e. Most acceptable. For it is a form of speech taken from men, who are delighted with the good scent and taste of meat and drink. But none can reasonably imagine it was the mere sacrifice that was pleasing unto God, but, as Conrad. Pellicanus well notes, the devotion, faith, obedience, and sincerity of their minds who made the oblation.

Ver. 10. And if his offering be of the flocks, namely, of the sheep or of the goats, &c.] If a man were not able to bring a bullock for a burnt-sacrifice (which could not be so well spared, being of great use in agriculture), he might bring one of these creatures, which were of less value; only perfect in their kind, as it here follows.

He shall bring it a male without blemish.] See Exod. xii. 5. What the blemishes were, that made any animal unfit to be offered on the altar, Moses tells us in this book, xxii. 22—24. where he mentions twelve, which shall be there considered.

Ver. 11. And he shall kill it on the side of the altar northward.] The greater sacrifices, which the Jews call the most holy things, had this peculiar place assigned them, where they were to be killed, viz. all the burnt-offerings (whether of bullocks, sheep, or goats), and all offerings for sin, (vi. 25.) and all trespass-offerings, (vii. 2.) But all the other sacrifices, which they call the lesser holy things (such as the peace-offerings of particular men, the paschal lamb, the first-born, and that which was tithed), might be killed in any part of the court, where the altar stood; there being no peculiar place appointed by the law for that purpose, but only at the entrance of the tabernacle. Yet a peace-offering for the whole congregation, was looked upon as belonging to the things most holy; and so was slain (as Maimonides tells us) at the north side of the altar: where there were certain rings fixed, to which the head, or, as some say, the feet of the beast, was tied, in order to its being killed. But they were not perfect rings, as L'Empereur observes, being rather half-segments of rings, one part of which was fastened to the pavement, and by the other the neck of the beast was tied to it. (See Codex Middoth, cap. 3. sect. 5.) The reason of this difference seems to be, only to make a distinction between these and other sacrifices. And all this is to be understood of the four-footed beasts beforementioned, not of birds; which were sacrificed after another manner, as appears from ver. 15.

And the priests shall sprinkle his blood round about upon the altar.] See ver. 5. and vii. 2.

Ver. 12. And he shall cut it into his pieces, with his head and his fat, &c.] This verse hath been sufficiently explained, ver. 5, 6. 8.

Ver. 13. And he shall wash the inwards and the legs, &c.] See ver. 9. where this also is explained.

It is a burnt-sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] As much as to say, this is as acceptable to the Lord as the sacrifice of a bullock, when offered with a pious mind.

Ver. 14. And if the burnt-sacrifice for his offering to the Lord be of fowls.] It is well observed by Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46. that when a man was not able to go to the charge of a sheep or a goat (much less of a bullock), God was so merciful as to accept of a bird; only he prescribes of what sort they should be. Nay, he that was not able to be at this expense, was accepted if he offered bread, however prepared, whether in an oven or a pan, according to the custom of those times. And he to whom this was too great a burden, might worship God, by bringing only fine flour, as will appear in the next chapter.

Then he shall bring his offering of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons.] The same author observes, that there was a vast plenty of these birds in the land of Canaan; and consequently they were so cheap, that it would put the poorer sort to no great charge to bring this oblation. These were also very anciently sacrificed, (Gen. xv. 9.) and of a gentle nature, (as Procopius and others observe.) And pigeons being best when they are young, and turtles when full grown, accordingly they are appointed to bring them, when they were most esteemed. These are but seldom mentioned in the sacrifices among the gentiles, who offered cocks to Æsculapius, and geese to Isis, as we read in several of their authors.

Ver. 15 And the priest shall bring it into the altar, and wring off his head.] Pinch it off with his nail (as the Jews say) at one of the corners or horns of the altar: viz. the whole burnt-offering at the south-east corner, and the sin-offering at the north-west, as Maimonides saith in his treatise called Korbanoth, cap. 5. But their heads were so to be wrung or pinched as not to be separated quite from the body, but to be left still hanging to it. For so it is ordered in that sacrifice mentioned v. 8. and therefore they suppose it was so in all.

And the blood thereof shall be wrung out, at the sides of the altar.] This is the reason that the priest alone might kill the bird, (though others might kill the beast, see ver. 5.) because the sprinkling of the blood, which none might do but the priest, was immediately conjunct with the wringing off its head.

Ver. 16. And he shall pluck away his crop.] Or the stomach; that the sacrifice might be clean, and free from all filth.

With his feathers.] Which were no more to be offered, than the skin of the beasts, (ver. 6.)

And cast it beside the altar on the east part.] As far as might be from the most holy place, which was in the west.

By the place of the ashes.] See iv. 12.

Ver. 17. And he shall cleave it with the wings hereof, but shall not divide it asunder.] The wings were to be so cloven, as not to be quite separated from the body, but still to remain hanging to it: and so salt being sprinkled upon the whole body, it was thrown into the fire. So Maimonides observes in the forenamed treatise: where he takes notice, also, that it was otherwise in fowls offered for sin; of which nothing but the blood belonged to the altar; the flesh of them being eaten by the priests and their sons. Whence it was, that no sin-offering of birds was accepted, unless it were accompanied with a whole burnt-offering; that the altar might not be without a feast, when they that ministered there were entertained. Thus it is required in several cases, mentioned v. 7. xii. 6. 8. xiv. 22. xv. 15. 30. and Numb. vi. 11. The same Maimonides likewise observes, that this sacrifice of birds was one of the most difficult works in the sanctuary; whereby the mind of the priest was kept as intent upon the poorest sacrifice, as upon the most splendid.

And the priest shall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire.] This was in part said before, but here repeated more distinctly, to shew there was no difference to be made between the sacrifices of the meanest and of the greatest.

It is a burnt-sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] The same is said of this, as of all other holocausts, (ver. 9. 15.) to shew that whether the oblation was of the greater animals or of the less, or only of birds, it made no difference in its acceptance with God: who graciously ordered these various sorts of offerings, that the poor as well as the rich might be capable to express their devotion to him, and be confident to find favour with him.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND when any will offer a meat-offering unto the Lord.] Here is a merciful provision for those, who were neither able to offer beasts of any sort, nor birds, whom God ordered to bring meal, (as was observed before on the first chapter, ver. 14.) which was called in the Hebrew language mincah, and by us translated a meat-offering: for it was a korban, or gift, as well as the foregoing, though of a lower sort. And R. Levi Barzelonita thinks this sort of mean present (as we may call it) had the name of mincah, because such offerings were very often merely voluntary; from whence whatsoever is not due among men from another is called mincah, a gift. Some of which were constant and stated, and also of a determinate quantity; being an appendix to the daily burnt-sacrifice, morning and evening, as we read Exod. xxix. 38, 39, &c. But these here spoken of were voluntary, when any man's devotion inclined him to acknowledge God, and implore his Divine blessing. And no certain quantity was prescribed; only the Jews say, not less than an ephah was accepted, but as much more as they pleased. See Dr. Outram in his excellent book De Sacrificiis, p. 90.

His offering shall be of fine flour.] viz. Of wheat-flour. For all the offerings of this kind, whether for the whole congregation, or particular men, were of pure wheat-flour, sifted from the bran; except only the omer of first-fruits of their harvest, (xxiii. 13, 14.) and that which was called the mincha of jealousy, (Numb. v. 15.) which were of barley. Of these voluntary offerings there were five sorts, as appears by this chapter: for they were either of raw meal (mentioned in this verse), or meal made into cakes, baked in an oven, (which was of two sorts, ver. 4.) or baked in a pan, (ver. 5.) or in a frying-pan, (ver. 7.) The first of which was the most ancient, as appears from Gen. iv. 3. and from what the heathen say of it; particularly Plato, lib. vi. de Legibus, and Pliny, lib. xxx. Nat. Hist. cap. 5. where he saith Numa ordered the Romans Deos fruge colere, &c. And Pausanias, in his Attica, tells us, in the porch of the most high Jupiter there was an altar, where they did not offer the sacrifice of beasts, but only of fine flour. The same he repeats in his Arcadica, and says this was ordained by Cecrops, that they should sacrifice only πέμματα ἐπιχώρια, which the Athenians in his time called πέλανοι. And accordingly Triptolemus, another of their most ancient lawgivers, enacted this as one of his principal laws, that they should worship their gods with the fruits of the earth. For these three laws of his, Porphyry saith, were preserved to his days, Γονεῖς τιμᾶν, Θεοὺς καρποῖς ἀγάλλειν, Ζῶα μὴ σίνεσθαι: (lib. iv. περὶ Αποχ) to honour their parents, worship their gods with the fruits of the earth, and hurt no living creature. Which last St. Jerome (lib. ii. contra Jovin.) translates, not to eat flesh.

And he shall pour oil upon it.] Which was done to give this sort of offering a grateful relish, as Maimonides observes, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 46. The heathen used oil in their sacrifices, but not mixed with flour; but poured upon the flesh of the beast that was sacrificed, to make it burn the better upon the altar. So that of Virgil shews, (Æneid. vi.)

" Pingue superque oleum fundens ardentibus extis."

And put frankincense thereon.] To make a sweet odour in the court of the tabernacle, which otherwise would have been offensive, by reason of the flesh that was burnt there daily, as the same Maimonides speaks in the place beforenamed. When they came into the land of Canaan, where they were required (Numb. xv. 2, 3, &c.) to take care that this mincah, or meat-offering, should attend all the free-will-offerings of beasts, as well as the daily morning and evening sacrifice, there is no frankincense appointed; but a certain quantity of wine, which perhaps was instead of it (having a fragrant smell), and was not required in the offering here mentioned. Both these were common in the sacrifices of the gentiles, as appears by this single passage in Ovid. lib. v. de Tristibus, Eleg. 5.

"Da mihi thura, puer, pingues facientia flammas, Quodque pio fusum stridat in igne merum."

Ver. 2. And he shall bring it.] In a silver dish, or of some other metal, (as R. Levi of Barcelona expounds it, Præcept. cxvi.) wherein he delivered it to the priest, who carried it to the altar, and presented it to God by lifting it up over his head; and, as the Jews generally say, turning it about to all the four quarters of the world, in token that it was offered to the Possessor of heaven and of earth.

To Aaron's sons, the priests.] To one of them that ministered at the altar that day this offering was brought, as appears by the next words.

And he shall take thereout his handful of the flour thereof.] As much as he could take up between his fingers, saith the forenamed R. Levi.

And of the oil thereof.] Which was mingled, as I said before, with the flour.

With all the frankincense thereof.] None of which was to be reserved for the priest's own use; but entirely burnt upon the altar. Which was contrary to the way of the gentiles, who called frankincense προσφιλέστατον τοῖς θεοῖς, (as Diodorus Siculus speaks, lib. ii.) a thing most beloved of the gods, but yet offered only so much as they could take up with two fingers, or, as others say, three. (See Cuperus's Apotheosis Homeri, p. 74, &c.)

And the priest shall burn the memorial thereof upon the altar.] As a grateful acknowledgment unto God, that they held all they possessed of him their sovereign Lord; whom they supplicated also hereby, that he would still be mindful of them, that is, be gracious to them. For this offering seems to have something of the nature of a holocaust, or whole burnt-offering: though others will have it to be an expiatory sacrifice, because part of it was eaten by the priests. But it being said in the next words, to be an offering made by fire, (which is the phrase for a whole burnt-offering, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 9. 13. 17.) I take the other to be the truer.

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] The very same being said of this sort of offering, which is of the foregoing, that was more chargeable, (i. 9. 13. 17.) Procopius Gazæus had great reason here to observe (which cannot be too oft repeated), "that true piety is not demonstrated by the greatness of its presents. The way of piety is open and easy unto all: for God's commandment is exceeding broad. And he that maketh the smallest signification of it, if it be sincere, differs nothing from him, who shews it by the largest gifts," &c. So vain were the reasonings of the heathen, who disputed which were the most acceptable sacrifices to their gods, those of living creatures, or of things inanimate. Julian contended that τιμιώτερα τῶν ἀψύχων ἐστὶ τὰ ἔμψυχα, &c. the sacrifices of living creatures were more esteemed, than of those without life; because they were nearer of kin to the living God, and the Author of life. But his great doctors, Pythagoras and Porphyrius (as St. Cyril observes, lib. x. contra Julianum), condemned these sacrifices of beasts, as hateful to their gods; who they fancied were pleased only with those that were made διὰ καρπῶν καὶ λιβανωτοῦ, of fruits of the earth, and of frankincense. But they might have learnt from Moses, if they had pleased (Julian and Porphyry being acquainted with his books), that these things were alike acceptable, God having respect to the mind of him that offered, not to his gifts.

Ver. 3. And the remnant of the meat-offering shall be Aaron's and his sons'.] To be eaten by them. But that meat-offering which was offered for the priests themselves, was to be wholly burnt, and no part eaten, (vi. 22, 23.)

It is a thing most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.] Nothing is more known than the distinction which the Jews make between things most holy and the lighter holy things (as their phrase is), which I took notice of before. The most holy were such, as none whatsoever might eat of; or none but the priests, and the sons of priests; and that only in the sanctuary, and no where else: (see vi. 16. 26.) such were all whole burnt-offerings, all the sin-offerings, and all the peace-offerings for the whole congregation. The lighter holy things were such, as might be eaten by those who were not priests, in any place within the city of Jerusalem (to which their camp now answered), and such were all the peace-offerings of particular persons, the paschal lamb, the tenth and the firstlings of cattle.

Ver. 4. And if thou bring an oblation of a meat-offering baken in the oven.] This is the first sort of baked minchas, for the preparing of which there was an oven in the court of the tabernacle, as afterward there was in the court of the temple, (1 Chron. xxiii. 28, 29. Ezek. xlvi. 20.)

It shall be unleavened cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or unleavened wafers anointed with oil.] If the cakes were thick, then the oil was kneaded together with them: but if they were thin (like a wafer) then it was only spread upon it, before it was baked, (see Exod. xxix. 2.) or, as some will have it, after it came out of the oven. Concerning its being unleavened, see below, ver. 11.

Ver. 5. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baken in a pan.] Or in a flat plate, as we translate it in the margin. For Maimonides says, this was the difference between macabath (which is the Hebrew word in this place) and marchesheth, that the former was a pan or plate without any rim about it; and the other had one, as our frying-pans have. And so Abarbinel, in his preface to this book, observes out of Jarchi, that there was a vessel in the temple, which was only flat and broad, but had no rising on the sides of it: so that the oil being poured upon it, when it was set on the fire, ran down and increased the flame, and made the cake hard.

It shall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil.] This sort of cake seems to have been both kneaded with oil, and to have had oil also poured upon it, after it was laid upon the plate.

Ver. 6. Thou shalt part it in pieces, &c.] This, according to Abarbinel, was done as it lay baking upon the plate. Or, if this division was made after it was taken off, the reason was the same; because part of it was to be given to God, and the rest to the priests.

And pour oil thereon.] Upon the pieces; that they might by this new addition of fresh oil be made more savoury.

It is a meat-offering.] And therefore to be eaten with oil, (ver. 1.)

Ver. 7. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baken in the frying-pan.] This vessel was not flat, but deep, (as Abarbinel observes, see ver. 5.) because that which was baked in it was moist and fluid.

It shall be made of fine flour with oil.] The oil was not kneaded with this sort of mincha, but put into the pan, so that it mixed with the flour; which might be shaken and moved up and down, as things are which are baken in liquors. So Abarbinel's words are in his preface to this book.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt bring the meat-offering that is made of these things unto the Lord, &c.] This relates to all the baked meat-offerings beforementioned, which were to be brought to the Lord at his house, and there presented to the priest; who was to bring them to the altar, when they were prepared as before directed. (See ver. 1, 2.) And this variety of minchas was allowed, that the table of the Lord (i. e. the altar) might be furnished, and his ministers that waited on him entertained with all sorts of provisions.

Ver. 9. And the priest shall take from the meat-offering a memorial thereof.] A part of the cake (of whatsoever sort it was) was separated from the rest of the Lord's portion; to whom it was offered as an acknowledgment of his supreme dominion over them, and in commemoration of his goodness to them.

And shall burn it upon the altar.] Before the other parts were eaten by the priests; as was directed before about the fine flour, (ver. 2.)

It is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 10. And that which is left of the meat-offering shall be Aaron's and his sons', &c.] All this verse has been explained, ver. 3.

Ver. 11. No meat-offering which ye shall bring unto the Lord shall be made with leaven.] These words [which ye shall bring unto the Lord] seem to have a peculiar emphasis in this place; importing, that no meat-offering, part of which was offered upon God's altar, should be leavened. For no part of that leavened bread which was offered in eucharistical sacrifices, (vii. 13.) nor the two loaves offered in the feast of Pentecost (which some mistake for an exception to this precept), were offered upon the altar, but given entirely to the priests, as their portion.

Made with leaven.] There are many moral reasons given, both by Jewish and Christian writers, why none of the cakes beforementioned should have any leaven in them, which I shall not here set down. There is some probability in their opinion, who think this was ordered to refresh their memory, by putting them in mind of their deliverance out of Egypt. But Maimonides seems to me to have given the best account of this, in his More Nevochim, (par. iii. cap. 46.) where he saith, God prohibited this to root out the idolatrous customs in those days, as he found in the books of the Zabii, who offered to their gods no bread but leavened. Next to this, the account which Abarbinel gives of it is not to be disregarded, who thinks it was forbidden, because it would have made delay, if they had waited at the tabernacle till the fermentation was perfected.

For ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire.] Neither mixed with bread, nor alone by themselves. For honey was a kind of leaven, and it is certain was used by the heathen in their religious rites: as appears not only from Maimonides (who tells us in the place forenamed, that they chose sweet things for their offerings, and anointed their sacrifices with honey), but from a great number of other authors, who make mention of it: particularly Plato, who saith, (in his de Legibus vi.) that anciently men did not sacrifice living creatures, but only fine flour, καὶ μέλιτι καρποὶ δεδευμένοι, and fruits moistened with honey. And so Phylarchus tells us, (in Athenæus's Deipnos. lib. xv.) that the Greeks sacrificed honey to the sun (which was the great God among the gentiles) but poured no wine upon his altars. Which Polemon (in Suidis) calls Νηφάλιον θυσίαν, a sober sacrifice; because there was no wine in it, but honey and water mixed together. Nay, there was scarce any god among the heathen to whom honey was not offered, as Bochartus hath shewn at large in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 12. But one testimony may serve for all, which is from Pausanias (in his Eliaca), where, having reckoned up at least fifty altars in the temple of Jupiter Olympius unto several deities, and some of them common to them all, he saith, they sacrificed upon every one of them once a month, after an ancient manner (ἀρχαῖόν τινα τρόπον), frankincense and wheat mingled with honey. Which being so common and ancient a thing among the gentiles in their idolatrous worship, was the reason, it is likely, that God forbade it to be used in his sacrifices. And under the name of honey, the Jews think figs and dates, and all other sweet fruits, are comprehended. For the famous composition among the Egyptians called Κῦφι, which was burnt every day, morning and evening, on their altars, consisted of such things, as well as of myrrh, calamus, and cardamum. So Plutarch tells us (in his book de Iside et Osir.) and mentions honey in the first place, with wine and raisins: Τὸ μὲν Κῦφι μίγμα, &c. μέλιτος καὶ οἴνου καὶ σταφίδος, &c.

Ver. 12. As for the oblation of the first-fruits, ye shall offer them unto the Lord, but they shall not be burnt on the altar for a sweet savour.] There were several sorts of first-fruits, (as I observed Exod. xxiii. 19.) That which is here spoken of was of the corn unground, only a little parched at the fire, which was to be presented unto God; but not burnt on the altar, because they belonged to the priests.

Ver. 13. And every oblation of thy meat-offering shalt thou season with salt.] All the forenamed minchas, which were korbans (as they are often here called), were to be thus seasoned, because salt was a thing never wanting at any table; and all meat is unsavoury without it.

Neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat-offerings.] It is called the salt of the covenant of God, as some think, because required by this law, which they covenanted with God to observe, as much as to offer sacrifices; which were not acceptable without salt, as appears from the repetition of it three times in this one verse. But there is a plainer reason than this, which is, that the sacrifices being God's feasts, and they that did partake of them being his guests, who did in a manner eat and drink with him at his table; the salt that was cast upon all sacrifices (as appears by the words following) is called the salt of the covenant, to signify, that as men were wont to make covenants by eating and drinking together (where salt is never wanting at their tables, but a necessary appendix at every feast), so God by these sacrifices, and the feasts upon them, did ratify and confirm his covenant with those that did partake of them. For salt, as is commonly observed, being a constant concomitant of all feasts, and covenants being made by eating and drinking at the same table, where salt was ever used; thence salt itself was counted by the ancients to be the symbol of friendship, and proverbially used among the Greeks to express it. By which other places may be explained, about which some have bestowed vain labour, Numb. xxiii. 19. 2 Chron. xiii. 5. where the same words are used, but inverted; it being called a covenant of salt (instead of the salt of the covenant), because covenants, as I said, were established by eating together, where salt is never wanting.

With all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt.] Not only with the minchas, or meat-offerings, mentioned in this chapter, but with all other sacrifices whatsoever. Which is so solemnly enjoined (as Maimonides says in the place beforenamed), because the heathen did not use any salt in their sacrifices. Which is not unreasonable to think, since honey (with which salt doth not well agree) was in such constant use among them. And therefore, saith he, God prohibited us to offer leaven or honey, and commanded us, with great seriousness, to use salt in all our sacrifices. That is, as R. Levi of Barcelona explains it, (Præcept. cxvi.) the flesh of all sacrifices was to be salted; and the meal of all minchas. For which he gives these two reasons; because nothing is grateful to the palate without salt; which also preserves things from corruption, as the sacrifices did their souls from perishing. Abarbinel saith the same. And therefore, whatsoever the custom might be in ancient time among the heathen, in after-ages they learned from Moses to use it in all their sacrifices: as appears from Pliny and Ovid (and many other authors), the first of which says, that salt was so necessary, that no sacrifices were offered sine mola salsa: which every one knows the Greeks called οὐλὰς and οὐλοχύτας. And, among the Jews, this salt was not brought by him that offered the sacrifice, but was provided at the public charge; there being a chamber in the court of the temple (as we read in Middoth, cap. 5. sect. 2.) called the chamber of salt. Which was one of the three rooms on the north side of the court (as there were three others on the south side, for other uses), where the flesh of the sacrifices was powdered, as the minchas were seasoned at the very altar. And this was so necessary, that though a sacrifice was not looked upon as null, if the priest neglected to salt it; yet the want of it in the minchas (as the Hebrew doctors say) made them void; because it is here so expressly required in this verse, Thou shalt not suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking in thy meat-offering. And whosoever offered any sacrifice without salt, or with honey or leaven, was beaten, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13.

Ver. 14. And if thou offer a meat-offering of thy first-fruits unto the Lord, thou shalt offer for thy meat-offering, &c.] This is very different from the oblation of first-fruits mentioned ver. 12. For there they are called resith, which signifies the first-fruits at harvest-time: but here bichurim, which properly imports the first ripe fruits, before the rest were ready. And therefore the manner of their oblation was different from the former, which follows in the conclusion of this verse. And first he describes what he means by the first-fruits, which he calls abib, i. e. full ears of corn, but as yet green and moist: which he saith therefore in the next place must be dried by the fire; and then bruised and beaten in a mortar, or with a mill: and they were to be brought out of the richest or fattest of their fields: for so the last words seem to signify garesh carmel (which we translate corn beaten out of full ears), for carmel sometimes signifies a fruitful field, (Isa. xxxii. 15.) and therefore may very well be thought in this place to import, the largest ears of tender corn. And the intention of its contusion seems to have been, that it might be reduced into flour; as it might easily be, after it had been dried by the fire. And therefore differed from that meat-offering mentioned ver. 1. only in this; that the former was flour of old corn, this of new: and that was fine flour sifted from the bran; this had nothing taken out of it, but remained as it came from the mortar or the mill. And so the LXX. seem to have understood it. There are those, indeed, who think it was only thrashed out of the husk, and so offered; and fancy also that from this word geresh, the goddess called Ceres had her name among the gentiles. Which last conceit is the stranger, since they endeavour to have it thought that the Jews derived this custom of offering first-fruits from the gentiles; and not the gentiles from the Jews. Whereas the gentiles had no such custom, that I can find, as this, to offer the first-fruits of green corn; but only the first-fruits of their harvest, which they called novas fruges: of which the Romans thought it unlawful to taste, "antequam sacerdotes primitias libassent," before the priests had offered the first-fruits, as Pliny tells us, lib. xviii. cap. 2. and Censorinus saith the same, cap. 1. de Die Natali. Or if they did offer any first-fruits before corn was ripe, they boiled them in a pot; but did not roast them in the fire, as is here directed. For so Hesychius seems to say, that in the feast called Θαργήλια (which was in the month that answers to our April), they offered τὰς ἀπαρχὰς τῶν φαινομένων, καὶ περικομίζουσι, the first-fruits that appeared out of the ground, which they carried about, i. e. in pots, as other authors tell us. And Hesychius himself saith, that Θάργαλος signified a pot full of sacred decoction.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt put oil upon it, &c.] See ver. 1.

Ver. 16. And the priest shall burn the memorial of it, part of the beaten corn thereof, and part of the oil, and all the frankincense.] All the rest that was not burnt was the priest's portion, except the frankincense, which is here ordered to be entirely offered to God, (see ver. 2.) and made this, and such-like offerings, be called an offering of a sweet savour unto the Lord, ver. 2. 9. 12.

It is an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] See upon ver. 9.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND if his oblation be a sacrifice of peace-offering.] Having given orders about whole burnt-offerings, in the first chapter, and meat-offerings (which had something of that nature in them) in the second; he proceeds to peace-offerings, which in the Hebrew are called schelamim, from the word schalam, either as it signifies retribution, or peace and concord. They that take it in the first sense, think the reason of the name to be from this; that God, the offerer, and the priest, had each of them their portion assigned to them of this sacrifice. And they that follow the second sense do not much differ, when they say, that these sacrifices were symbols of friendship between God, and the priests, and those that brought them; for all these feasted at a common table, as R. Levi ben Gersom expresses it. For part being offered on the altar, and the priest having taken his share, the rest was given to him that offered the sacrifice. So that it was called a peace-offering, saith Abarbinel (in his preface to this book), because it made peace (or rather declared peace) between the altar, the priest, and the owner. But they seem to me to have given the best account of this, who, because peace in their language signifies prosperity and happiness, think these were called peace-offerings, because they were principally thankful acknowledgments of mercies received from God's bounty. For there being three sorts of them mentioned vii. 15, 16. that of thanksgiving is the first, called tothah, acknowledgment of some benefit received.

The gentiles called such sacrifices χαριστήριοι, as appears from many places of Dionys. Halicarn. (lib. vi. and lib. viii.) where there are these words, θυσίας τε χαριστηρίους τοῖς θεοῖς ἐποιοῦντο, καὶ ἦσαν ἅπαντες ἐν ἑορταῖς καὶ εὐπαθείαις. Plutarch calls them, εὐαγγέλια, particularly in the life of Agesilaus, where he saith, ἔθυσεν εὐαγγέλια, καὶ διέπεμπε μερίδας τοῖς φίλοις ἀπὸ τῶν τεθυμένων· which is a perfect description of such sacrifices as are here appointed; with part of which they entertained their friends. They are also called by those writers ἐκβατήρια, especially when they had respect to any great danger they had escaped; for which they offered these thankful acknowledgments. The LXX. call such sacrifices σοτήρια.

If he offer it of the herd, whether it be a male or female.] A whole burnt-offering was to be only of a male: for being wholly God's, and offered purely for his honour, it was to be of the very best, (i. 3.) But peace-offerings being also for the profit of him that offered them, who had the greatest share of them; it was at his liberty whether he would offer a male or a female. Directly contrary to the Egyptian customs, if they were the same now, that they were in the time of Herodotus, who saith expressly, θηλείας οὔ σφι ἔξεστι θύειν, it was not lawful among them to sacrifice females, (lib. ii. cap. 41.)

He shall offer it without blemish, &c.] See i. 3.

Ver. 2. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering.] The man who brought the offering was to lay his hand upon the head of it; as was ordered in the whole burnt-offering and sin-offering, (see ch. i. ver. 4.) It might not be done by a deputy, unless he was heir to one that had vowed this sacrifice, and died before he had performed it; in which case the heir was to do what the man himself should have done, if he had been alive, as Maimonides observes. In this sacrifice, laying on of hands seems to have been done, not only with prayer to God, that he would accept the oblation (which the Jews say always accompanied this action), but with acknowledgment of those mercies which were the occasion of it. So Conr. Pellicanus well glosses upon i. 4. (which may be best applied to the use of this rite in peace-offerings): "Laying on of hands signifies devotion and faith, with acknowledgment of the Divine benefits; for which we cannot offer any thing of our own, but rather return and restore to him what we have received; that we may understand giving of thanks to be the greatest of our sacrifices."

And kill it.] See chap. i. ver. 5.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] These being the lesser holy things, as the Jews call them, were not offered as the whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings were, on the north side of the altar, (see chap. i. ver. 11.) but any where else near to the entrance of the tabernacle; which was in the east, where the ashes were thrown out, and therefore a less holy place. Only in laying on of hands, every man was bound, wheresoever the sacrifice was killed, to turn his face westward, towards the sanctuary; because then, as I said, he made certain prayers and acknowledgments to the Divine Majesty, which was always to be done in that posture.

And Aaron's sons, the priests, shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.] See chap. i. ver. 5.

Ver. 3. And he shall offer.] One of the priests then in waiting at the altar.

Of the sacrifices of the peace-offerings, &c.] After the sacrifices were flayed and cut up, as is directed i. 6.

The fat that covereth the inwards.] That is, the omentum as the Latins call it, and hath much fat in it. (See Exod. xxix. 13.)

And all the fat that is upon the inwards.] All the fat which adheres to the mesentery, and other entrails.

Ver. 4. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them.] The kidneys are noted by Aristotle to have more fat about them than any of the other bowels: Ἔχουσι δὲ οἱ νεφροὶ μάλιστα τῶν σπλάγχνων πιμελήν, (lib. iii. de Animal. cap. 9.) being so covered with it, that, in dissecting of a body, the kidneys, at first sight, are not to be perceived, as anatomists observe; particularly our own countryman, Dr. Highmore.

Which is by the flanks.] The Hebrew word cesilim signifies the loins, (as Bochart hath demonstrated in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45.) which have collops of fat upon them, as Eliphaz speaks, (Job xv. 27.) and thence are easily inflamed, (Psalm xxxviii. 7.)

And the caul above the liver.] The Hebrew word jothereth signifies the greatest lobe of the liver. (See Exod. xxix. 13.)

It shall he take away.] Separate from the rest of the flesh, to be offered on the altar. For all the fat here mentioned was God's portion of the sacrifice: the priest had the breast and the right shoulder; and he that brought the offering had the rest; as will appear more fully, vii. 15, &c. 31, 32, &c.

Ver. 5. And Aaron's sons.] Some of those that minister that day.

Shall burn it on the altar upon the burnt-sacrifice.] By the burnt-sacrifice seems here to be meant the daily sacrifice, which was burnt every morning: after which this was to be offered, but not before it.

Which is upon the wood that is on the fire.] The same wood, upon which the burnt-sacrifice had been offered, would serve to burn this fat. Which being entirely consumed, as the holocausts were, it is called in the following words, "an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord." (See chap. i. ver. 9.) That is, God was pleased graciously to accept their pious acknowledgments: the offerings of these inwards being, as if he that brought them had said, I will pour out my soul unto the Lord in thanks and praise for the benefits he had received. So Abarbinel explains it in his preface to this book.

Ver. 6. And if his offerings, &c. be of the flock.] i. e. Of sheep or goats, which are both comprehended under the word flock, (as was noted before, chap. i. ver. 2.)

Male or female.] See ver. 1. where I observed a difference between these sacrifices and whole burnt-offerings, in this respect; that either male or female were accepted for peace-offerings, but male alone for the other. To which may be added, that birds were allowed for whole burnt-offerings, (i. 14, 15, &c.) but not for peace-offerings: which were only of the herd or flock; i. e. of bullocks, sheep, or goats. The reason seems to be plain; because peace-offerings being to be divided between God, the priest, and him that brought them, the portion of each would have been so small, that it would have made the feast upon it so very meagre and jejune, that it would have been contemptible.

He shall offer it without blemish.] It was at his choice whether he would bring it from the herd or the flock: but in its kind it was to be perfect. (See chap. i. 3. 9.)

Ver. 7. If he offer a lamb for his offering.] Though a bird was not accepted for a peace-offering, yet a lamb was; though not of such value as a fat sheep, or a goat.

Then shall he offer it before the Lord.] This seems to be meant of the man's presenting it to be offered at the altar.

Ver. 8. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, &c.] This whole verse is only a direction to do with a peace-offering of a lamb or sheep, as they were to do with that of a bullock, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 9. And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering, an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] As was directed in the offering of a bullock, (ver. 3.)

The fat thereof, and the whole rump.] The whole fat being to be offered (as was ordered also before) he enumerates the particulars; because in this was more fat, than in other sacrifices of this kind. For the whole rump of a sheep was to be offered to God, though not of a bullock, nor a goat. And the reason was, because in those countries the tails of their sheep are so vastly big, that (as Golius and others assure us) the least of them weigh ten or twelve pounds; and some exceed forty pounds weight: and they are so very fat, that they melt the fat and keep it to butter their rice, and for other uses, as Bochartus observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45.

It shall he take off hard by the back-bone.] The Hebrew word atzah, which we translate the back-bone, denotes that part which is next to the tail or rump: and therefore must signify that which Galen calls κόκκυξ. Which is a bone at the extremity of the broad bone, called os sacrum; consisting of three cartilaginous parts, as he describes it.

And the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 10. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, &c.] This verse is explained above, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 11. And the priest shall burn it upon the altar.] As he did the fat of the bullock, (ver. 5.)

It is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord.] That which was offered upon the altar was accounted God's mess, as appears from Malachi i. 12. where the altar is called his table, and the sacrifice upon it his meat: as here it is called his bread or food; to represent in a lively manner to them, that God dwelt, and (as we say) kept house among them; and that they who partook of these sacrifices, feasted with him upon his provision. (See upon Exod. xxv. 8. 30.)

Ver. 12. And if his offering be a goat, &c.] The law concerning this sacrifice is the very same with the former (except what is ordered about the rump of a sheep), and this and the following verses (13—15.) need no farther explication.

Ver. 16. And the priest shall burn it upon the altar: it is the food of the offering, &c.] See before, ver. 11.

All the fat is the Lord's.] That is, all the fat beforementioned; which may more properly be translated the suet. For that fat which was a part of the flesh might be eaten, (as appears from many places, particularly Deut. xxxii. 14.) but not that which only lay upon it, and might be separated from it; which was burnt upon the altar, when they sacrificed either a bullock, sheep, or goat. And when they killed any of these, or other clean creatures, for their food at home, still they were to forbear to eat the suet; partly out of reverence to God, whose portion it was at the altar; and partly because it was heavy and too strong a food, as Maimonides takes it, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 48.) And it seems therefore to have been offered upon the altar, because it was so unctuous, that it would easily burn, and make the flesh also consume the sooner. But from its being God's part, it came thence to signify, the very best and most excellent of any kind of thing. As the best of the tithe is called the fat of the tithe, Numb. xviii. 17. and the best corn is called the fat of the wheat, Psal. lxxxi. 16. and rich and powerful men are called the fat upon earth; as the chief and principal part of the people, Psal. xxii. 29.

Ver. 17. It shall be a perpetual statute.] In force as long as this law about sacrifices shall last.

For your generations.] For their posterity, as well as them who received this law in all succeeding ages.

Throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.] This confirms what was said before, that they might not eat such fat as is beforementioned, at home, at their ordinary food; because it is said, throughout all your dwellings ye shall eat no fat. And fat being joined with blood, is another argument, that they might no more eat the suet of beasts that were killed at home, for common use, than the blood of such beasts. From which they entirely abstained, for the foregoing reasons, as Maimonides observes in the book forenamed; and for another also which he mentions in the forty-sixth chapter of it. Where he saith, "The ancient idolaters, called Zabii, were wont to eat the blood of their sacrifices, because they imagined this to be the food of their gods; with whom they thought they had such communion, by eating of their meat, that they revealed to them things to come." And in this R. Moses bar Nachman concurs with him, as Dr. Cudworth observes in the conclusion of his treatise of the Right Notion of the Lord's Supper. For though he saith that blood was forbidden, because it served for expiation (in which he differs from Maimonides), yet he adds also, that it was used superstitiously by the heathen in their idolatrous worship; where "they partook of the blood with their demons, as being their guests, and invited to eat with them at their table. And so were joined in federal society with them; and by this kind of communion enabled to prophesy and foretell things to come."

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Having directed him about whole burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings (which constantly attended some of them), and peace-offerings, which supposed men to be in a state of favour with God; he now proceeds to give order about the expiation of their sins, when they had offended him, by doing contrary to his commands; which he continues to the fourteenth verse of the fifth chapter. And this law about sin-offerings, seems to have been delivered to Moses at a different time from the former; being about a different matter; but by a voice speaking to him out of the tabernacle, as before, (chap. i. 1.)

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a soul shall sin through ignorance, &c.] There are three conditions expressed in this verse, of the sin for which the following sacrifice was admitted. First, It was to be committed ignorantly; not wittingly and presumptuously. Secondly, It was for sin against a negative precept (as the Jews call them), i. e. such a commandment as forbade something to be done. So it is said here expressly, concerning things which ought not to be done. As for the omission of such things as were commanded to be done, they might be performed some other time, when men had better bethought themselves; which was much more acceptable to God, than offering sacrifice for the omission. And thirdly, It was for facts committed, not for words or thoughts; so the last words are, and shall do against any of them. As for the sins which men might imprudently commit in word and in thought, they were so many, that the whole flocks and herds would not have sufficed for their expiation, nor the altar contained all such sacrifices. The Jews add a fourth condition, that the sacrifice here appointed was such facts, as if they had been committed wittingly, a cereth, i. e. cutting off, was threatened to them by the law: which they gather from Numb. xv. 30. But that phrase, with a high hand, seems not to signify any sort of sin, but a certain manner of sinning: as when a man despised God's commandments, and brought contempt upon the law by his sins, as a very learned friend of mind, now with God, hath observed. And, therefore, it is probable all sins committed ignorantly were expiated by the following sacrifices, save only those which are appointed to be expiated by other sacrifices, or after another manner. (See Dr. Outram de Sacrificiis, lib. i, cap. 12. n. 2—4.)

Ver. 3. If the priest that is anointed do sin.] And first he prescribes the sacrifice which he who was to make the great expiation for all the people, should offer for himself, viz. the high-priest: who only, of all the priests, was constantly anointed at the entrance of his office. And if, after he was put out of his office, he committed any such sin as is here mentioned, he was to make this offering for his expiation, as much as if he had continued in it. So Mr. Selden observes out of the Misna, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. n. 14.

According to the sin of the people.] In the manner beforementioned. Or, as R. Solomon interprets it, if he hide any thing from the people, whereby they err. For so the words run in the Hebrew, if he sin to the guilt of the people (or to the making them guilty), either by misinforming them, or drawing them into error by his example; so that they take a thing to be clean, which is indeed unclean, or the like.

Then let him bring for his sin which he hath sinned, a young bullock without blemish.] It is observed by some, that in great offences the sacrifices were small; lest they should imagine their pardon was procured by their great expense. For here the word is par ben bachur, a young bullock, that was but a little bigger than a calf. And so this sacrifice is called (par) in the following verses. Whereas that of the peace-offering is called (ver. 10.) shor, an ox (though we translate it also bullock), one that was grown to its full bigness, and consequently of greater value.

For a sin-offering.] How chattah, which we translate sin-offering, differs from ascham, which we translate trespass-offering, I shall examine afterward, when Moses came to speak of the latter; and now only observe, that chattah is the name both for sin, and for the sin-offering: as the word piaculum was among the heathen; which signified both a great crime, and the expiatory sacrifice for it. By which those words in the New Testament may be explained, "Christ was made sin for us;" that is, a sacrifice to expiate our sins. And so the word ἁμαρτία, sin, certainly signifies, Rom. viii. 3.

Ver. 4. And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord.] This, as I take it, was to be done by himself; who was to present the sacrifice to the Divine Majesty, and desire it might be accepted for the purpose to which it was to be offered.

And shall lay his hand upon the bullock's head.] As every one that brought other offerings was bound to do, (see chap. i. 4. iii. 2, &c.) but here for another purpose; viz. to confess their sins unto the Lord, and beseech him to forgive them. (See v. 5.) There is a good gloss upon this, in a very bad book called Nitzachon, not long ago published by the learned Wagenseil: where that author saith, (p. 11.) "When a man sacrificed a beast, he was to think in his mind, I am more a beast than this here present. For I have sinned, and for the sins I have committed, I offer this: but it were more just that he who hath sinned should suffer death, than this beast (which hath not offended): therefore thus a man, by the help of this sacrifice, began to repent."

And kill the bullock before the Lord.] This seems to have been done by him that laid his hand on the head of the bullock, that is, by the hand of the high-priest himself. For the greatest men, in old time, did not think such work below them; but rather esteemed every thing that served to the worship of God, to be noble and honourable. So Homer represents king Agamemnon as killing the lambs himself; by the blood of which he was to seal the treaty he made with the Trojans; (Iliad. 3.) yet in this case, it is likely, the high-priest himself did not kill the sacrifices, but some of the other priests that then ministered. For he that did this seems to be distinguished, by the next words, (ver. 5.) from the priest that is anointed; i. e. the high-priest. Nor was this sacrifice killed in the ordinary place where sin-offerings were killed, (see 24.) being an extraordinary sort of offering, as that which follows also was.

Ver. 5. And the priest that is anointed.] Whoever killed the sacrifice, the high-priest himself, for whom it was offered, did what follows.

Shall take of the bullock's blood.] In a bason.

And bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation.] Into the very sanctuary; where, as it follows, he was to dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord.

Ver. 6. And the priest shall dip his finger in the blood.] Or rather, dip it into the blood.

And sprinkle of the blood seven times before the Lord.] This was peculiar to his sacrifice for sin, and done in no other but that for the whole congregation. To signify, perhaps, that their offences were more heinous, and could not be so easily expiated, as those of other men. The number seven, every one knows, was of great account, and thought most powerful in religious actions, even among the heathen. For as Elisha bade Naaman go and wash seven times in Jordan, to cure him of his leprosy; so Apuleius, in the beginning of the eleventh book of his Metamorphosis, speaks of dipping the head seven times in the sea for purification, and gives the reason for it; "Quod eum numerum præcipue religioni aptissimum divinus ille Pythagoras prodidit;" because the Divine Pythagoras (as he calls him) taught this number to be above all other most proper in religion. Which, in all probability, Pythagoras learnt from the truly Divine Moses: to whom God revealed the creation of the world, in six days, and his consecrating the seventh day, on which he rested; which made the number seven so much used in sacred matters. For not only in this sacrifice, but in making the water of separation by burning a red heifer, this rite was used, (Numb. xix. 4.) and in purging a leper, (Lev. xiv. 7.) in dedicating the altar, (Exod. xxix. 37.) when the oil was sprinkled on it seven times, (Lev. viii. 11.) and at the consecration of the priests; (Exod. xxix. 35.) and, to say no more, as every seventh day of the week was holy, so every seventh year the land rested; and after seven times seven there was a jubilee, (Levit. xxv.) They that would see more of this number, and of its sacramenta, as St. Jerome speaks, may read him upon Amos v. 3. and Drusius on this place, and on Josh. vi. 4. and Wolfius upon Nehemiah viii.

Before the veil of the sanctuary.] Which parted the holy place from the most holy. For that is peculiarly called by the name of porocheth, which is the word here used, (xxvi. 31. 33. 35. Lev. xvi. 2, &c.) as the other veil, which was before the door of the tabernacle, is constantly called masach, (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37.)

Ver. 7. And the priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense, &c.] This also was peculiar to his sacrifice; and to that for the whole congregation, (ver. 17.)

And shall pour out all the blood of the bullock.] That is, all the rest of the blood which remained after the sprinkling before the mercy-seat; and the tipping of the horns of the altar with it.

At the bottom of the altar of the burnt-offering.] Where, after the building of the temple, there were two holes; one on the west side of the altar, the other on the south, (as the Jews tell us in Middoth, cap. 3. sect. 2.) by which it is conveyed into a canal under ground, through which it ran into the brook Kidron. And there was only this difference (they say) about these two holes, that the blood of the sin-offering (any part of which was carried into the most holy place) was poured out only into that on the west side of the foundation of the altar. And, if we may believe the Jews, the gardeners bought this blood of those that were the treasurers of the temple, to enrich their ground with it, as Constantine L'Empereur there observes. And while they were in the wilderness, and all the time they had only a moveable tabernacle, it is most likely there were receptacles made under ground, with conveyances to some distant place, where it sank into the earth, or was covered with dust, as other blood is commanded to be, (xvii. 13.) For Maimonides thinks the pouring out the blood (so that it might not remain in one place) which is constantly and strictly required by the law, was in opposition to an idolatrous custom of the old Zabii; who made a collection of the blood in a vessel, or in a little pit, about which they sat, and ate the flesh, imagining their gods feasted upon the blood; as I noted before out of Maimonides, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.)

Which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] For there was the place of it, as hath been observed, Exod. xl. 6.

Ver. 8. And he shall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the sin-offering, &c.] All that follows in this and the two next verses, (ver. 9, 10.) is the same that was ordered to be done about peace-offerings, as appears from ver. 10. See therefore the foregoing chapter, ver. 3—5.

Ver. 11. And the skin of the bullock, and all his flesh, with his head, and with his legs, and his inwards, &c.] This sacrifice was so laborious, to work in them a greater detestation of sin; which was aggravated by the quality of the person that committed it. And Nachmanides hath an observation, which (in some parts of it, at least) is very remarkable; "That all a man doth, being performed in words, in works, or thoughts, God commanded them, when they brought an offering for sin, that they should lay their hands on it, which had respect to the works they had done; and make confession over it, which had respect to their words; and burn the inwards and kidneys, which are the organs of thoughts and desires; the legs, also, had a respect to a man's hands and feet, by which he doth all his work; and the blood that was sprinkled on the altar signified his own blood. So that while a man did all these things, he was put in mind how he had sinned against God, both in soul and body, and deserved to have his blood shed, and his body burnt; unless the mercy of the Creator had accepted a price of redemption for him, viz. a sacrifice; whose blood was for his blood, and its life for his life; and the principal members of the sacrifice, for the members of his body." By which it appears, that the best sort of Jews had a sense, that the sacrifices for sin were offered to God in their stead, as a ransom for them. And so we Christians are to understand the sacrifice which Christ made of himself, who "gave himself a ransom for us all," as the apostle speaks, 1 Tim. ii. 6. and our Lord saith the same, Matt. xx. 28. Mark x. 45. Such sacrifices the heathens themselves had, which they called Lustralia, from the word lustrare, which signifies to expiate among the Romans; and that by paying a price. For the ancient poet Ennius (as our excellent Mr. Thorndike hath observed), translating into Latin a Greek tragedy called Ἑκτοροςλύτρα (being taken out of Homer, where he speaks of Priamus ransoming of Hector's corpse from Achilles), entitled Hectoris lustra, (which shews this is the Latin of λύτρον,) ransom or redemption: and that ἀπολυτρόω signifies in the New Testament to deliver by paying a ransom, see his Epilogue, book ii. chap. 27.

Ver. 12. Even the whole bullock shall he carry forth without the camp.] It was not dissected, as the peace-offerings were, because nobody was to partake of any part of it; being a sacrifice for the priest's own sin. And therefore it was to be carried (though not by himself, but some other person) to be burnt without the camp, to express the abominableness of the sin. This rite, and the carrying the blood within the tabernacle, to be sprinkled before the Lord, were used only in these two cases; of the sin of the high-priest, and of all the people. For of other sin-offerings the priest might eat, (vi. 26.) but of this, being for himself, he was not to taste at all, because he was in a state of guilt.

Into a clean place, where the ashes are poured out.] On the east part of the tabernacle there was a place for the ashes to be thrown into, when they are taken from the altar; which afterward were carried into a clean place, without the camp. And so they were carried out after the temple was built at Jerusalem, at the east gate of the city, into a valley which lay between Jerusalem and Mount Olivet.

And burn him on the wood with fire.] Not upon an altar, but in a fire made with wood upon the ground, to shew the odiousness of the sin, as Maimonides thinks. For as the whole burnt-sacrifices were burnt on the altar, because they were an offering of sweet-smelling savour unto God; so this was burnt without the camp upon the ground, to shew that the odour of it was ungrateful and abominable; More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46. where he also observes, that the burning of the beast entirely, being the destruction of it, so that nothing of it remained, it signified in like manner the utter deletion of sin, so that it should be remembered no more. And the bullock being burnt without the camp, I take it to denote, that the people should not suffer for the sin of the priest, which was abolished together with his sacrifice.

The same Maimonides hath another observation upon the title Zebachim, that there were three places constituted for the burning of holy things. The first was in the sanctuary, as every one knows; the second was in the mount of the house (as they called the place round about the court of the sanctuary), where, if any blemish happened to a bullock or a goat, they were brought out of the sanctuary, and burnt in a place called Bira; the third was in this place of the ashes, without the city.

Where the ashes are poured out, there shall he be burnt.] This is repeated, that none might presume to take the liberty to burn the bullock in any other place.

Ver. 13. And if the whole congregation of Israel sin through ignorance.] The Jews generally understood by the whole congregation, the great Sanhedrin, who represented the whole people of Israel. So Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. and in his treatise of Sacrifices; and R. Levi, of Barcelona, Præcept. cxviii. For they sometimes erred in judgment; and thereby misleading the people, they were bound, when they found their error, to offer this sacrifice. Yet the Talmudists have raised many disputes upon this point, and made various cases: in some of which the house of judgment was bound to offer the sacrifice here appointed, and not they who followed their sentence: and others there were, in which they who followed their sentence were bound, and not the judges themselves. But if Moses's words be well considered, it will appear, that he speaks of a sin committed by all the people, in doing something which God had forbidden; by making wrong constructions of the law, or by common false opinions, or popular customs. For the whole congregation is here plainly distinguished from the elders of the people, (ver. 15.) which is certainly the name for their judges and governors. It was Mr. Selden's intention to have treated largely of the sense and notion of this law, as appears by what he saith of it, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 14. n. 4. where he refers his reader to the third book on that subject for an account of this place. In the beginning of which (cap. 1. n. 1.) he signifies his intention to explain what the office of the Sanhedrin was, in offering expiatory sacrifices for the whole congregation. Which he repeats again, (cap. 10. n. 1.) with this addition, that they made this sacrifice in the name of all the people, when they offended as a community. But he did not live to pursue his intentions, being diverted by long digressions about other matters: yet he shews sufficiently his opinion was, that this sacrifice was not offered for the Sanhedrin, but by them for the people.

And the thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly.] They are not sensible of their mistake for the present; but afterward discover it, either by themselves or by their rulers.

And they have done somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord, concerning things which ought not to be done.] Have offended against some of the negative precepts (as the Jews speak) which forbid such things to be done. (See ver. 2.)

And are guilty.] Are sensible of their guilt.

Ver. 14. When the sin which they have sinned against it is known.] When they have discovered what precept they have violated.

Then shall the congregation offer a young bullock for the sin.] Without blemish, as was required for the sin of the high-priest, (ver. 3.)

And bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation.] i. e. Cause the bullock to be brought thither, by some of his people, in the name of all the rest.

Ver. 15. And the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock, &c.] They were to do this as representatives of the people. (See ver. 13. and the end of laying on their hands, v. 4.)

And the bullock shall be killed before the Lord.] Either by some of them, or some of the people whom they appointed. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 16. And the priest that is anointed.] That is, the high-priest: (see ver. 5.) All the rest that follows, to ver. 22, is exactly the same that is prescribed in the foregoing offering, for the high-priest himself. Only R. Solomon Jarchi hath a nice observation on the next verse, that it is not said in this case (as it is in the former) he shall sprinkle of the blood seven times before the veil of the sanctuary, but only before the veil, without the addition of hakkodesh, of the sanctuary, as it is ver. 6. Because, saith he, if the high-priest only sin, the holiness doth not depart: but if all the congregation sin, then it doth depart. As, if a province rebel against a prince, his family stands; but if there be a general defection, he must fall. He hath the like observation upon ver. 22, 23. but it seems too subtle: for in the eighteenth verse Moses only saith, he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar, without adding of sweet incense, (as before, ver. 7.) and yet it is manifest he means the same altar; and what was done in this sacrifice was as acceptable as what was done in the other.

Ver. 22. When a ruler hath sinned, and done somewhat through ignorance against, &c.] The word nasi, which we translate ruler, signifies the head of a tribe in Numb. i. 4. 16. vii. 2. But the Jews commonly understand it peculiarly of the head, or prince of the great Sanhedrin; who, when they were under the government of kings, was the king himself. Thus the Misna gathers from these words in the text, when he sinneth against any of the commandments of the Lord his God, which signify him, say the doctors, that hath no superior but the Lord. And so the Gemarists understand it also, as Mr. Selden shews, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 16. p. 666. But I think it is most reasonable to extend this to all great officers and judges, who had a peculiar relation to God; and therefore were called by his name.

And is guilty.] Acknowledges that he hath offended God by the sin which he hath committed.

Ver. 23. Or if his sin wherein he hath sinned come to his knowledge.] If we retain this translation (and do not render the first word and, but or), then the foregoing words in the latter end of ver. 22, veashem, must be translated (not is guilty, but) and acknowledges his guilt. Which seems to be the true sense; for when men sin they are guilty, though the sin was committed ignorantly; but they do not acknowledge their guilt till they see it; as Moses here supposes they might, when they considered better, or somebody informed them aright. So these words signify, or his sin is made known unto him. Thus L'Empereur very judiciously translates this whole passage, And he acknowledges himself guilty, or his sin be shewn to him: otherwise there is no room for this disjunctive particle. (See his Annot. upon Bava kama, cap. 7. sect. 1. and cap. 9. sect. 4, 5.) And thus we ourselves translate the first part of this disjunction (in the latter end of the foregoing verse), Hosea v. 15. acknowledge their offences.

He shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats.] His sacrifice was of less value than the two former. From which Mr. Selden concludes, that the high-priest was not always the head of the Sanhedrin, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 16. p. 653.) For their sacrifices were very different, which argues a difference in their persons. And the Misna says, if the high-priest were put out of his office, his sacrifice was still the same, viz. a bullock without blemish: but it was not so with the nasi, or ruler, who offered only the sacrifice of a private man if he lost his office.

A male without blemish.] It was to be the best of this kind; though not equal to the sacrifice for the high-priest and the whole congregation. (See ver. 28.)

Ver. 24. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat.] Of this see ver. 4.

And kill it in the place where they kill the burnt-offering before the Lord.] Where that was, see chap. i. ver. 11. Neither of the two forementioned offerings (for the high-priest, or the whole congregation) are ordered to be killed here; but only before the Lord, (ver. 14, 15.) that is, in any part of the court but that which was proper to the burnt-offering, and the common sin-offering, as it here follows.

It is a sin-offering.] And therefore was to be killed where the burnt-offering was: for so it is ordained (vi. 25.) that all sin-offerings should be there slain. Which doth not imply that the two former were not sin-offerings, but that they were not of the common sort; as appears by the carrying of their blood into the sanctuary, and burning their flesh without the camp, which are not ordered either in this or in the following sacrifices.

Ver. 25. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin-offering with his finger.] By dipping his finger into it, (ver. 6. 17.)

And put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering.] Whereas the blood of the two former was put upon the horns of the golden altar in the sanctuary, (ver. 7. 18.)

And shall pour out his blood at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offering.] See ver. 18.

Ver. 26. And he shall burn all his fat upon the altar, &c.] See chap. iii. 9. It is not here said what should be done with the flesh; which in the two foregoing offerings is ordered to be burnt without the camp, (ver. 12. 21.) But in chap. vi. 26. 29. and xviii. Numb. 9, 10. the law of the sin-offering is set down to be this, that the priest and his sons should eat it, in the sanctuary, and no where else; provided also that they were free from uncleanness, (xxii. 4.)

And the priest shall make an atonement for him, as concerning his sin.] By this sacrifice his guilt was expiated; which must be understood to be the effect of the sacrifice for the high-priest, though it be not expressed, as it is in that for the whole congregation, (ver. 20.)

And it shall be forgiven him.] So that he should not be liable to the punishment of cutting off, as the Jews understand it; who fancy such sins to which that is threatened are here spoken of. (See ver. 1.) Rather, he was restored to communion with the people of God, from which he was separated while he remained in a known guilt.

Ver. 27. And if any one of the common people sin through ignorance.] Commit the same offence that a ruler or public officer doth.

And be guilty; or if his sin which he hath committed come to his knowledge.] See how this ought to be translated, ver. 22, 23.

Ver. 28. Then he shall bring his offering; a kid of the goats, a female without blemish.] Being a common person, less was required of him than of a prince; who was to offer a male, (ver. 23.) which in all creatures was of greater value than a female, as Maimonides observes: who reckons up three-and-forty offences of this sort, that might be committed imprudently (in his treatise called Schegagoth), in one of which, viz. worshipping an idol ignorantly, the sacrifice was the same for a private man as for the king, or the high-priest, or the priest anointed for war: but in all the other forty-two a female goat or lamb sufficed for a private man, (cap. 1. sect. 4.) And this sacrifice they call stated, or fixed, because no man offered more or less, whether rich or poor, man or woman; except only those who ate holy things, or entered into the sanctuary; whose sacrifices were higher or lower, as they speak. And there were three things, if we may believe them, which, though committed by error, were expiated by no sacrifice, viz.

blasphemy, neglect of circumcision, and not keeping the Passover. (So R. Levi of Barcelona, Præcept. cxix.) Which seems to be an unreasonable opinion, since idolatry committed ignorantly, they say, was comprehended within this law.

Ver. 29. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, &c.] This verse and the following, with the beginning of ver. 31. contain nothing but what was ordered about the foregoing sacrifice, (ver. 24—26.)

Ver. 31. And the priest shall burn it upon the altar, for a sweet savour unto the Lord.] This is a phrase used concerning burnt-offerings, (i. 9. 13.) and peace-offerings, (iii. 5. 16.) but it is not said of any of the foregoing sin-offerings, that the burning of them, or their fat, was for a sweet savour unto the Lord. The reason of which I am not able to give, unless it were to comfort the lowest sort of people with hope of God's mercy, though their offering was mean, in comparison of those offered by others. Abarbinel gives this reason for it: because a sin of ignorance being a less fault in a common man, it was a sign of great probity in him to bring a sacrifice for the expiation of it: but for the high-priest, or senate, or ruler of the people, to be ignorant of the law, was such a high crime, that it was no commendation to them to bring a sacrifice for their purgation.

Ver. 32. And if he bring a lamb for a sin-offering, &c.] For which reason God was pleased to accept a lamb, and that a female, of those who were not able to bring a young kid.

Ver. 33. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, and slay it, &c.] This and the next verse differ not from the foregoing, and therefore need no explication.

Ver. 35. And the priest shall burn them upon the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the Lord.] Or rather upon the offerings, or after the burnt-offering. (See iii. 5.)

And the priest shall make an atonement for his sin, &c.] And if by the same error he had committed several sins, there was a distinct atonement to be made for every one of them: so that if he had committed ignorantly the forty-three offences beforementioned, though it were by one and the same error, he was bound to offer as many expiatory sacrifices, (as Maimonides resolves in the forenamed treatise Schegagoth, cap. 4.) This, and such-like things, made this law "a yoke which they were not able to bear," as St. Peter speaks, Acts xv. 10.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. IF a soul sin.] In the manner following.

And hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness.] Being adjured in the name of God, when he is called to be a witness in a cause, to speak the truth. For judges had power to use such adjurations, that they might either draw a confession from an accused person, or a faithful testimony from a witness. Of the former of which there is a solemn form remaining in Scripture, (1 Kings xvii. 16. 2 Chron. xviii. 15.) as Grotius hath observed upon Matt. xxvi. 63. And Dr. Hammond, upon the same place, hath observed instances of the latter, (1 Kings vii. 31. Prov. xxix. 24.) And Micah's mother seems by her own authority to have adjured her family, as they dreaded the vengeance of the Divine Majesty, to discover if they knew any thing of the eleven hundred shekels of silver, which had been stolen from her, (Judg. xvii. 2.) In all which cases, men were bound to answer, as much as if they had taken a solemn oath so to do. Insomuch, that our blessed Lord himself, being thus adjured, made an answer to the court of judgment, though before he had stood silent.

Whether he hath seen or known of it.] Whether he can say any thing of the matter in question; either from his own knowledge, or from the information of credible persons.

If he do not utter it.] Declare what he knows, being thus adjured.

Then he shall bear his iniquity.] Let him not think it is no offence to suppress the truth, when he is so solemnly admonished to declare it; but offer such a sacrifice for his sin, as is prescribed ver. 1. which belongs to all the following cases. The Jews make four sorts of oaths in their courts, or commerce one with another; as Mr. Selden hath observed out of their writers; (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 8.) which are, rash oaths, vain oaths (of which they also make four sorts), oaths about trusts, (mentioned vi. 2, 3.) and this, which they call the oath of testimony; which they say every man was bound to give before the Sanhedrin when he was required. With this distinction between capital and pecuniary causes, that in the latter a man was not bound to come and testify, unless he was cited by the plaintiff, or by the court; but in capital causes, and in such things as the law prohibited (as if a man saw another smite his neighbour), he was bound to come of his own accord, without any summons, and give his testimony in court. Yet in this they make some difference, as may be seen in R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cxx. They who would see more of these several sorts of oaths among the Jews, may find them considered in Sam. Petitus's Var. Lectiones, cap. 16. And such a law as this there was anciently in other countries, that he who saw a crime committed, if he could not hinder it, should be bound, at least, to prosecute the malefactor. So the Egyptian lawgiver saith concerning theft, which a man saw committed, μηνῦσαί γε πάντως ὤφελε τοὺς λῃστὰς, καὶ ἐπεξιέναι τὴν παρονομίαν, to prosecute the law against that crime. So Plato uses the same word ἐπεξιέναι, lib. iv. de Legibus, saying, that he who knew of such a fact, or had certain information of it, καὶ μὴ ἐπεξιὼν, and doth not prosecute the person that did it, ἐν αὐτοῖς ἐνεχέσθω νόμοις, let him be liable to the same punishment. (See Hen. Stephanus's Præfat. ad Fontes Juris Civilis.)

Ver. 2. Or if a soul touch any unclean thing, whether it be a carcass of an unclean beast, &c.] The Hebrew doctors expound this of such persons, as, having touched any of the unclean things, which are mentioned in this verse and in the next, came into the sanctuary, or did eat of the holy things. Which they gather out of vii. 20, 21. and Numb. xix. 20. where cutting off is threatened to those, who knowingly were so guilty. For otherwise, it was sufficient for a man's expiation, who touched any unclean thing, to wash himself; and his uncleanness lasted only till the evening. (See chap. xi. and Numb. xix.) But why may it not be meant of those who neglected to wash themselves, who were to expiate that neglect by a sacrifice?

He also shall be unclean and guilty.] Obliged to offer the sacrifice prescribed (ver. 6.) for eating that which is holy (saith Rasi) or coming into the sanctuary.

Ver. 3. Or if he touch the uncleanness of man, &c.] Such uncleannesses as are mentioned in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fifteenth chapters of this book.

And if it be hid from him, when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty.] The words may be translated, Whether he did it ignorantly, or had some knowledge of it, and yet offended, he shall be obliged to offer the sacrifice mentioned, ver. 6.

Ver. 4. Or if a soul swear.] This the Hebrew doctors expound of that sort of oath which they call futile, or rash: when a man saith he hath done, or will do, or not do, a thing that is in his power to do.

Pronouncing with his mouth.] It was to be uttered in words, and not merely thought in his mind.

To do evil or good.] That he hath done a thing, or not done it, of whatsoever kind it be; or that he will, or will not do it. For these four kinds of oaths, of this sort, the Hebrew doctors make, two about things past; and two about things to come, (see Selden de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 11. n. 8.) As if he swear that he did eat, or he did not eat of such a meat; did talk, or did not talk with Reuben or Simeon, &c. Rasi thinks by doing good is meant something for his own advantage, and, consequently, by doing evil, we are to understand afflicting himself, or punishing his servant, &c. But it may as well be understood generally of all things whatsoever, which are comprehended under the name of good and evil.

And it be hid from him.] He did not rightly understand, or consider the thing about which he sware; whether it was in his power, for instance, to do what he swore he would do; or, whether he could lawfully do it; or if through forgetfulness he omitted to do what he might have done. Some interpret these and the following words, as those of the foregoing verse.

He shall be guilty in one of these.] Obliged to offer a sacrifice (as it follows, ver. 6.) if he have sworn rashly in any of the foregoing instances.

Ver. 5. And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing.] When he laid his hand upon the head of his sacrifice, this confession of his offence, it is likely, was made; without which his sacrifice would have been of no avail: so all the Hebrew doctors understand it; particularly Abarbinel, upon the sixteenth chapter of this book, saith, that confession was necessary to be added to every sacrifice for sin. For what is here commanded in this case, they resolve belongs to all sin-offerings, and trespass-offerings also. And, indeed, it was a notion among the heathen themselves, that an offering without prayer was to no purpose: "Quippe victimas cædi sine precatione, non videtur referre, nec Deos ritè consuli," as Pliny speaks, (lib. xxviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 2.) and every one knows that confession was a part of prayer. (See Dr. Outram de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 15. n. 9.)

Ver. 6. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the Lord.] There is a difference between a sin-offering (called chattah) and a trespass-offering (called ascham), as is plain in the latter part of this chapter, compared with this. But here in this place they are not distinguished, for the name of trespass-offering is given to that which was really a sin-offering: as appears from the latter end of this verse, and from the two next, where this offering is expressly called a sin-offering.

For his sin which he hath sinned.] In any of the four forementioned cases; either by polluting the sanctuary, or eating holy things, or a rash oath, or by refusing to give his testimony, being adjured by the court of judgment to do it. Thus R. Levi of Barcelona explains this, (Præcept. cxxi.)

A female from the flock, a lamb, or a kid of the goats, for a sin-offering.] As the Hebrews call the sin-offering, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 27.) a fixed sacrifice; so they call this higher or lower, being brought according to every man's faculty or ability; some more, some less, as the forenamed author, and many other of their doctors observe; and is plain of itself from the following verses.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him, concerning his sin.] By sprinkling the blood, and burning the fat of the sacrifice, as is directed, iv. 34, 35.

Ver. 7. And if he be not able to bring a lamb.] See the mercy of God, saith the same R. Levi, who was pleased to exact such small punishments for these sins, because it was very easy for men to fall into them. For we are more prone to offend in word than in deed: and without great caution it was scarce possible not to fall into such legal pollutions, as required this expiation.

Then he shall bring for his trespass, which he hath committed, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto the Lord.] Who, though he would not exact a heavy punishment of them for these offences, yet would not suffer them to escape altogether unpunished; that they might not be presumptuous, but use due care and caution in their words and actions. So the same R. Levi represents the sense of this law, as if the Lord had said, "I would not have such things done; but if any man by frailty commit them, let him repent with all his might, and set a guard upon himself; and let him offer a sacrifice, which may imprint the remembrance of his guilt upon his heart; and preserve him that he may not hereafter offend."

The one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering.] First, he was to have his peace made with God, by a sin-offering; and then his burnt-offering, or his gift, might be accepted, as Rasi observes; and is expressly ordered in the next verse, the priest shall offer that which is for the sin-offering first.

Ver. 8. And wring off his head from his neck, &c.] Or rather, nip it off with his nail, (as the Jews explain it, see i. 15.) so as not quite to separate it from the body. For that had been to make the sacrifice contemptible, (as R. Levi, of Barcelona, gives the reason of it, Præcept. cxxviii.) the bird looking more handsome with its neck still joined to the body, than without it. And it was fit the sacrifice, even of a poor man, should be as decent as possible; it being sufficient he thus suffered, without increasing his affliction by the mean and abject form of his sacrifice.

Ver. 9. And he shall sprinkle of the blood of the sin-offering, &c.] Some of the blood, which ran out of itself, as the priest held it by the neck, where he nipped it, he was to sprinkle upon the side of the altar. And then he was to press out the rest of the blood (when as much was ran out as would of itself, by that nip) at the bottom of the altar; where they were wont to pour out the blood of the sin-offering, (iv. 7. 18. 25. 34.)

It is a sin-offering.] Therefore the blood was there pressed out: whereas, in burnt-offerings of a bird, we read only of pressing or squeezing out the blood at the side of the altar,

(i. 15.) It is not said what was to be done with the flesh; but it is plain, from vi. 26. that the priest was to have it; the blood only being offered to God.

Ver. 10. And he shall offer the second for a burnt-offering, according to the manner.] Prescribed in the first chapter, ver. 15.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him, &c.] Some gather from hence, that the burnt-offering was also an expiatory sacrifice. But it is so plainly distinguished from it, that these words seem to me to relate only to the foregoing offering, (ver. 8, 9.) Though this may be concluded from hence: that the sin-offering was not accepted for his expiation; unless this burnt-offering followed, as a thankful acknowledgment made to God for his goodness.

Ver. 11. But if he be not able to bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.] This was still a more merciful provision for the poor; who were not to be so ambitious of offering a beast or a bird, as not to content themselves with offering the smallest thing that God would accept. So R. Levi, of Barcelona, observes, that God having such compassion on men's poverty, it did not become them to strain themselves to offer more than they were able; for so they might have been tempted to steal. Yet, if, after a man had set aside a little money to buy this quantity of fine flour, his estate was bettered, he was then bound (as Maimonides saith, in the treatise called Schegagoth) to add so much to it, as would buy the birds before prescribed. And in like manner, if he had designed to buy birds, and on a sudden grew richer, he was to procure a lamb or a kid. On the contrary, if a man had set apart money to buy a bullock for his sin-offering, and unexpectedly grew poor, he might buy two turtles, or young pigeons, and by them redeem his money so consecrated, &c. (cap. 10.)

Then he that hath sinned shall bring for his offering a tenth part of an ephah of fine flour, &c.] Neither more nor less; which was but a small quantity, (see Exod. xvi. 36.) because God would not have his creature oppressed, as the same author observes, (Præcept. cxxix.)

He shall put no oil upon it, neither shall he put any frankincense thereon.] In commiseration of his poverty, God required only a little flour, which every one might easily get, to offer without any oil to it, which was more costly; and also had something of magnificence in it (kings and priests being anointed), and therefore not becoming the meanness, or the grief and humility, of the person that brought this offering. For which reason frankincense was also omitted, being a pleasant thing; and not fit to be added to an offering for sin: which was offensive to God. To this purpose the same R. Levi, in the same place. And we find this imitated also by the heathen; for Pliny saith, in his preface to Vespasian before his Natural History, "Mola tantum salsa litant, qui non habent thura."

Ver. 12. Then shall he bring it to the priest.] Confessing his sin to him (as is ordered, ver. 5.) for which he desired this offering might be accepted.

And the priest shall take his handful of it, even a memorial thereof.] For an acknowledgment of his fault, and as a caution to him hereafter.

Ver. 13. And the priest shall make an atonement for him, as touching the sin that he hath sinned in one of these.] With one of these three forementioned sacrifices: either with a lamb, or with two turtles or young pigeons, or with fine flour. For, as Rasi hath observed, there are three sorts of men; rich, poor, and very poor: and so three sorts of offerings are prescribed in this chapter, suitable to each of their abilities.

And the remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat-offering.] See chapter the second, ver. 2, 3. where the whole meat-offering (except one handful) is given to the priest: who had nothing at all of some of the sin-offerings, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 12. 21.) which were entirely consumed.

Ver. 14. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying] Here begin the orders which were given to Moses about another sort of sacrifice, near of kin to the former: but delivered, it is likely, at some other time; after he had written down the foregoing laws about sin-offerings. (See iv. 1.)

Ver. 15. If a soul commit a trespass.] In the Hebrew this is a different phrase from what hath been hitherto used, signifying another sort of guilt.

And sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the Lord.] By applying to his own private use any thing that was dedicated to God, (as Maimonides expounds it in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.) which might be committed in the payment of tithes, and in first-fruits, and the first-born of cattle, or meddling with that part of the sacrifice which belonged to the priest alone. Which things he that committed presumptuously, was to be cut off, (Numb. xv. 30.) but if ignorantly, he was to do as here is directed in this verse. But these words seem to be particularly restrained to the last of those things now mentioned, (eating any part of the sacrifice which belong to the priest alone, xxii. 14.) and the end of this law (as R. Levi Barzelonita speaks, Præcept. cxxii.) was to excite fear and reverence in all those who approached unto holy things.

Then he shall bring for his trespass unto the Lord, a ram without blemish out of the flocks.] As a sheep was a more noble species among creatures than a goat; so a ram was of a greater value among sheep, than a female: and therefore this sacrifice was more costly than the sin-offering mentioned ver. 6.

With thy estimation.] Besides his sacrifice, he was to make satisfaction in money, according as the priest should esteem the damage. For that is the meaning of with thy estimation; according to the value thou shalt set upon the thing, which he applied to his own use.

By shekels of silver.] At least two shekels, as the Jewish doctors resolve.

After the shekels of the sanctuary.] See Exod. xxx. 13. The Jews were thus confined to these rites, and such as are mentioned ver. 8, 9. in the rest of these prescriptions, that there might be no room for idolatrous ceremonies; nor might men among themselves be left at liberty to invent impious or frivolous ways of worship: and that the obedience of good men might be also exercised in these minute matters; and the contempt of wicked people be the more apparent, in refusing to comply with these known laws of God.

For a trespass-offering.] The Hebrew word ascham, which we translate trespass-offering, is so near of kin to chattah, which we translate sin-offering, that one of them is sometimes used for the other, as I observed upon ver. 6. yet there is a real difference between them: though it be not easy to determine wherein it consists. For the greatest men differ in their opinion about the quality of the offences, for which these two kinds of sacrifices were to be offered: some saying that the offences for which ascham was offered, were inferior to those for which chattah was offered; which is the opinion of Maimonides in his More Nevochim, (par. iii. cap. 46.) Others, on the contrary, think, that the offences which were expiated by ascham, were more grievous than those expiated by chattah; which is the opinion of no less a man than the deservedly-admired Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.) Where he adds, that the former sort of sins were committed knowingly; the other only ignorantly. For so the LXX. translate chattah by ἁμαρτία, which seems to denote a fault committed by error and mistake: but ascham by πλημμέλεια, which carries in it the notion of something premeditated and designed. But this is directly contrary to the very words of Moses here in this verse; which expressly speak of a trespass committed through ignorance. Aben Ezra therefore distinguishes these two much better, making chattah to signify a sacrifice which was made for the purging offences, committed through ignorance of the law; and ascham for such as were committed through forgetfulness of the law. But as he gives no proof of this, so he was sensible it was liable to exception; there being one of this sort of sacrifices mentioned ver. 17. which he saw could not be comprehended under this rule. Others therefore think, the former hath respect to offences against God; and the latter to those against men; not observing, that the very same sort of sin, which when it was known is called chattah, when it was doubtful is called ascham. From whence a very learned person of our own (now with God), who had much and long considered this matter, concludes, that an offence was peculiarly called ascham (which is a name for the sin, as well as for the sacrifice, as chattah also is) about which either a man was dubious (as in the following verse), or did a manifest damage to other men. There being no ascham (or trespass-offering) commanded to be offered by the law, but for such offences as were so committed against God, that their neighbours also were injured by them. As in the case of those who did eat holy things, here mentioned, whereby the priests were damaged: and of those mentioned vi. 2—4. and such as lay with a bondwoman betrothed to another, (xix. 20, 21.) Which are all the cases belonging to this matter; excepting that of the Nazarite defiled by the dead, (Numb. vi. 12.) and of the leper, (iv. 12.) who were to be purged with a sin-offering, as well as with a trespass-offering: and therefore not to be considered in this matter. See Dr. Outram, lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 13. n. 8. and Samuel Petitus's Variæ Lectiones, cap. 22. who hath said the same, but not so fully and distinctly. If this do not satisfy, yet it is plain the sacrifices which go by this name of trespass-offerings, and the rites also about them, were so different, that they are sufficient to distinguish them from the other. For none but rams and male-lambs were admitted for trespass-offerings, which were not used at all in any sin-offerings. And the blood of the sin-offerings was put upon the horns of the altar, (as was noted in the foregoing chapter, ver. 7. 18. 25.) but that of the trespass-offerings was sprinkled round about upon the altar, (vii. 2.) Sin-offerings also were offered for the whole congregation of Israel, (iv. 13.) but trespass-offerings only for private persons, which made Bonfrerius (I suppose) after a long discussion of this matter, to conclude, that the difference between sin and trespass consisted only in the sacrifices which were offered for them. See him upon the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 1.

Ver. 16. And he shall make amends for the harm he hath done in holy things, and shall add a fifth part thereunto, &c.] Besides the compensation mentioned in the foregoing verse, for the damage that was done, according to the valuation made by the priest, there was a fifth part more to be added thereunto, and given to the priest who had suffered the damage.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass-offering, and it shall be forgiven him.] The atonement was not made, nor forgiveness obtained, till full satisfaction for the wrong had been made.

Ver. 17. And if a soul sin, and commit any of these things, &c.] i. e. Did eat any of the holy things beforementioned, which God forbade any but the priest to eat.

Though he wist it not.] i. e. Be not certain whether they were holy or no. For the Hebrews generally call this ascham talui, a dubious trespass-offering: being in a matter about which a man was in suspense, whether he had offended or not.

Yet he is guilty, and shall bear his iniquity.] He shall be obliged to offer this sort of sacrifice. Which was ordained (saith R. Levi Barzelon. Præcept. cxxiii.) to make men cautious, and fear to sin; and to attend diligently in all their actions, that they transgressed not the laws of God.

Ver. 18. And he shall bring a ram without blemish, out of the flock, with thy estimation, &c.] The offering before appointed, (ver. 15, &c.) with this difference only, that no fifth part was in this case to be added, because it was not certain whether he had transgressed or no.

The priest shall make an atonement for him, concerning his ignorance wherein he erred, and wist it not.] Did not know whether he had offended or not: which distinguishes this from the sin of ignorance mentioned ver. 15.

And it shall be forgiven him.] But if he afterward came to have a certain knowledge of his offence, he was not excused by this dubious offering (as Rasi observes), but was bound also to offer a sin-offering.

Ver. 19. It is a trespass-offering.] In this case a sacrifice must be offered, as well as in a certain trespass.

He hath certainly trespassed against the Lord.] The words in the Hebrew are, ascham ascham lajhova; which, I think, should be translated, a trespass-offering certainly unto the Lord. That is, in this doubtful case, let him take a sure course, by offering the sacrifice here prescribed. For though neither this sort of sacrifices, nor sin-offerings, were to be voluntary (which was proper only to whole burnt-offerings and peace-offerings), yet the very suspicion of a guilt required a sacrifice. As for all those offences which might be committed by men who had no sense or suspicion of them, they were expiated by the sacrifices which were offered for the whole congregation, at certain stated times: but no particular person was to offer either sin-offering or trespass-offering of his own accord, unless he knew or feared he had contracted some guilt.

I cannot think fit to conclude this chapter, without taking notice how Jonathan paraphrases these last words of it; who, instead of saying he hath trespassed (as it is commonly translated) against the Lord, saith, against the name of the Word of the Lord. Which is an observation that might have been made in my notes upon the two foregoing books of Moses, where many such passages occur, which I did not mention. And I should not have done it now (being unwilling to swell this commentary with any thing that doth not tend to the explaining the sense of the text), did not the impious pamphlets that have lately been spread abroad against the doctrine of the ever-blessed Trinity, make it necessary for me to take this occasion to assert, that this doctrine was not unknown to the ancient Jews, as appears even from the frequent mention of the Word of the Lord in the Chaldee paraphrasts, where the Hebrew hath only Jehovah (or the Lord): for which I can see no reason at all, if there had not been a notion among them of more persons than one who was Jehovah. It doth not always, indeed, carry this signification in it; but there are very many places where, by the Word of the Lord, cannot be meant a word spoken by the Lord, or any thing else, but a person speaking or acting, &c. who is the Lord. There is a famous instance of it in Gen. xxviii. 20, 21. where Jacob's vow is thus translated by Onkelos: Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If the Word of the Lord will be with me, and keep me, &c. then shall the Word of the Lord be my God. Where the Word of the Lord is so plainly made the object of his adoration, that it evidently shews they had a notion in those days when Onkelos lived (which was about our Saviour's time), of more persons than one who was the Lord. The Jerusalem Targum also speaks this so clearly, that one cannot but be something amazed to meet with such expressions in it, as those upon Gen. iii. 22. The Word of the Lord said, Behold, Adam whom I have created, is my only-begotten in this world; as I am the only-begotten in the heavens above. Which may fairly induce a belief that St. John used the known language of those times, when he declared our blessed Saviour's Godhead under the name of the Word, who was in the beginning with God, and was God, (John i. 1.)

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] What here follows belonging unto the same with that which went before, it is likely, was spoken at the same time. And these words signify, that the Lord further spake unto Moses, what concerned trespass-offerings.

Ver. 2. If a soul sin, and commit a trespass.] The same sort of expression is used in the beginning of this law, concerning the trespass-offering, ver. 15. Which some translate prevaricate, or act insincerely.

Against the Lord.] The Sovereign of the world; who was peculiarly affronted by the following sins; especially by swearing falsely, which was calling him to bear witness to a lie.

And lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep.] Deny the trust which was committed to him; and that when he was brought upon his oath to deliver the truth, as appears by the next verse. For this is the instance of that sort of oath, which the Jews call the oath about a thing deposited, (see v. 1.) For there being no witness of what was done between two friends or neighbours, who trusted one another in such matters, but God alone; they appealed unto him, from whom nothing could be hid. And this oath, the Jews say, was governed by another, which they call the oath of testimony: which a man was not bound to give, unless he were adjured to it by the court of judgment: and so it was in the oath about the things deposited; he was not guilty who was adjured by private persons, and denied it; but he that denied it before the court. So they resolve in Halicah Olam, par. iv. cap. 2.

Or in fellowship.] To carry on a common trade, in joint-stock; or (as others understand it) in any thing for which he gave his hand unto another: for so the Hebrew words are, putting of the hand, as contracts are oft-times made: which if a man afterward denied, he fell under the guilt here mentioned. And there is some reason to think, that this is much of the same nature with the former; because, when he speaks of restitution, (ver. 4.) this is not repeated. And therefore it seems to be included in that which was deposited with another: whether it were money, called here pikkadon; or any other goods, called tesumah jad. They that would see more opinions about these words, putting of the hand, may consult Const. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Bava kama, cap. 9. sect. 7.

Or in a thing taken away by violence.] That is, by robbery or stealth, as the word gazel signifies. For theft not being punished among the Jews with death, they tendered an oath to those who were accused or suspected of it, to clear themselves from the imputation, (Exod. xxii. 11.)

Or hath deceived his neighbour.] Wronged him by false accusation, as the Hebrew word hoschok seems to import. Which St. Jerome always translates calumny; as the word haschak he translates to calumniate. It signifies also extortion; and Rasi takes it for defrauding a hireling of his wages.

Ver. 3. Or have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it.] Deny that he found a thing lost; which in truth came to his hand.

And sweareth falsely.] They put men to their oath in this case also, when there was a just cause of suspicion; as they did in matters of theft.

In any of all these.] In any of these sorts of things; as the Hebrew may be translated.

That a man doth.] Wherein one man dealeth with another: or which frequently happen, as Grotius thinks this phrase signifies, in his annotations upon 1 Cor. x. 13.

Sinning therein.] By these means contracting a guilt.

Ver. 4. Then shall it be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty.] The last words should rather be translated, and acknowledges his guilt. For so this word ascham, guilty, ought to be expounded, as I shewed iv. 22, 23. to make a clear sense of the law there mentioned. And it would otherwise be superfluous here: for when a man hath sinned so grievously as the foregoing verses suppose, who could doubt of his guilt? The true meaning therefore is, when he hath sinned (so the first words may be translated) by committing any of those things forementioned, and acknowledges his guilt, he shall restore that which he took away violently, &c. And this most plainly reconciles the contradiction, that otherwise would be between this law and that in Exod. xxii. 1. 7. 9. where a man that stole an ox is condemned to restore five oxen, and four sheep for one; and if he delivered money to another to keep, and it was stolen, the thief was to pay double; whereas here, one simple restitution is exacted, with an addition of a fifth part. The reason is, because in Exodus he speaks of those thieves who were convicted by witnesses in a court of law; and then condemned to make such great restitution: but here of such as, touched with a sense of their sin, came voluntarily and acknowledged their theft, or other crime, of which nobody convicted them, or at least confessed it freely when they were adjured; and therefore were condemned to suffer a lesser punishment, and to expiate their guilt by a sacrifice. See L'Empereur upon Bava kama, cap. 7. sect. 1. and cap. 9. sect. 1. 5. 7. where he observes very judiciously, that this interpretation is confirmed by Numb. v. 7. where the first words may be translated, If they shall confess their sin that they have done, &c. And this seems to be more reasonable than the account which Maimonides gives of this matter in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41. where, expounding these words, which he took violently, of an open robber, he gives these reasons why he was not punished so much as a thief, but restored only the principal, with a fifth part; because rapine happens seldom, but theft often; for it cannot be committed so easily as theft; and is done openly and manifestly, whereas theft is committed more secretly: so that a man may be aware (he imagines) of a robber, and defend his goods against him, better than against a secret thief. Yet this is better than the account of R. Johannes f. Zachei, (mentioned by J. Coch upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin. cap. 7. p. 271.) that a mere thief fears man more than God; but a robber fears both alike.

Ver. 5. Of all that about which he hath sworn falsely, he shall even restore it in the principal.] The same numerical thing which he took away, if it still remain in his possession unaltered; or else the just price of it: as R. Levi Barzelonita expounds it, Præcept. cxxv. And the Jews pretend to such scrupulosity in this matter, that they say a man, who was to have a share in his father's estate, from whom he had taken something by robbery, was to restore it before the division was made, and not by detaining it to make his share greater than it ought to be. (See Bava kama, cap. 9. sect. 9.)

And shall add the fifth part more thereto.] The Jews have many subtilties about this, as may be seen there, sect. 6, 7. The plain sense is, that he should compensate the loss which the right owner might have sustained (by wanting the use of his goods so long as the other had detained them in his hand), by adding a full fifth part of the principal, as an amends for the wrong. Yet, if he had really forgotten that he had found such a thing as he was charged withal, at the time he denied it upon oath, he was not bound to pay the fifth part more, nor to offer the expiatory sacrifice, though he really was possessed of the thing; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. p. 506.

And give it unto him to whom it appertaineth.] If he hath stolen from a man the smallest piece of money, which the Jews call peruta, and had forsworn it, they fancy he was bound to restore it to the owner himself; though he lived as far off as Media: and it would not suffice to give it to his son, or his attorney, whom he had left to act for him. Yet they are something humorsome in these absurdities, for they do not tie a man to go so far to pay the fifth part; though in a case where it was more than a peruta. (See Bava kama, cap. 9. sect. 5, 6.)

In the day of his trespass-offering.] Or, in the day of his trespass; that is, as soon as he acknowledgeth his guilt, as this word I shewed ver. 4. is to be interpreted. And this agrees with what our blessed Saviour requires; (Matt. v. 23.)

Ver. 6. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the Lord, a ram without a blemish.] This the Hebrews call an offering for a certain guilt; as that v. 15, was for a dubious.

With thy estimation, &c.] R. Levi of Barcelona interprets it, a ram worth two shekels, (Præcept. cxxiv.)

Ver. 7. And the priest shall make an atonement for him, &c.] The offender was not to think he was cleared by making restitution, and adding the fifth part, whereby his neighbour might well be satisfied: but withal, this sacrifice was necessary for his expiation, without which no satisfaction was made to the Divine Majesty. The Jews themselves also think that this was prescribed, to make them more sensible of their sin, and to render it more odious unto them; as the same author observes.

Ver. 8. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Here the Hebrews begin a new section of the law, as well as a new chapter (as we call it), for the first seven verses plainly belong to the matter of the foregoing chapter. And it is reasonable to think, that the following precepts were given at a distinct time from the former, (see iv. 1.) being about a different matter. For having declared what offerings the people should bring to the Lord, he now gives instructions to the priests, how they should manage the several offerings that were brought.

Ver. 9. Command Aaron and his sons, saying.] As before he bade Moses speak unto the children of Israel, (Lev. i. 2. iv. 2.) because the laws he then gave concerned them: so now he bids him command Aaron and his sons what to do; and acquaints them with the laws, that is, the rites they should observe in offering the several sacrifices before directed to be made.

This is the law of the burnt-offering.] He mentions that first, which was first delivered, and was the principal offering, being purely in honour of God; whereas the other was occasioned by men's sins, or the benefits he had bestowed on them.

It is the burnt-offering.] He explains what burnt-offering he chiefly means, viz. the daily sacrifice: which was the principal burnt-offering, according to which all other offerings of that kind were to be regulated.

Because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning.] Or, for the burning upon the altar, &c. This was the reason of its name, because it was burning on the altar from the evening (at which the Jews began their day) till the morning. For which purpose the priests watched all night, and put the sacrifice upon the altar piece by piece, that it might be consumed by a slow and gentle fire. As for the morning sacrifice, it is not here mentioned, because it was consumed by a quicker fire; that there might be room for other sacrifices that were commonly offered after it, (as appears from ver. 12.) and were only offered in the morning, not at night. But if there were no other sacrifices to succeed it in the morning, then, it is very likely, that it was also kept burning till the evening sacrifice; that God's altar might always have meat upon it.

And the fire of the altar shall be burning in it.] Or, For the fire of the altar, &c. So it should be translated: unless we translate the last word not in it, but by it. And the fire of the altar shall be burning (i. e. be fed or maintained) by it.

Ver. 10. And the priest shall put on his linen garment.] Mentioned Exod. xxviii. 40.

And his linen breeches shall he put upon his flesh.] To cover his secret parts, as appears from Exod. xxviii. 42.

And take up the ashes, which the fire hath consumed with the burnt-offering, &c.] Or rather, When the fire hath consumed the burnt-offering on the altar. For the word aschar, which we here translate which, signifies also when; and is so translated by us, iv. 22. Or else the sense must be, The ashes into which the fire hath consumed the burnt-offering. Or, to make good our present translation, a few words must be added, in this manner, The ashes (of the wood) which the fire hath consumed with the burnt-offering.

And he shall put them beside the altar.] On the east part of it, as far as might be from the most holy place. (See i. 16.) For this was most suitable to the glory of the house of God (saith R. Levi of Barcelona), and the fire would burn better, when the altar was cleared from the ashes.

Ver. 11. And he shall put off his garments.] Those beforenamed, and put on other garments. It is a question among the Jews whether he mean his common raiment, or some other garments, not holy, and yet not quite common, but of a middle nature. It is most likely that the carrying the ashes out of the tabernacle, being not a holy action, as they were not to perform it in their priestly, i. e. sacred garments, wherein they took them from the altar; so they did it in the common habit, which they wore when they did not minister. Yet Rasi thinks this was not absolutely necessary, but only fitting and seemly: it being indecent to do this work in the same garments wherein they served at the altar. And the ashes having been upon the altar, there are those (as I said) who fancy this was not a work fit to be performed in their common garments; and therefore have devised a habit of less dignity than those garments wherein they ministered, which they used when they carried out the ashes. Thus Maimonides himself, and others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Syned. cap. 11. n. 6. where he likewise observes, that Chiskuni is of opinion, that such of the family of the priests, as were both excluded from their ministry in the sanctuary, and from wearing the holy garments, by reason of some defect in their bodies, were permitted to perform this office of carrying away the ashes.

And carry forth the ashes without the camp, into a clean place.] See iv. 12. The forementioned Rasi will have it, that they needed not to take away all the ashes every day; but only a shovel-full, which they laid beside the altar. And when the hollow place of the altar was so full, that there was no room to lay on the wood, they were bound to empty it, and carry all the ashes away.

Ver. 12. And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it, it shall not be put out.] This precept is repeated again in the next verse; as it was mentioned once before, (ver. 9.) For which there is a just reason, as Abarbinel makes account. For in the ninth verse he requires, that the wood for the evening sacrifice should be so ordered and attended, that the fire might be kept in till the morning. And then, here, in this verse, he requires there should such care be used in taking away the ashes, that the fire might still remain, and not be extinguished. After which, speaking of the morning sacrifice, in the latter part of this verse, he requires in the next, (ver. 13.) that such a quantity of wood should be laid on the altar, when they offered it, that the fire might be kept in till the evening sacrifice; or, that if there were any extraordinary sacrifices brought besides the daily burnt-offering, the priests should still add more wood, that the fire might not be put out by that means, but be able to devour them.

And the priests shall burn wood on it every morning, &c.] The Hebrew word for wood being in the plural number, R. Levi of Barcelona concludes there were more bundles than one brought in every day. And from this place (and i. 7.) he gathers there were three. The first of which he calls the great heap; with which the daily sacrifice, and the rest, for which there was occasion, were offered: of which he thinks Moses speaks in the ninth verse of this chapter. The second was lesser, which was laid at the side of the other, that they might have coals for the burning incense: and this he thinks intended here. And the third was merely to keep in the fire perpetually; of which he thinks Moses speaks in the next verse. The Misna also tells us, that there being seven gates to the great court of the sanctuary, three on the north, and as many on the south, and one at the east; the first on the south side was called the gate of burning: because at that gate they brought in the wood, which was to preserve the fire perpetually on the altar: (see Codex Middoth, cap. 1. sect. 4.)

And he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace-offerings.] This fat of the peace-offerings was to be burnt together with the burnt-offering, and not separate from it: by which means the burnt-offering was the sooner consumed, and more room was made for other occasional sacrifices.

Ver. 13. And the fire shall be ever burning upon the altar.] This fire was not kindled by the priests, but by God himself; who sent it from heaven to consume the first sacrifice that was offered by Aaron, (ix. ult.) From which time they were bound to take care, that it never went out; that so their sacrifices might be constantly offered by celestial fire: because it was the continuation of that fire which came from heaven, by a continual addition of fuel, whereby it was preserved. And so it continued, as the Jews affirm, till the captivity of Babylon; and after it, as some of them would have us believe (who fancy it was preserved in a pit, by the care of some religious priests, till their return), though against the common tradition among them, which is, that there was no sacred fire in the second temple; for they reckon this among the five things which were wanting there, and had been in the first. And as for the constant continuance of this fire, there was care taken that wood should be laid up in the temple for the maintenance of it: so in order thereunto, there was a certain set time, when the people were obliged to carry wood thither; which made a kind of festival, called by Josephus ξυλοφόρια, lib. ii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 31. τῶν ξυλοφορίων ἑορτῆς οὔσης, &c. it being the feast of the wood-carrying; when it was the custom for all to bring up wood for the altar: that there might be no want of fuel for the fire, which was never to go out.

It shall never go out.] This was a thing so famous, that it was imitated among the gentiles; who thought it ominous to have their sacred fire go out: and therefore appointed persons on purpose to watch it, and keep it perpetually burning, as appears by the vestal virgins at Rome, whose great business it was to look after the eternal fire, as they called it; imagining the extinction of it purported ἀφανισμὸν τῆς πόλεως, the destruction of the city, as Dionysius Halicarn. speaks. This institution is ascribed, both by him and by Plutarch, unto Romulus; into whose history many things were translated by the ancient pagans out of these sacred records of Moses, as the learned Huetius hath made probable in his Demonstratio Evangel. Propos. iv. cap. 9. n. 8. The Greeks also preserved such a πῦρ ἄσβεστον, inextinguishable fire at Delphi; and the Persians in like manner, and many other people, as Bochartus hath shewn in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 35. and Dilherrus before him, in a special dissertation (as he calls it) de Cacozelia Gentilium, cap. 11. where he hath heaped up a great deal to this purpose; and, among other things, hath this conjecture—that the Grecian Ἑστία, and the Roman Vesta, had their names from the Hebrew word esch, or the Chaldean escha, which signifies fire. The conjecture of David Chytræus also is no less ingenious, who derives those names from eschjah, the fire of the Lord.

Ver. 14. And this is the law of the meat-offering.] He doth not speak of the offerings which accompanied the daily burnt-offerings, but of those which were offered alone, mentioned in the second chapter. Where directions are given of what they should consist; and also how much the priest should have for his portion: but here are some things added concerning the place where they should be eaten by the priests; and concerning those meat-offerings, which were peculiarly to be offered for themselves.

The sons of Aaron shall offer it before the Lord, before the altar.] Or rather, upon the altar: for so the Hebrew phrase [on the face of the altar] signifies. Or else the meaning is, he shall present it to the Lord before the altar; and then afterward (as is directed in the next verse) burn a handful of it upon the altar. And so the rule is, chapter second, ver. 8, 9. When it is presented to the priest, he shall bring it to the altar, &c.

Ver. 15. And he shall take of it his handful of the flour of the meat-offering, &c.] According to the prescription in the second chapter, ver. 2. where all this verse is explained.

Ver. 16. And the remainder thereof shall Aaron and his sons eat.] If they had no pollution upon them, xxii. 6. (See chap. ii. 3.) The reason of the precept was, (as R. Levi Barzel. observes, Præcept. cxxxiii.) that it preserved the dignity of the sacrifice to have it eaten only by the priests: and by them (I may add) only in the holy place, and not carried out from thence, as it here follows.

With unleavened bread shall it be eaten.] There is nothing in the Hebrew text to answer unto the word with; which makes the sense unaccountable, that otherwise is easy and natural. If we translate it as the Hebrew words plainly signify, unleavened it shall be eaten, see x. 12.

In the holy place.] There was a room in the court of the priests, where they ate these holy things, as Kimchi observes upon Ezek. xlii. Which may be confirmed out of Numb. xviii. 10. where the most holy place can signify nothing but the court of the priests, as L'Empereur rightly understands it in his Annot. upon Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 6.

In the court of the tabernacle of the congregation they shall eat it.] As the priests did eat it in their own court, so their male children had place in the court of the Israelites wherein to eat it, (x. 12, 13.) And they are all said to eat before the Lord, because this was a part of the tabernacle: as was also the court of the women, where there was a place for the priests' daughters to eat, as well as their sons, of the firstlings that were offered to the Lord, (Numb. xviii. 19.)

Ver. 17. It shall not be baken with leaven.] There were two little rooms at the east gate of the court of the temple, called the gate of Nicanor; one of which was a vestry for the priests to put on their garments when they went to minister; and the other was for baking this flour, and that mentioned ver. 21. So they tell us in Middoth, cap. 1. sect. 4. And therefore it is ordered to be baken without leaven, because it was a part of the Lord's sacrifice: which being offered unleavened, (chapter second, ver. 11.) the remainder must needs be unleavened also, because the whole was God's; and the priests could have it no other ways than it was offered unto him.

I have given it to them for their portion of my offerings made by fire.] That is, of the meat-offerings beforementioned.

It is most holy, &c.] This is the reason why it was not to be carried to be eaten out of the holy place. (See chap. ii. ver. 10.)

As is the sin-offering, and as the trespass-offering.] See ver. 26. and vii. 6.

Ver. 18. All the males among the children of Aaron shall eat of it.] And none but they, because it was a thing most holy.

It shall be a statute for ever in your generations.] That is, as long as the law about sacrifices shall last.

Every one that touches them shall be holy.] According to this translation of these words, the meaning is, that it was not sufficient to be descended of priests, and to be males, but they were also to be free from any legal defilement, who were admitted to eat of this offering, (xxii. 6.) But these very words, which we here translate every one, in the twenty-seventh verse we translate whatsoever: and then the meaning is, Every thing that toucheth them shall be made holy by them. That is, the very dishes into which such holy things were put, or the spoons, or knives, wherewith they were eaten, were never to be employed to any other use. (See Exod. xxix. 37.)

Ver. 19. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] At the same time the Lord gave direction about another offering, near of kin to the former; but not yet mentioned.

Ver. 20. This is the offering of Aaron and his sons, which they shall offer unto the Lord.] The Jews call this a mincha of initiation; which every high-priest, and every other priest (as they understand it), were bound to offer, when they were consecrated; and the high-priest to continue every day as long as he lived. So Abarbinel, in his preface to this book, (sect. 2.) reckoning the various sorts of meat-offerings, makes this the fourth kind; which the high-priest offered every day, and every other priest once in his life, viz. when he first was admitted to minister at the altar, at the age of twenty years. For both these meat-offerings, saith he, are comprehended in this verse. But it may as well be understood only of Aaron, and his successors in the priesthood, of whom the following words seem to speak, and not of the common priests.

In the day when he is anointed.] The Hebrew word bejom may be translated from the day; and so the Jews understand it, that he was to make this oblation, not only upon the day of his consecration, but ever after (as I said), every day, as long as he continued in the priesthood. And so the next words seem to explain it.

The tenth part of an ephah of fine flour, for a meat-offering perpetual; half thereof in the morning, and half at night.] The high-priest, saith Josephus, (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10.) sacrificed twice every day at his own charges: and then he describes this very offering, which was distinct from that which attended the daily burnt-offering; as appears by the quantity of this meat-offering, and by the manner of ordering it. For that seems to have been raw flour, mixed with oil; but this baken, as it follows in the next verse. (See Exod. xxix. 40, 41.) The reason why it is here mentioned, is, because it was a mincha (or meat-offering), of whose rites Moses is treating; and this is an exception from the rest.

Ver. 21. In a pan shall it be made with oil.] With three logs of oil; as the Jews determine.

And when it is baken.] See ver. 17.

Thou shalt bring it in.] Unto the altar.

And the baken pieces shalt thou offer, &c.] If it was a meat-offering of the high-priest, it was divided into twelve pieces (as Maimonides saith); if of a common priest (for they will have both to be included in this law) then into ten pieces; which were so exactly divided, that half of them were offered in the morning, and the other half in the evening. And the handful of frankincense (which they say was offered with them) was in like manner divided, and burnt on the altar, (Maase Korban, cap. 13.)

Ver. 22. And the priest of his sons, that is anointed in his stead, shall offer it.] What he had said of Aaron and his sons in general, (ver. 20.) he now particularly requires of every son of his, that should succeed him in his office. For which there was the greater necessity, because (as R. Levi of Barcelona understands it, Præcept. cxxxiv.) the high-priest was an ambassador between the Israelites and their heavenly Father (by whom their prayers were offered to God, and who made reconciliation for them), and therefore should be bound, in all reason, to offer a perpetual sacrifice twice every day, for the constant needs of the congregation; and to apply his mind to this (as he speaks), that he and they might be the better for it.

It shall be wholly burnt.] In which it differed from other meat-offerings, as will appear in the next verse.

Ver. 23. For every meat-offering for the priest.] Or of the priest. This may seem to relate to every common priest; who were not all bound to offer this sacrifice every day, but only he who did it in the name of all the rest, viz. the priest who offered the daily burnt-sacrifice. He may be well thought to have been obliged to this; by which means this meat-offering was offered to God every day, by one or other of them, and never omitted. But Abarbinel (as I noted before, ver. 20.) thinks, that only the high-priest was bound to offer this meat-offering every day; and every other priest once in his life, viz. when he began his ministry.

Shall be wholly burnt: it shall not be eaten.] The priests had all the meat-offerings which were brought by the people, except one handful which was offered to the Lord. (See chapter second, ver. 2, 3.) But of their own meat-offerings they were not to taste, but wholly burnt them on the altar. For it had not been seemly for him, both to offer unto God, and to eat of it as if it were his own; as Maimonides speaks, (par. iii. More Nevoch. cap. 46.) or, as R. Levi Barzelonita gives the reason, (Præcept. cxli.) the scope of the sacrifice being to raise the mind of him that offered it unto God, it was not fit he should think of eating any part of his own offering; which would have taken his mind off from God.

Ver. 24. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] He added further several things concerning other offerings; which perhaps were delivered at the same time with the foregoing; being still concerning the priests, (see ver. 8, 9.) And therefore the next verse begins thus, "Speak unto Aaron and his sons, saying."

Ver. 25. This is the law of the sin-offering.] That is, for particular persons: that for the priests themselves, being governed by another law. For it is plain, that, in the fourth chapter, he distinguishes the sin-offering into two kinds: one, whose blood was carried into the sanctuary, and the flesh of it burnt entirely without the camp, (ver. 7, 8, &c. and here ver. 30.) and another, whose blood was not carried into the sanctuary; the flesh of which the priests were to eat, as is here directed.

In the place where the burnt-offering is killed, shall the sin-offering be killed before the Lord.] See iv. 24. 29. 31.

It is most holy.] This is the reason of what follows, that none might eat of it but those who were holy to the Lord.

Ver. 26. The priest that offereth it for sin, shall eat it.] The flesh of this sin-offering fell to the share of him who offered the sacrifice that day; and to his male children: though he might invite any other priests, and their sons, to partake with him, if he pleased; as appears from ver. 29. I need not add, that the immurim, as the Hebrews call them, were excepted: that is, the fat, &c. mentioned iii. 9, 10. iv. 26. which were to be wholly burned upon the altar.

In the holy place shall it be eaten, &c.] See ver. 16. For it being most holy (as the words are in the conclusion of the foregoing verse), it was to be eaten in the holy place; and that the same day and night when it was offered; and none of it to be kept till the morning. Whereas some of the peace-offerings (which they called the lighter holy things) might be eaten the next day, (vii. 16.) See Maimonides, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46. This seems to have been imitated by the heathen, who required that their most holy sacrifices should not be carried out of the temple; as the scholiast upon Aristophanes's Equites observes, concerning the sacrifices offered to Ceres and Proserpina: οὐκ ἐξῆν τὰ θυόμενα Δημήτρι καὶ Περσιφόνῃ ἔξω ἀφίναι.

Ver. 27. Whosoever shall touch the flesh thereof shall be holy.] See ver. 18.

And when there is sprinkled of the blood thereof upon any garment.] This is commonly understood of the priest's garment, who alone sprinkled the blood. But his garments being holy, the blood that might chance to fall upon them was not thereby at all dishonoured: and therefore (if this be the meaning) we are to understand, that the garments would appear less venerable, when they were spotted with blood; and upon that account were to be washed. If we take it for the garment of him that brought the sacrifice, which when it was killed, the blood might chance to spirt upon his clothes; then the washing of them was out of reverence to the blood; which, being holy, was not to remain upon a common garment. Which way soever it be interpreted, the intention, it is manifest, was to preserve in their minds an awful regard to God, and to whatsoever belonged unto his service.

Thou shalt wash that whereon it was sprinkled in the holy place.] Where there was a room (after the temple was built) which was called lischath hagullah, the chamber of the spring, or well, out of which water was drawn for the use of the court of the sanctuary. And there, it is probable, these garments were washed. (See Codex Middoth, cap. 5. sect. 3.)

Ver. 28. But the earthen vessel wherein it is sodden shall be broken.] For it being very porous, might so deeply imbibe a tincture from the flesh, that it could not be washed out; but the smell of it might remain a long time. And being of a small value, it was no great loss to have it broken; rather than any thing that was holy, remaining in it, be profaned. What became of the broken shreds of these earthen vessels, is a doubt among the Hebrew doctors; because it was neither fit to throw them out in a profane place, nor yet seemly to heap them up in the sanctuary: and therefore they fancy the earth opened and swallowed them up, as a great man in this kind of learning (J. Wagenseil) hath observed upon the Mischna of Sota, cap. 3. But they might have rather said, that they were thrown abroad into a clean place, after they were broken into small bits, or crumbled to powder; just as the ashes were that came from the altar, which was a holy place.

If it be sodden in a brazen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water.] Nothing could so easily sink into this, being a solid metal: but whatsoever stuck to it might be rubbed out and cleansed by washing. From this verse, compared with other places, it seems apparent, that nothing was roasted in the sanctuary, but only boiled. So we find the peace-offerings (mentioned 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14, 15.) were constantly sodden; and all other holy offerings, except the paschal lamb (which they roasted at home), 2 Chron. xxxv. 13. And after their return from the captivity of Babylon, the same is intimated in the last verse of the prophecy of Zachariah.

Ver. 29. All the males among the priests shall eat thereof: it is most holy.] See ver. 16. and 26.

Ver. 30. And no sin-offering.] Or rather, but no sin-offering.

Whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation, to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten, &c.] Such were those sin-offerings for the high-priest, (iv. 3.) and for the whole congregation, upon particular occasions, (iv. 13, &c.) Or upon the day of general atonement, (xvi. 27.) No part of these was to be eaten, but entirely burnt in the fire; as it here follows in the end of this verse. There is no necessity of Maimonides's observation upon these words; that no man whatsoever might eat of these sacrifices: for if the priest might not, they were certainly prohibited to all other persons.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. LIKEWISE this is the law of the trespass-offering.] The people were directed before in what cases they should bring this sort of offering; and I have noted the difference between them and sin-offerings; (v. 15.) but now the priests are directed in their office about trespass-offerings.

It is most holy.] In general they were to observe that these offerings, as well as sin-offerings, were to be numbered among the most holy things; and therefore to be accordingly used, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 2. In the place where they kill the burnt-offering, shall they kill the trespass-offering.] The same order that was given about sin-offerings, (iv. 24. vi. 25.)

And the blood thereof shall be sprinkled round about upon the altar.] This is a different rite from that which was observed in the sin-offerings; whose blood was put upon the horns of the altar, (iv. 25. 34.) and the blood of such sin-offerings as were made for the high-priest, or the whole congregation, was also to be sprinkled seven times before the veil of the sanctuary, (iv. 6. 17.) But this to be sprinkled round about the altar of burnt-offering; according to the manner used in the whole burnt-offerings, (i. 11.) and in the peace-offerings; (iii. 2. 8.) only with this difference, that there being a scarlet thread, or line, which went round about the altar exactly in the middle, the blood of the whole burnt-offerings was sprinkled round about above the line, and the blood of the trespass-offerings, and the peace-offerings, round about below the line. (See Codex Middoth, cap. 3. sect. 1. and L'Empereur, Annot. 12.)

Ver. 3. And he shall offer of it all the fat thereof.] This was the work of the priest, first to offer unto God his part of the sacrifice.

The rump.] All the fat belonging unto God; this is particularly mentioned in the first place, as the principal fat. For the tails of their sheep in those countries (and no other creature but a ram was allowed for a trespass-offering, as was before noted) were of a prodigious bigness, as hath been noted by many: particularly by the famous Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45.) and lately by another excellent person, Jobus Ludolphus, in his Ethiopic History, (lib. i. cap. 10. n. 16.) and in his commentaries on it, (num. 76.) And therefore it is called, both here and in other places, by the peculiar name of alja; whereas the tail or rump of other creatures, is called zanah. (See what I have noted upon iii. 9.)

And the fat that covereth the inwards.] This, and all that follows in the next verse, hath been explained before, (iii. 3, 4. 8, 9.)

Ver. 5. And the priest shall burn them upon the altar, &c.] As he did the fat of the sin-offerings and peace-offerings, (iv. 26. 31.)

Ver. 6. Every male among the priests shall eat thereof, &c.] All the fat being offered to God, the flesh became the portion of the priest; who, with his male children, but not females, were to eat it: but not in any place out of the sanctuary; as it here follows. (See vi. 18. 26. 29.)

Ver. 7. As is the sin-offering, so is the trespass-offering: there is one law for them.] In this matter (though in other things they differed), for the same rule is given here about the trespass-offering, that is given in the chapter foregoing (ver. 26.) about the sin-offering.

The priest that maketh atonement therewith shall have it.] Who might invite other priests, if he pleased, to eat with him, and with his sons: but he was not bound to it; for the flesh of this sacrifice was entirely his own.

Ver. 8. And the priest that offereth any man's burnt-offering, even the priest.] Or, that priest who offereth it.

Shall have to himself the skin of the burnt-offering, which he hath offered.] All the flesh of the burnt-offerings being wholly consumed, as well as the fat, upon the altar, (chap. i. ver. 8, 9.) there was nothing that could fall to the share of the priest, but only the skin: which is here given him for his pains. I observed upon Gen. iii. 21. that it is probable that Adam himself offered the first sacrifice; and had the skin given him by God, to make garments for him and for his wife. In conformity to which the priests ever after had the skins of the whole burnt-offerings for their portion. Which was a custom among the gentiles (as well as the Jews), who gave the skins of their sacrifices to their priests, when they were not burnt with the sacrifices, as in some sin-offerings they were among the Jews, (iv. 11.) Who employed them to a superstitious use, by lying upon them in their temples, in hope to have future things revealed to them in their dreams. This Dilherrus hath observed, out of these words of Virgil:

——— "huc dona Sacerdos
Quum tulit, et cæsarum ovium sub nocte silenti
Pellibus incubuit stratis, somnosque petivit,
Multa modis simulacra vidit variantia miris,
Et varias audit voces, fruiturque Deorum
Colloquio." ———

And in the Eleusinia, he observes, out of Suidas, the Daduchus put on the skins of the beasts which had been sacrificed to Jupiter; which were called Διὸς κώδια, the fleece of Jupiter, (Dissert. Special. de Cacozelia Gentil. cap. 9.)

Ver. 9. And all the meat-offering that is baken in the oven, and all that is dressed in the frying-pan, and in the pan.] See concerning these various sorts of meat-offerings in the second chapter, ver. 4, 5. 7.

Shall be the priest's.] All but the memorial of it, which was burnt upon the altar. (See ii. ver. 9, 10.)

That offereth it.] That particular priest who offered it was to have the remainder for his portion.

Ver. 10. And every meat-offering.] Or, but every meat-offering: for here is an exception to the foregoing rule.

Mingled with oil, and dry.] The foregoing verse speaks of such meat-offerings as were any ways baken; but this of those that were raw: which were of two sorts; either of flour mingled with oil, as all voluntary offerings of this sort were, (ii. 1.) or dry without any oil, as some sin-offerings were, (v. 11.) and the offering of jealousy, (Numb. v. 15.)

Shall all the sons of Aaron have, one as much as another.] All the priests who attended on that day were to have an equal share in this kind of meat-offering: though he alone who ministered at the altar had the baked meat-offerings. There are some indeed who can see no reason for this difference (though this last sort, others think, was more easily divided, and therefore shared among them all), and consequently take these words to signify the same with those in the foregoing verse: Every one, in the course of his ministry, shall have this benefit, in his turn of waiting at the altar.

Ver. 11. And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace-offerings, &c.] This is the only sort of offerings remaining to be spoken of: which, when he required them of the people, are mentioned in the third place, after the burnt-offerings and meat-offerings; before the sin-offerings and trespass-offerings. But here are reserved for the last place, in his directions he gives to the priests about them; because, as there were several sorts of them, so there were various rites to be observed about them. Which rites, as I observed before, are called here the law of such sacrifices.

Ver. 12. If he offer it for a thanksgiving.] In this, and in the sixteenth verse, we have an account of three sorts of peace-offerings. This, which was the principal, for benefits received from God's bounty; the other two, for the obtaining such blessings as they desired to receive. And this of thanksgiving, was either general for the whole congregation (of which there was but one only, at one time of the year, in the feast of Pentecost, xxiii. 19, which was accounted most holy), or particularly for private persons, as occasion offered, which were accounted less holy. And they are these here mentioned; which might be either of the flock, or of the herd (but no birds), and either greater or smaller of those kinds; that is, of the herd from the first year to the third, and of the flock from the first to the second year complete. If they were older, they were not fit for sacrifice. All this R. Levi Barzelonita, (Præcept. cxxxvii.) explains at large.

Then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving, unleavened cakes mingled with oil, &c.] The same R. Levi observes, that some peace-offerings were offered without any bread; viz. such as they called hagigah and schimcah, sacrifices of festivity and rejoicing, i. e. at their great solemn festivals. But these here mentioned were all offered with bread; and that offered with this, which was the first of them, was called the bread of thanksgiving. R. Solomon Jarchi restrains this sort of peace-offerings (of thanksgiving) to such wonderful deliverances, as those mentioned in the hundred-and-seventh Psalm; from tempests at sea, or dangerous travels through the wilderness, and the like. Aben Ezra also seems to have been of the same opinion, when he saith, that men being delivered out of straits and distresses, gave thanks to God by this oblation. But I can find no ground for this limitation; it being far more likely, that this sacrifice was offered by all devout persons, for any mercy whatsoever that God bestowed upon them.

Unleavened cakes, and unleavened wafers.] For none of God's bread was to be leavened. (See chap. ii. 11.)

Ver. 13. Besides the cakes.] Beforementioned; which were to be unleavened.

He shall offer for his offering leavened bread with the sacrifice of thanksgiving, &c.] Not upon the altar (for that was absolutely forbidden in the forenamed chapter of this book), but he was to give it to the priest who waited at the altar, and was to partake of this sacrifice, and to rejoice together with him that offered it. Which is the reason that such different sorts of cakes are ordered in the foregoing verse, all unleavened (of which the priest was to have his share), and also others leavened, which are prescribed in this verse; that God's family (his servants the priests) might want no variety of bread, at their feasts upon these sacrifices: and that God might shew his friendship with those who offered the sacrifice, by accepting the same bread at his own table, which they were wont to use at theirs.

Ver. 14. And of it he shall offer out of the whole oblation, &c.] One of the cakes beforementioned (ver 12.) was to be presented to God for a heave-offering: concerning which, see Exod. xxix. 24. 28.

And it shall be the priest's that sprinkleth the blood of the peace-offerings.] Having offered one cake out of the whole, all that remained was the portion of the priest who sprinkled the blood of the peace-offerings on the altar.

Ver. 15. And the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings for thanksgiving, shall be eaten the same day that it is offered, &c.] The reason of this, which was observed in most of their sacred feasts, (particularly in the paschal lamb, Exod. xxii. 10. and in the manna itself, xvi. 19, &c.) was to maintain the honour and dignity of the sacrifices; that they might not be in danger to be corrupted, or turned to any profane use, or gratify men's covetousness. For, as Philo observes (in his book of Sacrifices), "It was not fit that these holy things should be put into their cupboards, but immediately set before those who are in need; for they were no longer his that offered them, but his to whom they were offered: who being himself most liberal and bountiful, would have guests invited to his table to partake with those who offered the sacrifice. Whom he would not have to look upon themselves as masters of the feast, ἐπίτροποι γὰρ εὐωχίας εἰσὶν οὐχ ἑστιάτορες, for they are but ministers of the feast, not the masters or entertainers. That belongs to God himself, whose bounty ought not to be concealed, by preferring sordid parsimony before generous humanity." His meaning is, that all the sacrifice was God's, who graciously granted to him that offered it a part of it to entertain his friends and the poor, whom he would have invited forthwith, that no part of it might be converted to any other use but that which God appointed, who made the feast.

Ver. 16. But if the sacrifice of his offering be a vow, or a voluntary offering.] These two other sorts of peace-offerings were in the nature of prayers, for the obtaining such blessings as they desired and hoped for. And they were either the performance of a vow, which they made to God of offering him such a sacrifice, when they received the benefit, which was called neder: or, they were freely made beforehand, in hope God would bestow the benefit; which sacrifice was called nedebah, a voluntary offering. Now these were not so holy as the former; and therefore might be eaten on the morrow, as well as on the same day they were offered. So it here follows.

It shall be eaten the same day that he offereth his sacrifice.] Then they were immediately to begin to feast upon the sacrifice.

And on the morrow also, the remainder of it shall be eaten.] But if they could not conveniently eat it all the same day, or had a mind to lay up some of it till the next, they had that liberty allowed them. For which Philo gives this reason (in the same book), that these being for mercies not yet received (or offered by virtue of an obligation), they might take more time to feast upon them with their friends, and be more sparing: but the former being a thankful acknowledgment of blessings already bestowed, their hearts were to be enlarged in greater bounty, Ἵν' οἱ ἐπιτυγχάνοντες ἑτοίμων καὶ προχείρων εὐεργεσιῶν, ἑτοίμην καὶ ἀνυπέρθετον ποιῶνται τὴν μετάδοσιν· that they upon whom God readily bestowed his benefits, might make a quick and speedy return, by doing good to others without delay. And what is here said of the flesh of the sacrifice, the Jews also understand of the meat-offerings mentioned ver. 12, 13. None of which was to be kept longer than two days at the most.

There is no place here assigned, where these sacrifices should be eaten, at the sanctuary; as there is for the other, vi. 16. 26. and here in this chapter, ver. 6. The reason is, because there was such a multitude of them, that it might have made too great a crowd in the court of the Israelites, if they had been confined to it. Where they might eat them if they pleased, (as I shewed before, vi. 16.) but were not determined to that place; but left at liberty to eat them in any part of the city where the tabernacle, and afterward the temple, stood. (See Deut. xii. 6, 7.) And consequently, while they dwelt in the wilderness, they might eat them any where in the camp; which was pitched round about the tabernacle: only it was to be in a clean place, where the priests might eat them as well as the people, (x. 14.)

Ver. 17. But the remainder of the flesh of the sacrifice on the third day, shall be burnt with fire.] If there were such plenty, or they and their friends were so few, or they were so niggardly as not to call poor enough to eat all in two days' time, they were to have no further benefit of the flesh of this sacrifice; but what remained of it on the third day was to be burnt. Which was to preserve the dignity of the sacrifice, as the Jews speak, in preventing its stinking. And there was no nobler way of consuming it than by fire, which consumed the sacrifice on the altar. So R. Levi Barzel. observes, Præcept. cxxxviii. where he also adds, that God taught them hereby not to be solicitous for the future, nor careful to hoard up more than needed; when they saw him command the holy flesh to be destroyed, after the time allotted for its use was past. The heathens themselves thought this a decent rite; for there was a sacrifice at Rome, which they called Protervia, (as Bochart observes out of Macrobius, lib. ii. Saturnal. cap. 2.) in which the custom was, ut si quid ex epulis superfuisset, igne consumeretur, that if any thing of the feast remained, it was consumed in the fire. (See his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.)

Ver. 18. And if any of the flesh of the sacrifice of the peace-offering be eaten at all on the third day, it shall not be accepted, &c.] He lost the fruit of his sacrifice which he had offered to God by this profanation; which destroyed the grace and favour which it had procured him with God.

Neither shall it be imputed to him that offered it.] He shall not be thought to have made any offering at all.

It shall be an abomination, &c.] And more than that, it rendered him abominable; being abominable itself: and made him liable to be scourged, as the Jews here understand the last words of this verse, he shall bear his iniquity. Which, I think, also signifies, that he should lie under a great guilt, till it was purged by a trespass-offering.

Ver. 19. And the flesh that toucheth any unclean thing shall not be eaten.] That is, the flesh of the peace-offerings beforementioned, which might happen, as they carried it from the altar to the place where they intended to make a feast upon it, to touch any unclean thing, might not be eaten by any body.

But burnt with fire.] As that which remained to the third day was, (ver. 17.) This made them very careful to preserve it pure.

And as for the flesh.] That is, all the flesh which was not defiled by touching any unclean thing.

All that be clean shall eat thereof.] Whether the priest, or other persons. For the priest had the right shoulder and the breast, (as we read expressly, ver. 33, 34.) and he that brought the sacrifice had the rest. Of the former, the whole family of the priest might eat; not only his sons, but his wife and daughters, who were not married; or being widows, were come back to their father again, if they had no children; or if those they had were begotten by priests: yea, his servants born in his house, or bought with his money. (See xxii. 11—13. Numb. xviii. 11.) And of the rest of the sacrifice, he that offered it might eat it, with all his family and his friends; excepting those who had any uncleanness upon them. There is frequent mention of these feasts in the following books of the Bible. As that made by Elkanah, (1 Sam. i. 4.) and by Samuel, when he entertained Saul, (1 Sam. ix. 13. 24.) And when the kingdom was renewed to Saul at Gilgal, there was a public feast made on these offerings, with great rejoicing, (1 Sam. xi. 15.) And the like was made for Jesse and his sons, (xvi. 3. 5.) And by David, when he entertained the people, (1 Chron. xvi. 3.) And by Solomon, at the dedication of the temple, (1 Kings viii. 65.) And all the children of Israel made such a feast, at their return from Babylon, (Nehem. viii. 19.) There are many examples also of the like feasts among the heathens; particularly in Homer, where Agamemnon (Iliad. i.) offered a hecatomb, and made a feast upon it. And Nestor (Odyss. iii.) offered a sacrifice of eighty-two oxen, and made the like entertainment.

Ver. 20. But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of the peace-offerings that pertain unto the Lord.] By these last words it appears, that the whole offering was the Lord's, whose bounty entertained him and his friends, to whom he gave the greatest part of it.

Having his uncleanness upon him, &c.] In this verse and in the next, every one that had any legal defilement upon him is prohibited, under a severe penalty, to eat of the peace-offerings.

And they might be made unclean either by impurity in their own body, or by the contact of unclean things; of the former of which he speaks in this verse; and of the other in the next. Both were to be punished with cutting-off; which hath been explained elsewhere, (Gen. xvii. 14.) From whence it was that the Jews were so very careful, not to go into the judgment-hall when our Saviour was condemned, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover, (John xviii. 28.) at which feast, peace-offerings were offered together with the paschal lamb. (See more of this xxii. 2—4.)

Ver. 21. Moreover, the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing.] All these several sorts of uncleanness, contracted by touching things unclean, we shall find in the following chapters, xi. &c.

And shall eat the flesh of the sacrifice of peace-offerings, which pertain unto the Lord, even that soul shall be cut off, &c.] The intention of such precepts was, that the greater reverence (as Maimonides speaks, par. iii. More Nevoch. cap. 41.) might be maintained towards the sacrifices which were offered unto God. Upon which account, Julian highly commends Moses, who, he saith, (as St. Cyril quotes his words, lib. ix. contra Julian.) was ὄντως εὐλαβὴς περὶ τὴν τῶν ἱερῶν ἐδωδὴν, truly religious about the eating of holy things; which he proves from these very words of Moses. But his conclusion from thence was very frigid, as St. Cyril calls it, that Christians were therefore to blame, because they would not partake of such sacrifices: for we abstain not from them, saith that father, as unclean things, but ἡμεῖς δὲ μᾶλλον ὡς ἐκ τύπων, ἐπὶ τὸ ἀληθὲς, we rather make a progress, as from types, unto the truth.

Ver. 22. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] At the same time that all these precepts were ordered to be delivered to the priests, he takes occasion to repeat several precepts he had before given, which concern all the people; because it was of great moment to have them observed.

Ver. 23. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Ye shall eat no manner of fat.] Because this was God's part, and therefore not to be eaten by any one, but burnt upon his altar. (See iii. 16, 17.) And the reason Maimonides gives, why it was reserved for him alone, was, because it was very delicious to the taste, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41.)

Of ox, or of sheep, or of goat.] The Jews restrain this precept to these three sorts of creatures (which were the only beasts that were offered to the altar), taking the fat of all other beasts to be lawful. (So R. Levi, beforementioned, Præcept. cxlix.)

Ver. 24. And the fat of the beast.] Of one of the forenamed beasts, which alone were allowed in sacrifices.

That dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use, &c.] Though the flesh of such beasts was unclean, yet they might apply the fat, when separated from the body, to any use: only they might not eat it.

Ver. 25. For whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] This seems to justify the opinion of those Jews who restrain the eating of fat only to the three sorts of creatures mentioned ver. 23. as was there observed.

Even the soul that eateth it, shall be cut off from his people.] If he did it presumptuously; but if through inadvertence, he was to be scourged, as the Jewish doctors affirm. Yet, if he did it a third time, scourging did not suffice; but they shut him up in a little cave, where he could not stand upright, nor had room to sit down; and there fed him with the bread and water of affliction, till his bowels were sorely pinched, &c. as Maimonides describes this punishment. (See Schikkard's Mischpat Hammeleck, and Carpzovius's annot. on him, cap. 2. Theorer. vii.)

Ver. 26. Moreover, ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl, or of beast.] See iii. 17. Men were very prone to this in those times (as Maimonides thinks), whereby they ran into idolatrous worship. Which was the reason God restrained them from it, by threatening cutting off (ver. 27.) to those who were guilty of it, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41.)

In any of your dwellings.] This is added to signify, that they might no more eat of the blood of those beasts which they killed at home, than of those slain at the altar.

Ver. 27. Whatsoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off, &c.] The reason of it is given xvii. 10, 11. But the Jews here distinguish (particularly R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cxlviii.) between the blood of the soul, or the life (as they speak), and the blood of a member. The former, which run out freely when the beast was killed, in which was the life of the beast, is that which is here meant, as Moses more fully explains it, in the place beforementioned. The other, which remained in the several parts of the beast, they looked upon as belonging to the flesh, and therefore might be eaten with it.

Ver. 28. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] He delivered at the same time some other rules to be observed by the people in these matters. (See ver. 22.)

Ver. 29. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, He that offereth the sacrifice of his peace-offerings unto the Lord, shall bring his oblation unto the Lord of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings.] The meaning may be no more than this, that before he and his friends feasted together, as is directed ver. 15, &c. he was to take care to bring his oblation unto the Lord, that is, to see that God had his part of the peace-offering; for till that was offered, none could meddle with the rest. But if the import of the Hebrew words be well observed, they seem to have a further meaning; which is, that whensoever any man brought the sacrifice (which in the Hebrew is here called zebach) of his peace-offerings, he should also bring his oblation (which, in distinction from the other, is called korban), that is, a mincah, or meat-offering together with it; that the feast which was to be made, might be completely furnished with bread and wine, as well as the flesh of the sacrifice.

Ver. 30. His own hands shall bring the offerings of the Lord made by fire, the fat, with the breast, it shall he bring.] The sacrifice being slain and divided, the priest was to put what belonged unto the Lord into the man's own hands (viz. the fat, with the breast and the shoulder), that he might present it himself unto the Divine Majesty.

That the breast may be waved, for a wave-offering before the Lord.] This is the manner wherein it was to be presented; the man was to lift it up over his head, and wave it to and fro; his hands being supported and guided by the priest. (See Exod. xxix. 24. and Numb. vi. 19, 20.) Maimonides describes the order of it in this manner: first, the priest put into the man's hands the fat; and then laid upon it the breast and the shoulder; and after that, one of the pieces of the cakes for the meat-offering upon them; all which he waved about.

Ver. 31. And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar: but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons'.] When that part which belonged to God's altar (viz. the fat) had been burnt there, the priests had the breast and the shoulder to their own use; as servants have what comes from their master's table. For it was all offered unto God, (ver. 29, 30.) who, taking only the fat for himself, bade them take the rest, viz. the breast and the shoulder: which had been presented unto God by waving them to and fro, as a sacrifice to the Lord of the world; but by him bestowed upon his ministers for their maintenance in his service. This is more fully expressed in the three next verses; in which there is no difficulty, and therefore I shall but lightly touch them.

Ver. 32. And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priests, &c.] This is only a more particular declaration what belonged to the priest; who was to have not only the breast beforementioned, but also the right shoulder.

Ver. 33. He among the sons of Aaron that offereth the blood of the peace-offerings, and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part.] This is still a more special direction, providing for the encouragement of that priest, who, on that day, ministered at the altar; unto whom the right shoulder was appropriated, as a reward of his pains in offering the sacrifice.

Ver. 34. For the wave-breast, and the heave-shoulder, have I taken of the children of Israel, from off the sacrifices of their peace-offerings, and have given them to Aaron and his sons, &c.] This doth not contradict what I observed just before; for when he saith, he hath given these to Aaron the priest and his sons, the meaning must be, to those of his sons, who, at the time when these were offered, sprinkled the blood and burnt the fat.

Ver. 35. This is the portion of the anointing of Aaron, and of the anointing of his sons, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, This is the anointing of Aaron, &c. that is, this they have in right of their unction to the priest's office; which entitles them to all beforementioned.

In the day.] The Hebrew word bejom may, both here and in the next verse, be translated (as I observed before, vi. 20.) from the day, and ever after.

When he presented them to minister unto the Lord in the priest's office.] Made them draw near to attend upon him at his altar.

Ver. 36. Which the Lord commanded to be given them, in the day that he anointed them, &c.] By virtue of a grant from God when they were made priests, to enjoy this benefit in all future ages.

By a statute for ever, &c.] As long as this law of sacrifices and this priesthood shall last. (See vi. 22.)

Ver. 37. This is the law of the burnt-offering, of the meat-offering, and of the sin-offering, and of the trespass-offering, &c.] This verse contains a summary of what he had commanded Aaron and his sons, from the ninth verse of the sixth chapter unto this place.

And of the consecrations.] The whole order of their consecration is not here directed, (but in Exod. xxix.) only something belonging to that matter, (vi. 20, &c.)

Ver. 38. Which the Lord commanded Moses in Mount Sinai.] In that mountainous country which lay near to Mount Sinai, as Maimonides truly expounds it. For he was come down from Mount Sinai, and had delivered to them all that he received there, (Exod. xxxiv. 29. 32.) before these commands were given: but they still continued near unto it; and so the word behar may be translated, by Mount Sinai. For, as the last words of this verse tell us, they were still in the wilderness of Sinai: that is, in that part of the wilderness which took its name from its nearness to Mount Sinai.

In the day that he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto the Lord, &c.] This doth not precisely signify, that he commanded Aaron and his sons (vi. 9, &c.) all these things, on the very same day that he commanded the children of Israel what oblations to bring, (chap. i. 2, &c.) but they were delivered all at the same time, immediately after the other, without any other commandments intervening.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] See iv. 1.

Ver. 2. Take Aaron and his sons with him.] Having delivered the laws and rules about sacrifices and the rites belonging to them, he now prepares the priests to offer them, as had been commanded. And there is not much said in this chapter, but what had been explained in Exod. xxix. and other neighbouring chapters; where he relates the orders he received in Mount Sinai about those things which were now performed.

And the garments.] Exod. xxviii. 2. 4.

And the anointing oil.] Exod. xxx. 24, &c.

And a bullock for the sin-offering, and two rams, and a basket of unleavened bread.] See Exod. xxix. 1—3, &c. These were in their kind the very best of the legal sacrifices, as appears, in part, from that expression of the Psalmist, Psalm lxix. 30, 31. where he prefers thanksgiving and praise, before a bullock that hath horns and hoofs (a young bullock, which began to spread its horns and hoofs), that is, before the very best of all their bloody sacrifices.

Ver. 3. And gather thou all the congregation together, &c.] All the elders of the people, with the great officers who were set over thousands and hundreds, &c. For these are frequently called by the name of col ha edah, which we translate all the congregation; particularly in Numb. xxv. 7. xxxv. 12. Josh. xx. 6. Judg. xxi. 10. 13. 16. where the elders of the congregation, and the congregation, and all the congregation, are plainly the same thing. Which is further confirmed from the next chapter of this book, (ver. 1.) where it is said expressly, Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel.

Ver. 4. And Moses did as the Lord commanded.] Summoned them to appear before the Lord.

And the assembly was gathered together.] The word we translate assembly, is the same with that in the foregoing verse, which we translate congregation: that is, as I said, the assembly of the elders.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] That they might be witnesses of what was done, and satisfy all the people, that Aaron and his sons did not intrude themselves into his office; but were solemnly called and consecrated to it by Moses, the servant of the Lord. It is likely, also, that as many of the people as the place would conveniently hold, met together to be spectators of this solemnity.

Ver. 5. And Moses said unto the congregation, This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done.] I am now about to execute what God hath formerly commanded, when I was with him in the holy mount, (Exod. xxix. 4.) At what time this was executed, is a question among learned men. And our great primate of Ireland places this consecration of Aaron and his sons, together with the tabernacle and all things belonging to it, in the second month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt: moved thereunto, I suppose, by what is said in Numb. vii. 1, 2. So that, according to his opinion, the numbering of the people, and the separation of the Levites to God's service, preceded this action. But I do not see any reason why we should not think all things were done in the order wherein they are here related. And then this consecration was performed in the first month of that year; after the tabernacle had been erected and set apart for the habitation of the Divine Majesty. (See Exod. xl. 17, 18.)

Ver. 6. And Moses brought Aaron and his sons.] To the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; as he had been directed, (Exod. xxix. 4.)

And washed them with water.] As is there also directed; having first likewise washed himself, (xl. 31.)

Ver. 7. And he put upon him the coat, and girded him with the girdle, &c.] Moses, by an extraordinary commission from God, performed the office of a high-priest on this day, and the six days following: and put Aaron in possession of this office by clothing him with the garments here mentioned, (according to the orders which had been given, Exod. xxix. 5, &c.) which was thought sufficient for the consecration of a high-priest, after the captivity of Babylon; when they wanted the holy oil, as hath been before observed. Whence Philo often calls Moses by the name of Ἀρχιερεὺς, i. e. high-priest. And in Schemoth Rabba the tradition is, that he continued high-priest all the time they continued in the wilderness: though others, they confess, are of opinion (which is the truth) that he officiated only the seven days of the consecration; after which this office was settled in Aaron. (See Selden, lib. i. de Succession. in Pontificatum, cap. 1.)

Ver. 8. And he put the breast-plate upon him: also he put in the breast-plate the urim and the thummim.] See Exod. xxviii. 30. It is observable that he saith nothing here in this place of the precious stones, but only mentions urim and thummim; as in Exod. xxxix. 10. (where he describes the same thing) he makes mention only of the four rows of stones, but saith not one word of urim and thummim: which I look upon as a proof that they were all one.

Ver. 9. And he put the mitre upon his head; and upon the mitre, the golden plate, the holy crown, &c.] According as God commanded him in Exod. xxviii. 36, 37, &c. xxix. 6.

Ver. 10. And Moses took the anointing oil, and anointed the tabernacle, and all that was therein.] See Exod xxix. 26, &c. and Exod. xl. 9—11. There being several ways of anointing a thing or person, either by pouring oil upon them, or by putting it upon them with the finger, or by sprinkling; it is not an improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, that Moses anointed the tabernacle and its utensils, by dipping his finger in the oil, and putting it upon them. For though the word mascah, which he useth for anointing, be general, yet the Vulgar expressing it by linivit, and the LXX. by ἔχρισε (which import this particular sort of anointing), and there being different words used to express the anointing of the altar and of Aaron, it may well incline one to his opinion; (Myrothec. 2. Sacr. Elæochrysm. cap. 70.)

And sanctified them.] Set them apart by this unction for the holy use; for which they were designed.

Ver. 11. And he sprinkled thereof upon the altar seven times; and anointed the altar, and all its vessels, &c.] We do not find this expressly before directed: but the intention of anointing the altar being to make it most holy, (because it was to sanctify all that was laid upon it, Exod. xxx. 29. xl. 10.) it was very fit it should be both sprinkled seven times with oil, and also anointed: in token of its extraordinary sanctity, which was put upon it by this very solemn rite. For here are two distinct words about this anointing; the first is jaz, he sprinkled of the oil upon it; and then jimshach, he anointed it, by putting some of the oil on it: whereas it is said of the tabernacle, and of the things there, only jimshach, he anointed them, without any sprinkling.

Some think, that the altar being mentioned twice in this verse, he speaks of the altar of incense, as well as of the altar of burnt-offerings. But it is plain by those places in Exodus it was the altar of burnt-offerings, which was thus sanctified; and here the laver and its foot (which stood in the same court) is said to be sanctified with it. As for the altar of incense, it is included in what is said in the foregoing verse, that he anointed the tabernacle and all therein.

Both the laver and his foot, to sanctify them.] It may be thought that he sprinkled with oil the laver and its foot, as well as anointed them; which is the opinion of the forenamed Fort. Scacchus. But the Hebrew words will not warrant it; for they only signify that they were anointed as the altar was after its aspersion.

Ver. 12. And he poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head.] Here now is a third word distinct from the two former, viz. jitzok, which signifies there was more done to Aaron than to any of the holy things, to sanctify him to his office; for the holy oil was poured on his head.

And anointed him.] Perhaps he drew the oil with his finger upon his forehead, after it was poured on his head, as the Jews think he did. (See Exod. xxix. 7, 8. xxx. 30. xl. 13.)

To sanctify him.] i. e. Set him apart to this sacred office. Now this consecration of Aaron and his sons being mentioned here together with the consecration of the tabernacle and all belonging to it, it hath made some conclude, that both were done at the very same time. But I have given some arguments to prove the contrary, upon Exod. xl. 17, 18. And the meaning of these three verses (tenth, eleventh, and twelfth of this chapter) may be, not that they were consecrated at the same time, but with the same oil. For first he says, Moses took the anointing oil; and shews how it was employed after a different manner upon the tabernacle and its utensils, upon the altar, and upon Aaron, on whose head it was poured; whereas the former had it only put upon them with the finger, or were sprinkled with it. But though they were not consecrated together, yet their consecration immediately followed one another. For seven days being spent in sanctifying the tabernacle and the altar, then immediately began the sanctification of Aaron and his sons: during which time Moses may be supposed to have received the foregoing laws about sacrifices, in which they were to be employed as soon as they were consecrated. And the seven days for the consecration of Aaron and his sons, immediately succeeding the other seven days which were spent in the consecration of the tabernacle and the altar; it may be the reason why they are here succinctly mentioned both together, and neither of them mentioned before. For if the account we have in the fortieth of Exodus concerning these things be well attended to, it will appear that nothing is there said of the anointing of the tabernacle, or any thing else; but only that he set it up the first day of the month, as he was commanded ver. 2, &c. and 17, &c. And he is commanded in like manner to take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle and all therein, (ver. 9, &c.) and then to anoint Aaron and his sons; (ver. 13. 15.) but he relates nothing of his doing either of them till now, when he executed those commands.

Ver. 13. And Moses brought Aaron's sons, and put coats upon them, and girded them with girdles, &c.] See Exod. xxviii. 40, 41. xxix. 30. xl. 14.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] He commanded him also to anoint them at the same time, (Exod. xxviii. 41. xl. 15.) but it is not here mentioned; because they were not anointed as he was, by pouring oil upon their heads; but sprinkling it on their garments, with the blood of the sacrifice offered for them. And that he did afterward as he had been ordered, ver. 30. (See Exod. xxviii. 41. xxix. 7.)

Ver. 14. And he brought the bullock.] See Exod. xxix. 1. 10. &c.

For a sin-offering.] So it was designed to be, Exod. xxix. 14.

And Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the bullock for the sin-offering.] See Exod. xxix. 10. Levit. i. 4.

Ver. 15. And he slew it.] Exod. xxix. 11.

And Moses took the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about with his finger.] As he had been directed, Exod. xxix. 12.

And purified the altar.] It was purified before; but this was a further purification of it; that it might be the more fitted to be a place to make reconciliation upon it, as it follows in the conclusion of the verse.

And poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar, and sanctified it, &c.] The Vulgar Latin, I think, gives the true interpretation of these words, rather than translate them in this manner; it being expiated and sanctified, he poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar, &c. Fort. Scacchus hath taken a great deal of pains to prove that this expiation (as the Vulgar Latin calls it) went before the anointing or consecration of the altar; in his Myrothec. (par. ii. cap. 34.) But his arguments seem to me of no force to overthrow the opinion of Abulensis and Philo, that these words do not speak of a proper expiation of the altar; but that it was only hereby more particularly set apart (as the word sanctify signifies), to be the place where sin-offerings might be made; that men who had committed offences might be expiated by these sacrifices.

Ver. 16. And he took all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul, &c.] See Exod. xxix. 13.

Ver. 17. But the bullock and his skin, his flesh and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp, as the Lord commanded Moses.] See Exod. xxix. 14. Yet we do not find that the blood of this sacrifice was carried into the holy place; and therefore it did not fall under the rule in the sixth chapter of this book, (ver. 30.) but might have been eaten by the priests, as is there allowed, (ver. 26.) Some think it sufficient, for the solution of this, to say that Aaron and his sons were not yet completely consecrated, and therefore had not a right to eat of the flesh of this sin-offering. But such persons do not consider that Moses, who now acted as a priest, could not be debarred of that benefit by this reason. And therefore it is better to say, that no high-priest, whether ordinary or extraordinary (such as Moses now was), might eat of any sin-offering, offered for the priests themselves; although the blood of it was not brought into the sanctuary. From whence we may draw this consequence: that although the sins of the people were taken away by the priests; who, by eating of their sin-offering, plainly shewed that they bare their sin, (as the phrase is, x. 17.) yet the sins of the priests themselves could not be taken away, by any sacrifice they could offer for sin, of which they might not eat: but they were to expect, as an excellent person of our own speaks, (Dr. Jackson, book ix. upon the Creed, chap. 26.) a better sacrifice, made by a better high-priest, the Son of God. But these legal sacrifices, in the mean time, were offered in such a place, as prefigured the place where this better sacrifice should be offered, viz. without the camp: as when they came to their rest, without the city of Jerusalem, where our Saviour's body was offered for our redemption.

Ver. 18. And he brought the ram for the burnt-offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram.] According to the direction given to Moses, when he was with God in Mount Sinai, (Exod. xxix. 15, 16.) where all that follows here, to the end of the twenty-first verse, is explained: this being nothing else but the execution of what was before ordered.

Ver. 22. And he brought the other ram.] For he was commanded to bring two, (ver. 2. and Exod. xxix. 1.)

The ram of consecration.] So it is called Exod xxix. 22. 31. for the reason there given.

Ver. 23, 24. And he slew it, and Moses took of the blood of it, &c.] These two verses are explained Exod. xxix. 20. where order was given for what was now done. I shall only add a remark of R. Levi ben Gersom, upon the order wherein these sacrifices were offered; which was most rational. For, first, there was a sacrifice for sin offered, (ver. 14.) before they could be worthy to have any gift or present which they made to God received by him. But upon their expiation, a whole burnt-offering was accepted; (ver. 18.) and after that followed this sacrifice, which was a peace-offering, (as appears from ver. 31.) part of which was burnt upon the altar, part given to the priest, and the rest they themselves ate for whom it was offered; that it might appear they were so far in the favour of God, as to eat with him of his meat from his table. Abarbinel hath the same observation.

Ver. 25. And he took the fat, and the rump, &c.] All this verse likewise is there explained, Exod. xxix. 22.

Ver. 26—28. And out of the basket of unleavened bread, &c.] These three verses shew, that Moses exactly followed the orders he had received Exod. xxix. 23—25. where they have been explained.

Ver. 28. Burnt them upon the burnt-offering.] This shews that they were not a burnt-offering properly, as I there observed, but an appendix to it.

They were consecrations for a sweet savour.] Because they were offered to consecrate and sanctify them, as this is explained Exod. xxix. 33. (See there.)

Ver. 29. And Moses took the breast and waved it, &c.] According to the direction given Exod. xxix. 26. where it is also ordered that this should be Moses's part.

Ver. 30. And he took of the anointing oil, and of the blood that was upon the altar, and sprinkled it on Aaron, &c.] See Exod. xxix. 21. where it appears plainly this blood that was mixed with the oil, was the blood of the ram of consecration.

Ver. 31. And Moses said unto Aaron and his sons, boil the flesh at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and there eat it, &c.] God having had his part, (ver. 28.) and Moses, who performed the office of a priest at this time, having had that which belonged to him on that account, (ver. 29.) the rest was given (as the manner was in peace-offerings) to those for whom the sacrifice was offered: that is, all but the right shoulder, which was burnt upon the altar, and the wave breast, which was given to Moses, as priest. (See Exod. xxix. 31, 32.)

Ver. 32. That which remains of the flesh and the blood shall ye burn with fire.] See Exod. xxix. 34. This shews it was of the nature of a peace-offering, (vii. 15. 17.)

Ver. 33. And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle in seven days, &c.] For till then their consecration was not perfected (as the following words signify), no more than the consecration of the altar was, till a bullock had been offered, to cleanse it, and make an atonement for it, seven days together. (See Exod. xxix. 35—37.) This was to make them more sensible of the great weight, as well as dignity of their office.

Ver. 34. As he had done this day, so the Lord hath commanded to do, to make an atonement for you.] Every day of these seven those sacrifices were to be repeated, the sin-offering, the burnt-offering, and the peace-offering; and their garments were to be sprinkled with the blood and the anointing oil, as the Lord required when Moses was with him in the mount, (Exod. xxix. 35.) This shews the imperfection of all the legal sacrifices; which would not have been so often repeated, if they had been of greater efficacy: yet the continuance of them seven days, doth signify the complete consecration of these priests, according to the rites of those times. In conformity to which, our great high-priest, the Lord Christ, who was perfected by one sacrifice of himself, spent seven days in his consecration to his office. For as Aaron is commanded to attend at the tabernacle so many days together, in like manner our Lord Christ, (as Dr. Jackson observes in the forenamed book, chap. 25.) did attend the temple five days one after another, before his death; (see John xii. 1. 12, &c. Matt. xxi. 8, 9, &c.) and having purged it on the first or second of those days, from the profaneness that was exercised in it by merchandizing; and afterward hallowed it by his doctrine, and by his Divine presence, which appeared in several miraculous cures, he went the sixth day into his heavenly sanctuary, into paradise itself; to purify and sanctify it with his own blood: as Moses, at Aaron's consecration, did the material sanctuary and altar with the blood of beasts. And having rested the seventh day, finished all by his resurrection early the next day in the morning.

Ver. 35. Therefore shall ye abide at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where all things mentioned in this chapter had been done, and were still to be repeated, (ver. 3, 4.) for they could not go into the sanctuary till they were completed.

Day and night.] This was to make their consecration more solemn, and taken notice of by all the people.

Seven days.] By which means, a sabbath, as the Jews observe, passed over their heads: without which, they conceive, Aaron and his sons could not have been completed. But the sabbath of the Lord did never so exactly pass over any high-priest in his consecration, as it did over the High-priest of the New Testament. For however it were of Aaron's it was to our blessed Saviour (as the forenamed Dr. Jackson notes) a day of rest indeed, after six days of labour, watching, praying, and fasting, which concluded in his bloody death and passion.

And keep the charge of the Lord.] That which he had now enjoined. Or rather, watch the tabernacle and his vessels, &c. as they were to do in time to come. The Hebrew doctors have here raised a great difficulty, about the necessary easements of nature; for which they had no convenience, if they might not stir for seven days from the door of the tabernacle; and therefore they fancy, there was a hole digged in the ground for such occasions. But it is more likely they were not so confined, as not to be allowed this liberty: and one cannot well doubt of it, who considers the word mismoroth here used (which we translate keep the charge of the Lord), which is a military phrase, signifying the stations and watches kept in their turns for certain hours: after which they were at liberty to attend their own affairs. Such was the charge here one may reasonably think, of not departing from the door of the tabernacle, while they were upon the guard (as we speak), which some or other of them kept night and day; in such order, that while some watched, others might sleep, or step out about the necessary occasions of nature.

That ye die not.] It may seem hard that they should be in peril of their life, if they omitted any of these rites. But this was necessary, to make those serious and intent upon their business, who were to save the lives of others, by making expiation for them, when they deserved to perish.

For so I am commanded.] These orders, as hath been already observed, he received in the holy mount.

So Aaron and his sons did all things which the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.] This was necessary to be added, that all generations might be assured, whatsoever was performed by their ministry, would be effectual, to the end for which it was appointed; they being exactly consecrated to God's service, without the least omission of any thing that he had required. In like manner, our great High-priest was consecrated to his eternal priesthood, by fulfilling all the will of God; and that in a far more solemn and public way than Aaron's was; it being performed by suffering such things, as nothing but a perfect filial obedience to his heavenly Father could have moved him to admit, because it was accomplished by shedding his own blood in a lingering death.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass on the eighth day.] He doth not mean on the eighth day of the month; but on the next day after their consecration, which was seven days in doing, (viii. 33. 35.) Then it was that the fire fell down from heaven, and consumed the sacrifices which Aaron offered: and this seems also to have been the first day of unleavened bread, which fell upon the fifteenth day of this month; for on the fourteenth in the even, which was the last day of the consecration of the priests, the Passover was kept, (Numb. ix. 2. 5.)

That Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel.] Just as he had done before, (viii. 2, 3.) that the rulers, and as many of the people as could meet together, to behold what was done, might see the glory of the Lord, which appeared at this time, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 2. And he said unto Aaron, Take thee a young calf.] This is the first sacrifice that was offered to God, by the priests of the order of Aaron. It differed from that which was offered by Moses for Aaron and his sons, as egel, a young calf, doth from par, a young bullock: by which his sin was expiated at his consecration. And Maimonides saith, that the former signifies a calf of one year old; the latter one of two. Others say, a calf was called egel till his horns budded; and then it was called par.

For a sin-offering.] For his sins in general; not for any determinate offence, like that iv. 3. which therefore was something different from this. The Jews fancy, that a young calf was appointed for the first sin-offering, to put Aaron and the people in mind of the golden calf, which they worshipped. So Maimonides reports the opinion of their wise men, in his More Nevoch. (par. iii. cap. 46.) Where he also hath this conceit, that it was to expiate that sin.

And a ram for a burnt-offering.] For none but males were accepted for burnt-offerings, (i. 10.) There is no peace-offering ordered for him, (as there is afterward for the people, ver. 4.) because it was not fit he should have all the sacrifice, as he must have had, according to the law of such sacrifices, being both the priest and the offerer; between whom and the priest (after the fat was burnt) all was to be shared.

Ver. 3. And unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak, saying.] Unto all the elders, (ver. 1.) who were to bring the following offerings, in the name of all the people of Israel; and that by Aaron's direction, who was now to act as God's high-priest, and give out this order.

Take ye a kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] The Hebrew word seir signifies a he-goat. Concerning which Maimonides (in his book concerning Sacrifices) delivers this opinion, that "all sacrifices for sin, whether of private persons, or the whole congregation, at their three principal feasts, new moons, and the day of expiation, were he-goats." For this reason, because the greatest sin and rebellion of those times was, that they sacrificed to demons, who were wont to appear in that form. For which he quotes, xvii. 7. They shall no more offer their sacrifices, lesseirim; which we translate unto devils: but the word seirim is but the plural number of the word seir, which signifies a goat. And further he adds, that their wise men think the sin of the whole congregation was therefore expiated by this kid of a goat, because all the family of Israel sinned about a goat when they sold Joseph into Egypt, (Gen. xxxvii. 31.) And such reasons, saith he, as these should not seem trifles, for the end and scope of all these actions was, to imprint and engrave on the mind of sinners the offences they had committed, that they might never forget them. According to that of David, Psalm li. 5. "My sin is ever before me."

This sin-offering was different from that iv. 14. being not for any particular sin, as that was; but in general, for all the offences that the high-priest might have committed.

A calf and a lamb, both of the first year, &c.] When they were in their prime.

Ver. 4. Also a bullock and a ram.] These also were, no doubt, to be without blemish, as is prescribed in the two foregoing offerings. And the Hebrew word sor (which we translate a bullock) often signifies a well-grown ox: as in Exod. xxi. 28. Deut. xxv. 8. As ajil, a ram, the Hebrews say, signifies a sheep of above a year old. These made very large peace-offerings, and consequently a liberal feast upon them.

For peace-offerings.] The very same order is here observed that was at Aaron's consecration: first, sin-offerings, then a burnt-offering, and then a peace-offering was offered to the Lord, (viii. 14. 18. 22.)

And a meat-offering mingled with oil.] Which was to complete the peace-offerings on which they were to feast, that meat might not be without bread to it.

For to-day the Lord will appear to you.] Give you an illustrious token of his presence by sending fire from heaven, or from the brightness of his glory, to consume the sacrifice, (ver. 23, 24.) Whereby they were all assured that both the institution of this priesthood, and the sacrifices offered by it, were acceptable to the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 5. And they brought that which Moses commanded.] Both Aaron (ver. 2.) and all the congregation (ver. 3.) brought all the offerings which Moses required.

Before the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where these sacrifices were to be offered.

And all the congregation drew near and stood before the Lord.] Approached to the door of the tabernacle, and stood there by their sacrifices, looking towards the holy place; and worshipped the Lord.

Ver. 6. And Moses said.] Unto the congregation.

This is the thing which the Lord commanded that ye should do.] I require this of you by the commandment of God, who will demonstrate, by a visible token, his presence among you.

And the glory of the Lord shall appear unto you.] That glory which filled the tabernacle when it was erected, (Exod. xl. 34, 35.) openly shewed itself to them all, (ver. 23.) and declared his grace and favour towards them, by consuming their sacrifices, as an acceptable oblation to him, (ver. 24.) Whereby a particular honour also was done unto Aaron, who was hereby most illustriously owned to be God's high-priest; and all other persons deterred from pretending to his office.

Ver. 7. And Moses said unto Aaron, Go unto the altar, and offer thy sin-offering, and thy burnt-offering.] One of them after the other, in the order wherein they were directed, viz. his sin-offering first, to make his burnt-offering accepted.

Make an atonement for thyself and for the people.] First for himself, (as the apostle observes, Heb. vii. 27.) that then he might be capable to offer for the sins of the people. This was the great imperfection of the Aaronical priests, that they were sinners like other men: by reason whereof they were bound, "as for the people, so also for themselves, to offer for sins," (Heb. v. 3.)

And offer the offering of the people, and make an atonement for them.] After he had offered both the sin-offering, (ver. 8.) and the burnt-offering, (ver. 13.) for himself; then he was to begin to offer for the people. For his own sins being expiated, and his burnt-offering being accepted, he was fit to procure remission and acceptance for them.

Ver. 8. Aaron therefore went unto the altar.] That he might be ready to perform his part of the service, which was to sprinkle the blood, after he had first of all offered the morning sacrifice. (See ver. 17.)

And slew the calf of the sin-offering which was for himself.] Ordered it to be slain: for this was no part of the priest's work, as I shewed upon the first chapter, ver. 5.

Ver. 9. And the sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him.] They received it in basons as it run from the calf when it was killed, (see i. 5.) and brought it unto him; who stood at the altar to receive it, and do what follows.

And he dipped his finger in the blood.] The fore-finger of the right hand, which had been sanctified to this ministry, by putting the blood of the sacrifice of consecration upon the thumb of the right hand, (viii. 23, 24.) whereby we grasp all things, and cannot hold them strongly, nor perform any thing well, if that be wanting.

And put it upon the horns of the altar, &c.] See iv. 25.

Ver. 10. But the fat, and the kidneys, and the caul about the liver.] See iv. 8, 9.

He burnt upon the altar, as the Lord commanded Moses.] Laid or disposed them upon the altar, to be burnt by the heavenly fire, (ver. 24.) as most understand it. And the LXX. justify this opinion; who, though they here translate it, he offered it on the altar, yet, ver. 13. where there is the same phrase, they expressly translate it, ἐπέθηκεν τὸ ὁλοκαύτωμα ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον, he laid the burnt-offering upon the altar: and again, ver. 17. in the same manner, ἐπέθηκεν ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον χωρὶς, &c. he laid it upon the altar, beside the burnt-sacrifice of the morning. For common fire, it is supposed, was no longer to be used when Aaron's sacrifice began; as it had been all along before. But there is no certainty in this: and we may as well take the words in their proper sense, that Aaron burnt this and the following sacrifice, as Moses had done before, (viii. 14. 21. 28.) until the burnt-offering for the people came to be offered, which God consumed by fire from himself: and then followed those other sacrifices mentioned, ver. 17, 18. For all these sacrifices, for Aaron and for the people, could not be laid upon the altar at once; but one after another, in the order here directed: and consequently, this sacrifice here mentioned was actually burnt upon the altar, to make way for those which followed it.

Ver. 11. And the flesh and the hide he burnt with fire, without the camp.] See viii. 17.

Ver. 12. And he slew the burnt-offering, and Aaron's sons presented to him the blood, &c.] See i. 5.

Ver. 13, 14. And they presented the burnt-offering unto him, with the pieces thereof, &c.] All that is contained in these two verses is explained in the first chapter, (ver. 8, 9.) where the law about burnt-offerings is delivered.

Ver. 15. And he brought the people's sin-offering, &c.] Having offered all that was necessary for himself, now he became fit to make supplication for the people.

And offered it for sin, as the first.] In the same manner as he offered the foregoing sin-offering for himself, (ver. 8, &c.)

Ver. 16. And he brought the burnt-offering.] Here being no express mention of burning it, some from thence conclude, that this was the offering which alone was consumed by fire from the Lord. (See ver. 24.)

And offered it according to the manner.] Laid it upon the altar, as Moses had directed in the first chapter of this book.

Ver. 17. And he brought the meat-offering, &c.] Which attended upon burnt-offerings, (Numb. xv. 2—4, &c.)

Beside the burnt-offering of the morning.] This shews that Aaron began his priestly function with the morning sacrifice, which preceded all other, and was never omitted for the sake of any other sacrifice that was to follow it, and it had always a meat-offering waiting upon it, (Exod. xxix. 39, 40.)

Ver. 18, 19. He slew also the bullock and the ram, for a sacrifice of peace-offerings.] These two verses are explained in the third chapter; which treats of such kind of offerings.

Ver. 20. And he put the fat upon the breasts, &c.] That it might by elevation and waving be presented unto the Lord; and then burnt upon the altar. (See vii. 30.)

Ver. 21. And the breasts and the right shoulder Aaron waved for a wave-offering before the Lord.] The fat being burnt upon the altar, as God's portion, these were the portion of the priests; who feasted upon God's meat; for they were solemnly presented unto him, before they had them. (See vii. 34.)

Ver. 22. And Aaron lifted up his hands towards the people.] Imploring the Divine blessing upon the people; which he afterwards pronounced. At this day, they that are of the family of Aaron, going up the steps which lead to the place where the book of the law is kept, lift up their hands as high as their heads, and pronounce a blessing in their synagogues upon the assembly. And they say the ancient custom was, which is still observed, not only to lift up and spread their hands, but then to join them together by the thumbs, and the two fore-fingers; dividing the other from them, in that figure which is represented by an eminently learned person, J. Wagenseil, in his commentary upon Sota, (cap. 7. p. 672. and 1132.)

And blessed them.] We read of no order for this: but natural reason taught them, from the beginning, that the priestly office consisted in praying for the people, and blessing them: we find an example of it in Gen. xiv. 18, 19. And not long after Aaron's consecration, Moses delivered from God a form of words, wherein the priests should bless the people, (Numb. vi. 24.) And at this day, there is nothing done among the Jews with such solemnity, and in which they place so much sanctity, as this. For when the blessing is pronounced in their synagogues, they all cover their faces; believing they would be struck blind, if they should look up: because the Divine Majesty, at that time, sits upon the hands of the priest. So the same Wagenseil observes, in the place abovenamed: which shews, not only how laborious they have been to maintain in the people's minds an opinion, that God is still as much present with them in their synagogues, as he was anciently in the tabernacle and temple; but how high a value they set upon the Divine blessing pronounced by his ministers.

And came down from offering the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering, and peace-offerings.] He pronounced the blessing before he came down from the altar, which stood upon raised ground, (though there were no steps to it, Exod. xx. 26.) that all the people might the better see what was done, while he offered all these sacrifices for them, and lifted up his hands to implore God's blessing upon them.

Ver. 23. And Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle of the congregation.] The sacrifice being ended, it is likely Moses went with Aaron into the sanctuary, to instruct him how to sprinkle the blood, and to burn incense, and order the shew-bread, and such-like things as were to be done only in the holy place.

And came out, and blessed the people.] I suppose that all the sacrifices beforementioned might be offered after the morning sacrifice, (ver. 17.) which took up a great deal of time, before they were all completed. After which Moses and Aaron went into the sanctuary, and stayed there till the time of the evening sacrifice; and then came out and dismissed the people with a new blessing, when the evening sacrifice was finished.

And the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people.] That glory which filled the tabernacle, (Exod. xl. 34, 35.) now appeared without: either at the door of it, or upon it, in the sight of all the people, as Moses had foretold, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 24. And there came a fire out from before the Lord.] Either out of the sanctuary, from the holy of holies: or from that glory which now appeared unto them, and sent out flashes of fire which burnt up the sacrifice. In either of these senses, it may be said to come from the face of the Lord, as the Hebrew phrase is.

And consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat.] It seems to me most natural and easy to take this burnt-offering and its fat for the evening sacrifice; which concluding the work of this day, God gave a special token of his acceptance of all the other sacrifices, by consuming this; and likewise publicly testified his approbation of all the forementioned rites of the ministry of Aaron, whose authority was hereby established in a miraculous manner. To confirm this, it may be noted, that, as the place which God chose for his worship and service, was afterward designed in the time of David after the very same manner; (1 Chron. xxi. 26.) so it was at the time of the evening sacrifice, as may be gathered from 2 Sam. xxiv. 15. where it is said the pestilence continued from morning, to the time appointed, that is, to the evening; and then David saw the angel, who commanded Gad to bid him set the altar in the threshing-floor of Araunah; where God answering by fire from heaven, it made him say, this is the house of God, and this is the altar of burnt-offering, (1 Chron. xxii. 1.) And when Solomon built the temple in that very place, it was thus consecrated by fire coming from heaven, and consuming the burnt-sacrifice, as well as by the glory of the Lord filling the house, (2 Chron. vii. 1—3.) And it is very probable, also, that this was at the time of the evening sacrifice; for the former part of the day had been spent in bringing the ark into the house of the Lord, and in Solomon's prayer; as we read in the two foregoing chapters. Certain it is, that the authority of Elijah to restore God's true religion and worship was thus justified, 1 Kings xviii. 38, 39. and it was at the time of the offering the evening sacrifice, (ver. 39.) From whence that prayer of the Psalmist, (Psal. cxli. 2.) Let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice.

All this was so notorious, that Julian himself acknowledges, that fire came down from heaven in the time of Moses, and again in the days of Elijah, τὰς θυσίας ἀναλίσκον, consuming the sacrifices; as we find his words related by St. Cyril, (lib. x. contra Julianum.) And this gave such a Divine authority to the Jewish religion, that it is no wonder to find, that the pagans endeavoured to get credit to their religion by the like reports of fire, from an invisible power, consuming their sacrifices: which perhaps was sometimes really done by the prince of the power of the air, as the apostle calls the devil. However that be, there are several instances of this in Pausanias, Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, Valerius Maximus, and Pliny. But Servius may serve instead of all; who, upon those words of Virgil, in Æneid xii.

saith, that anciently they did not kindle fires upon their altars, "sed ignem divinum precibus eliciebant," &c. but they procured by their prayers Divine fire, which inflamed their altars. And Solinus saith, (cap. 11.) that the flame sprung out of the wood by a Divine power. "Si Deus adest, si sacrum probatur, sarmenta licet viridia ignem sponte concipiunt," &c. If God be present, if the sacrifice be acceptable, the faggots, though green, kindle of themselves; and without any one to set them on fire, a flame is raised by the Deity to whom the sacrifice is offered. Thus there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed Gideon's sacrifice, (Judg. vi. 21.) They that would see more of this out of pagan writers, may consult J. Dilherrus Dissert. Special. de Cacozelia Gentil. (cap. 11.) But especially Huetius, in his Alnetanæ Questiones, (lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 21.)

But whether this fire, which now came from before the Lord, consumed Aaron's sacrifice instantly, or only set it into a flame, which consumed it leisurely in the sight of all the people, cannot certainly be determined. The Jews seem to suppose the latter; the heavenly fire being now kindled, which continued ever after by a constant supply of fuel, whereby it was kept perpetually burning, as is ordained vi. 12, 13. (See note on that place.) Where to me it seems very observable, that this law of keeping in the fire perpetually, is ordered to be put in execution at the evening sacrifice, ver. 9. of that chapter. Which is a sufficient reason to incline one to think, that the celestial fire now came, as I have supposed, at the evening sacrifice, and consumed the burnt-offering.

Which when all the people saw, they shouted.] They fled not from it, as men affrighted, but shouted for joy: or, as Abarbinel's phrase is, they lifted up their voices with singing, and prayed to God, or rather praised him. Just as they did when the fire came down at the consecration of Solomon's temple, When the people saw it they praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever, (2 Chron. vii. 3.)

And fell on their faces.] Worshipped God with humble thankfulness; who hereby testified his presence among them, and his gracious acceptance of them. For thus he had of old shewed his respect to Abel, (Gen. iv. 4.) and to Noah, (vii. 20.) and to their father Abraham: whose sacrifice was thus accepted in the evening, when the sun went down, (Gen. xv. 17.)

And there was great reason, that both priests and people should rejoice at this sight: for, as the author of the book Cosri discourses, (par. iii. sect. 53.) "If a man look only at the foregoing part of the work of this day (the killing of the sacrifices, the blood running about their hands; their slaying of them, washing the entrails, rincing the pieces of flesh, sprinkling the blood, laying the wood in order, kindling the fire), they would rather set his mind further off from God, than draw it near to him: till after all these things performed orderly, he saw the fire coming down from heaven, testifying God's gracious acceptance of the sacrifice; or felt another spirit excited in him, beyond any thing he was acquainted withal before; or had Divine dreams, or heroical motions; which he believed were the effects of what he had been doing," &c. And no doubt, all good men, in future ages, felt their minds raised, by the thoughts that the sacrifices they offered were as acceptable to God as that offered at this time; being consumed, in some sort, by the same fire, which burnt continually on this altar; and, after this day, was never extinguished till the captivity. Which seems to be the original of that expression of the people, in their prayer for their king, that God would "remember all his offerings, and accept (turn to ashes, it is in the Hebrew) his burnt-sacrifice," (Psal. xxi. 3.)

"Such acceptable sacrifices, (St. Cyril tells Julian,) we Christians still offer, but infinitely better, being spiritual and intellectual (and consequently nearer to the Divine nature), and that by fire sent from heaven, viz. the Holy Ghost (of whom this fire was but a figure), καταφωτίζων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, illustrating the church, and enabling the members of it to offer continually the sweet-smelling sacrifices of faith, and hope, and charity, and righteousness, temperance, obedience, perpetual doxologies, and all other virtues," (lib. x. contr. Jul.)

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron.] His two eldest sons, (Exod. vi. 23.)

Took either of them his censer.] Here are two of their errors expressed in these words, if Abarbinel conjecture aright (who supposes this to have happened on the last day of their consecration, when fire came down from heaven), first, that they adventured, without any order from God, to go and burn incense in the sanctuary. For though this did not belong to the office of the high-priest alone, yet, upon this solemn day, Aaron only was commanded to perform the whole service; as upon the day of expiation, (ix. 7.) And this account Bochartus gives of their offence, that "sine vocatione, thus obtulerunt," they offered incense without any call to it, (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 49. p. 557.) And secondly, both of them went about this work; whereas the incense was to be offered only by one, and not by two at a time. Procopius Gazæus adds a third error; that they attempted this out of the due season for it: which was only in the morning and evening.

And put fire thereon.] As the priests were required to offer no strange incense, (Exod. xxx. 9.) so, in all reason, they were to think, it was not to be offered with strange fire; but only with a coal from that altar, where there was a fire kindled by God himself.

And offered strange fire before the Lord.] Here are two sins more (if Abarbinel take it right), that they brought fire from another place, without the sanctuary; and did not take it from the altar: and then, that they attempted to go into the most holy place; which he thinks is signified by these words, before the Lord. The first of these is the opinion also of Aben Ezra, and other learned men among the Jews; who by strange fire understand, fire that did not go out from before the Lord, (ix. 24.) that is, was not taken from the altar of burnt-offering; where fire from heaven lately consumed their oblations. And so R. Bechai: "They imagined that the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings was only for consuming sacrifices; and therefore, they fetch some from without, for the burning incense." But as to the second thing, it doth not seem to me probable; for Aaron himself had not yet gone into the holy of holies.

Which he commanded them not.] This they did (saith Aben Ezra) from their own proper motion and opinion; without any authority from God: for whose order they should have waited, if his mind was not already sufficiently declared, as it was fully afterward, (xvi. 12.)

How two such excellent men as these (who had had the honour to be called up to God, when he appeared on Mount Sinai, and to have a sight of him, and to eat and drink in his presence, Exod. xxiv. 1. 9, 10, &c.) came to be so rash, and to fall so unadvisedly into so great an error, as this here mentioned, cannot be certainly resolved. But it seems to me highly probable, that at the feast upon the peace-offerings, they had eaten and drunk too liberally; which made them forget themselves, and fall into this gross mistake. For I can see no other reason why that command, (ver. 8.) of not drinking wine or strong drink, when the priests were to go into the sanctuary, is annexed unto this story of their death and burial; but only this, which I have now alleged; that their miscarriage arose from drinking too much wine before this office was to be performed.

Ver. 2. And there went out fire from the Lord.] As they were entering into the sanctuary, or as they stood at the golden altar, ready to offer incense, fire came out from the most holy place (where the glory of the Lord was), and struck them dead.

And devoured them.] It did not reduce their bodies to ashes, nor so much as burn their clothes, (ver. 5.) but they were killed as men sometimes are with lightning; which penetrates into the vital parts, and puts a sudden end to their life. That is meant here by devoured them; took away their breath in a moment. From which expression the Hebrew doctors conclude, that when any body was condemned to be burnt, it was not to be consumed to ashes, but only exanimated by the fire; because this is called devouring or burning, here in this place. (See Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 1.)

And they died before the Lord.] Fell down dead in the house of God. Which may seem too great a severity, till it be considered how reasonable and necessary it was to inflict a heavy punishment upon the first transgressors of a law, concerning a matter of great moment, to deter others from the like offence. Many instances of which there are in Scripture: some observed by St. Chrysostom upon Psal. vi. 2. where he gives this account, why the man who gathered a few sticks upon the sabbath-day was adjudged to be stoned, as blasphemers were; because it was a very heinous thing, ἐκ προοιμίων εὐθέως παραβῆναι τὸ πρόσταγμα, &c. as soon as a law was enacted, immediately to break it: which made it necessary it should be thus severely punished, to strike such a terror into others, that they might not dare to do the like, which was the reason, he observes, of the sudden death of Ananias and Sapphira, mentioned Acts v. Isidore of Pelusium hath made the same observation, (lib. i. epist. 181.) and goes so far back as to our first parents, who were dreadfully punished for a seemingly small offence, because they were the first transgressors. The same others have observed of the punishment of Cain, who committed the first murder; of the filthiness of Sodom; of the idolatry of the golden calf; the covetousness and sacrilege of Achan; the disobedience of Saul, the first king of Israel; the sudden death of Uzzah, who was the first that presumed to touch the ark of God.

Ver. 3. And Moses said unto Aaron.] To satisfy him in the justice and wisdom of this dreadful stroke, at which he could not but be extremely afflicted.

This is that the Lord spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.] To come nigh unto God, is, in the holy language, to perform the office of a priest, (Exod. xix. 22. Numb. xvi. 5.) who, having the honour of attending upon the service of the Divine Majesty, was bound to approach into his presence with the greatest reverence. We do not read indeed those very words, which Moses here recites, in the foregoing books; but, as many things were spoken to them which are not recorded, so the sense of these words is in the place forenamed, Exod. xix. 22. and the reason of them in Exod. xxix. 43, 44. where the tabernacle being said to be sanctified by the Divine Glory, and the priests being sanctified to minister unto him therein, (which was seven days a doing, as we read here, viii. 35.) they were plainly taught to draw nigh to God with a holy fear, and to do nothing rashly, nor without order from him. For God being peculiarly known by the name of the Holy One, i. e. who hath incomparable perfections, such as no other being hath, he justly required to be accordingly worshipped, suitable to his most surpassing greatness; by peculiar rites of his own prescribing, in a different manner from all other beings. It was, for instance, below his eminency, or rather supereminent majesty, to have common fire (such as they employed in their kitchens) used for the burning sacrifices on his altar. And in like manner all other parts of his service were, in reason, to be performed after such a fashion as might signify their sense of the peculiar excellences of the Divine Nature; who, therefore, sent fire from heaven as only fit to burn perpetually upon his altar.

And before all the people will I be glorified.] This may be thought to be but a solemn repetition of what was spoken before, as the manner is in these books to deliver the same thing twice in different words. Or the meaning is, If they who draw nigh to me will not sanctify me, I will vindicate my own honour by such punishments, as shall openly declare to all that I am the Holy One. Thus God is said to be honoured upon Pharaoh by drowning him in the Red Sea, (Exod. xiv. 4.)

And Aaron held his peace.] Silently adored the justice of the Holy One, and did not complain of his severity. For this doth not seem to be the effect merely of great grief, but of great reverence to the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 4. And Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, the sons of Uzziel, the uncle of Aaron.] It appears from Exod. vi. 18. that Uzziel, the father of Mishael and Elzaphan, (ver. 22.) was the younger brother of Amron, the father of Aaron, and consequently Aaron's uncle.

And said unto them, Come near, and carry your brethren.] All near kindred are called brethren in Scripture. And these cousin-germans of theirs are appointed to carry them out, because Aaron's other sons were now attending upon God in their ministration, upon the day of their consecration. But without this special order, these two persons could not have been admitted to come near into the very sanctuary, being not of the family of priests, though of kin to them,

From before the sanctuary.] See ver. 2.

Out of the camp.] For anciently they buried not in their cities, but in the fields adjacent to them, (Gen. xxiii. 9. 17.) and so they did in aftertimes, Matt. xxvii. 7. and Luke viii. 27. where the tombs are plainly intimated to be without the city.

Ver. 5. So they went near.] There being two accents upon the Hebrew word for draw near, the cabalists from thence observe (I know not upon what grounds), that these men did not come into the very sanctuary where the dead bodies lay, but drew them out with long poles, and those of iron, being afraid of the fire wherewith Nadab and Abihu had been killed: or rather, fearing to go into the sanctuary, or too near it. (See Hackspan's Cabala Judaica, n. 58.)

And carried them out in their coats, &c.] Their linen vestments wherein they ministered; which having touched dead bodies, were no more fit to be used in the Divine service.

As Moses had said.] As he had directed in his order which he gave them.

Ver. 6. And Moses said unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar his sons.] These two were all the sons that Aaron had now remaining; from whom came two great families of the priests; which, in the days of David, we find very numerous (though more of the house of Eleazar than of the other), when they were by him divided into twenty-four classes, and had their courses of waiting appointed them, (1 Chron. xxiv. 4, &c.)

Uncover not your heads.] The Hebrew doctors interpret it quite contrary, Let not the hair of your head grow: so long, that is, as to cover their faces; which was the custom of mourners, (2 Sam. xv. 30. xix. 4. and many other places.) And thus Onkelos, and the Arabic version set forth by Erpenius, and many of the Jewish commentators (such as R. Solomon and Aben Ezra), who give the same account of Lev. xxi. 10. where the same thing is required of the high-priest. And the time of their letting their hair grow on such occasions, they determine by the law of the Nazarites, who were not to cut their hair all the time of their vow of separation, which the Jews say was at least thirty days, (Numb. vi. 5.) Therefore the priests were not to let their hair grow so long: if they did, they were incapable of officiating. Only they make this difference between the common priests and the high-priest; that this law did not bind the priests at all times, but only in their course of ministration: but the high-priest (whose presence was always necessary in the sanctuary) might never let his hair grow; but was bound every week to have it cut even, on the eve of the sabbath. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Success. in Pontiff. cap. 6.)

But the foundation of all this is not very strong; for it relies chiefly on the use of the Hebrew word פֶּרַע in that place of Numbers vi. 5. where it signifies hair: from whence they conclude the verb here may have the same notion, and signify the growth of hair. But this is not the usual signification of it in Scripture, where it commonly imports the rejection of something; as of good counsel, (Prov. i. 25.) of reproof or instruction, (Prov. xiii. 18. xv. 32.) And being joined with the head, plainly signifies the uncovering it. (See Numb. v. 18.) And, therefore, so the LXX. understand it here; as if they were forbidden to put off their bonnets. But that they always did, as soon as they had performed their sacred office in the sanctuary: and therefore, it may be meant of making their heads bare by shaving them, or bald by pulling off the hair, as the manner was in mourning, (Isa. xv. 2. Jer. xli. 5. xlviii. 37. and many other places.) And in this, the priests among the Jews directly opposed those among the Egyptians who shaved their heads; as appears by what Minutius Felix, and Lampridius, in the life of Commodus, say, concerning the priests of Isis. And Herodotus, also, in his Euterpe, whose words are these, Οἱ ἱερεῖς τῶν Θεῶν τῇ μὲν ἄλλῃ κομέουσι, ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ δὲ ξυρεῦνται. In other places the priests of the gods nourish the hair; but in Egypt they are shaved.

Neither rend your clothes.] Which was another rite of mourning; not only among the Jews, but among all people in ancient times, especially in the eastern countries; as every one knows that hath read any of their authors. (See Job i. 20.) And it was used on many other occasions among the Jews, as well as in their funerals; particularly when any man blasphemed, (Numb. xiv. 6. 2 Kings xix. 1.) when any ill tidings came which put them into a passion, (2 Kings v. 7.) or any misfortune befel them, (Gen. xliv. 13. Judg. xi. 35.) But was thought so unseemly in a priest, especially when he ministered, that the Jews say, they whose garments were rent by accident, were as incapable of ministering, as they who rent themselves in mourning.

The reason of this precept was, (as R. Levi of Barcelona well observes, Præcept. clv.) that it being not allowed in those countries for mourners to come into the presence of their kings (as appears by the history of Esther), much less was it seemly for any that attended upon the Divine Majesty, to come into his house in such a habit.

Lest ye die.] As Nadab and Abihu did. For after such a monition as this, they had highly dishonoured God if they had appeared in his sanctuary in such an indecent manner.

And wrath come upon the people.] For want of priests to make atonement for them when they offended.

But let your brethren, the whole house of Israel, bewail the burning which the Lord hath kindled.] He doth not prohibit the rest of the people, who were not priests, to mourn for them; but rather requires it of them all: that they might be sensible of their loss, and of the sin which was the cause of it. And it is likely the people bewailed them, by rending their clothes, and baring their heads, and putting ashes upon them; or some such rites then in use among them.

Ver. 7. And ye shall not go out from the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] For it is supposed the seven days of their consecration were not yet quite ended, (viii. 35.) or they had begun some other ministration in the sanctuary; and therefore were not to stir out of the court of it till it was finished. And the Hebrews think this law did not only bind Aaron and his sons at this time, but their posterity for ever: that if they heard of the death of any of their kindred, when they were ministering in the sanctuary, they should not stir from their duty: for that would have been to shew a greater affection to a dead friend, than to the living God. This appears to be true, by the like command to this, and in the same words, laid particularly upon the high-priests, xxi. 12.

For the anointing of the Lord is upon you.] You are devoted and consecrated by a solemn unction (viii. 10, &c.) to the service of God; which must not be omitted out of respect to any person whatsoever. For in this precept (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. clvii.) the dignity and majesty of the Divine worship were consulted; which, if his ministers had deserted on such occasions, for a moment, would have been brought into contempt. For it would have been a declaration, that there was something in the world more to be regarded than God's service. And therefore the punishment of death is threatened (in the foregoing words) to those who were guilty of such an offence.

And they did according to the word of Moses.] Stayed in the tabernacle, without any of the usual tokens of mourning. Wherein they performed an eminent piece of obedience to God; whose commandment suppressed those natural affections, which are very hard to be kept in subjection.

Ver. 8. And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying.] It may be thought, that the Lord was so pleased with his obedience, that he himself now spake unto Aaron; whereas hitherto he had spoken to him by Moses.

Ver. 9. Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou nor thy sons with thee.] By wine every one knows is meant that liquor which is pressed out of grapes: and by schechar (which we translate strong drink) is meant such liquors as were made in imitation of wine, of dates or figs, and many other sorts of fruits; also that which was made of honey, which we call mead, and metheglin. There are many sorts of such liquors mentioned by Pliny, (in his Natural History, lib. xiv. cap. 16.) which he calls vina factitia.

When ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation.] To perform your ministry. At other times they might drink wine: and, if we may believe the Jews, they did not offend against this precept, if, before they went into the sanctuary, they drank no more than a fourth part of a log: which contained an egg-shell and a half. If they exceeded this measure, then their ministry, they say, was profaned, and they were liable to death by the hand of Heaven. See R. Levi of Barcelona, Præcept. clviii. who hath many niceties about this matter; as hath also Maimonides, mentioned by the learned Dr. Outram, in his book de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 6. n. 4.

Lest ye die.] As their brethren did: see upon ver. 1. where I observed it to be very probable, that they were burnt with fire from the Lord upon this account. They that think it worth their while, may see after what manner the cabalists make out this, and what reflections they make upon it, in Theod. Hackspan's Cabala Judaica, n. 144, 145.

It shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations.] And such a law there was in some heathen countries, that no magistrate, all the year he was in office, nor any judge, while he was in action and employment, should οἴνου γεύεσθαι τὸ παράπαν, so much as taste a drop of wine. So Plato tells us; with which Eusebius compares this law of Moses, (lib. xii. Præp. Evang. cap. 25.) And Chæremon, the Stoic, describing (in Porphyry's book, περὶ Ἀποχῆς, lib. iv.) the diet of the Egyptian priests, tells us, that οἴνου οἱ μὲν οὐδ' ὅλως· οἱ δὲ, ὀλίγιστα ἐγεύοντο, some of them drunk no wine at all, and others very little.

Ver. 10. That ye may put a difference between holy and unholy, between clean and unclean.] Here is the ground and reason of this precept; that they might have their wits about them (as we speak), and preserve their minds from being clouded (as Nadab's and Abihu's were, who put no difference between holy fire and common), and so be able both to put a difference (as the first words may be translated) between holy and unholy, &c. and also to teach the people all the statutes, which God had delivered to them; as it follows in the next verse.

And here it must be observed, that as some days and places were more holy than others, so were some parts of the sacrifices also; which they might not eat themselves, but were reserved for the altar. Some beasts also were clean, and others so unclean, that they might neither be offered in sacrifice, nor eaten at their common tables, (xi. 47.) Some men and women were so unclean, that they were not to be admitted into their ordinary conversation; much less into the sanctuary, (chap. xii. xiii.) Of all which the priests were the judges, and therefore had need to be perfectly sober, that they might make an accurate difference between one thing and another. And for such a like reason it was, the Egyptian priests were so abstemious in drinking wine, because they looked upon it as ἐμπόδιον εἰς εὕρεσιν, an impediment to the finding out of the truth. So Chæremon speaks in the forementioned book.

Ver. 11. And that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes, &c.] Which concern the rites and ceremonies of God's worship.

Ver. 12. And Moses spake unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons that were left.] This was still spoken on the same day, a little after what he had said to them ver. 6, 7.

Take the meat-offering that remaineth of the offerings of the Lord made by fire, &c.] He seems to have been afraid, that Aaron's grief for the loss of his sons might have so disturbed his mind, as to have made him negligent in some part of his duty; or that Eleazar and Ithamar, through mistake or forgetfulness, might have offended against some of the laws lately delivered about sacrifices; which therefore he here repeats, that they might be exactly observed. And in the first place, that they should eat what remained of the meat-offering, as was commanded vi. 16. Where it is required also, as it is here, to be eaten without leaven, and beside the altar, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation, as it is there expressed.

For it is most holy.] See there, vi. 17.

Ver. 13. And ye shall eat it in the holy place.] This he repeats, because they might possibly have forgotten it, or not sufficiently attended to the difference between things most holy and things only holy. The former of which the priests alone might eat, and that only in the holy place: the other all their family might eat (as he saith in the next verse) in any place that was clean.

Because it is thy due, and thy sons' due, &c.] Nobody might eat but holy persons; for so God directed, chap. ii. 3. vi. 16—18. vii. 9, 10.

Ver. 14. The wave-breast and the heave-shoulder shall ye eat in a clean place.] They were not bound to eat these in the court of the tabernacle, (as in the former case, ver. 13.) but in any part of the camp that was not defiled.

Thou, and thy sons, and thy daughters with thee.] These being those which the Jews call lighter holy things, might be eaten by the whole family, as was before observed.

For they be thy due, and thy sons' due, which are given you out of the sacrifices of peace-offerings of the children of Israel.] They were bestowed upon them by an express grant, vii. 34. where, though only his sons be mentioned, as they are here, yet it is plain all of their family, who were clean, might eat of these things. (See upon vii. 19.)

Ver. 15. The heave-shoulder and the wave-breast shall they bring, with the offerings made by fire of the fat, to wave it for a wave-offering before the Lord.] This also he inculcates again, which had been said before, (vii. 29, 30.) that they must take care first to wave these things before the Lord, and to burn the fat upon the altar: for till this was done, they had no right to eat these things.

And it shall be thine, and thy sons' with thee.] When they had been presented to the Lord of the whole earth, and he had received his part, these became theirs, by an express grant from him, (vii. 32—34.)

By a statute for ever.] As long as such kind of sacrifices should last.

Ver. 16. And Moses diligently sought the goat of the sin-offering.] Which had been offered for the people, (ix. 15.)

And behold, it was burnt.] This justified Moses's suspicion and fear, that some mistake might have been committed in other matters; because he found, upon a diligent inquisition, that they had burnt upon the altar those parts of the sin-offering which they ought to have eaten themselves, (vi. 26. 29.) In which it was the easier for them to mistake, without diligent observation of Moses's directions; because the sin-offering, which had been offered for Aaron himself, was just before wholly burnt without the camp, (ix. 11.) and so were all the sin-offerings for the high-priest, and for the whole congregation, ordered to be, (iv. 12. 21.) that is, if their blood was carried into the holy place, then nothing of them might be eaten, (vi. 30.) But otherwise, their flesh was to be eaten in the court of the tabernacle, as is expressly commanded, (vi. 26.) This distinction they either did not well observe, when it was delivered; or, being oppressed with sorrow, for the loss of Nadab and Abihu, they did not think it fit to feast at this time upon the flesh of this offering. For so Aaron excuses this fact, (ver. 19.)

And he was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar.] He said nothing to Aaron, either because he was loath to add to his grief, or because it was the business of his sons to look after this sacrifice, and to see that the flesh of it was disposed of according to God's orders.

The sons of Aaron which were left alive.] Who, by the punishment upon their brethren, should have learned greater caution in their ministry.

Ver. 17. Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin-offering in the holy place?] That is, obeyed the commandment which I gave you? (vi. 26.)

Seeing it is most holy.] See vi. 25.

And God hath given it you.] See vi. 29.

To bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the Lord.] God bestowed upon the priests this reward of their service, that they might be the more willing to take upon them the people's sins, and to make an expiation carefully for them. And indeed the very eating of the people's sin-offering, argued the sins of the people were in some sort laid upon the priests; to be taken away by them. Which being done, they had reason to rejoice also in a feast upon this sacrifice; which God had been pleased to accept, for the taking away of the sins of the people. From whence the sacrifice of Christ may be explained, who is said to bear our iniquity (as the priest is said here to do), all our sins being laid on him; who took upon him to make an expiation for them, by the sacrifice of himself. For the priest here by eating of the sin-offering, receiving the guilt upon himself, may well be thought to prefigure one, who should be both priest and sacrifice for sin: which was accomplished in Christ.

Ver. 18. Behold.] Observe what I say to you.

The blood of it was not brought in, within the holy place.] It was none of those sacrifices which I commanded you to burn entirely; but required you to eat of, (vi. 26. 30.)

Ye should indeed have eaten it in the holy place, as I commanded.] For as there was a peremptory law forbidding the priests to eat the flesh of any sacrifice, whose blood was brought into the holy place, to make atonement with it: so there was as peremptory a law, that they should eat the flesh of those sacrifices for sin, whose blood was not brought in thither.

Ver. 19. And Aaron said unto Moses.] Though Moses questioned only Eleazar and Ithamar, yet Aaron makes the answer: they not being able, perhaps, to give an account of what they had done, though sensible of their mistake.

Behold, this day have they offered their sin-offering, and their burnt-offering before the Lord.] His apology for them seems to be this, that they had not wholly violated God's command; but performed the substance of it, though they had failed in one circumstance. For they had not only offered the sin-offering for the people (for that is meant by their sin-offering), but also their burnt-offering, (ix. 15, 16.) and that before the Lord, in the place where he ordered them to be offered. In all this Aaron was the principal minister, but they assisted him: for it is expressly said, they presented unto him the blood of the peace-offerings (which at the same time were also offered), and they put the fat upon the breasts, when he burnt the fat upon the altar, (ix. 18. 20.)

And such things have befallen me.] After this was done, followed the death of Nadab and Abihu, who went in to burn incense: which struck him into such a consternation, and made him so exceeding sad, that he was not fit to feast with Eleazar and Ithamar upon the sacrifice: and so suffered them to burn it.

And if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of the Lord?] Would God have been pleased with me, if in such sadness and sorrow I had eaten of the sacrifice? This is the reason whereby he justifies the omission of which his sons were accused, in not eating the sin-offering in the holy place. The blame of which he takes upon himself; for to have eaten it with a sad countenance and a heavy heart, he thought would have been to pollute it. And therefore he chose to forbear it, and to give it wholly to God, by burning the flesh of it, as he had done the fat: which he hoped would be more acceptable than to eat it in grief. And to eat it without grief and sorrow was impossible: for though they had not been so dutiful to him as they ought to have been, yet he could not extinguish the affection of a father towards them, nor suddenly cease to mourn inwardly for their untimely death.

From this place Maimonides gathers, there was but one day of mourning due to the dead, viz. the first: the rest were added by the constitution of the elders.

Ver. 20. And when Moses heard that he was content.] He was either satisfied with his reason, and thought he had done well, (for nature seems to have directed what was afterwards enjoined, that they should rejoice in their feasts, Deut. xii. 7, &c. and not eat holy things in their mourning, xxvi. 14.) or he would not further charge him with a fault, for which there was so far an excuse. For where there is no wilful contempt, but rather a respect intended in any action, all good men are inclined to make a favourable construction of it, and grant it an indulgence, though there be some error in it.

CHAP. XI.

MOSES having mentioned, in his preceding discourse about sacrifices, several sorts of uncleanness, (v. 2, 3.) and in the foregoing chapter (x. 10.) commanded the priests to keep themselves sober, that they might at all times be able to distinguish between clean and unclean, takes an occasion from thence to give an account of that matter. For otherwise that which we read chap. xvi. would here have most naturally followed (as appears from the eleventh verse of it), being about the principal sacrifice, whereby all manner of uncleanness was to be expiated; which he now inserts in the midst of those things that belong to that head. For, first, he treats in this chapter of unclean meats; and in the twelfth to fifteenth, of unclean persons, garments, and habitations. And then (after he hath directed how to make the great atonement for the whole nation, and some other things) he returns in the latter end of chap. xvii. to speak of some forbidden food; and chap. xviii. of unclean marriages: and after a repetition of several laws, (chap. xix.) of some greater uncleannesses; and chap. xxi. of priests that were unclean: and lastly, of sacrifices not fit to be offered, (chap. xxii.)

Ver. 1. And the Lord spake unto Moses, and to Aaron, saying unto them.] The consecration of Aaron being now completely finished, God spake to him, as well as unto Moses; he being also highly concerned to teach the people the difference that is here made between several sorts of meats, (x. 11.) which Moses assures them was enacted by Divine authority.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying.] They were all to take special notice of what follows, because, by the diet here prescribed, they were discriminated from all other people in the world.

These are the beasts that ye shall eat, among all the beasts that are on the earth.] God having bestowed upon mankind, after the flood, every living thing to be their food, (Gen. ix. 3.) it hath raised a question among learned men, why God should limit and restrain his own people from the benefit of this general grant. And some have thought this so unaccountable, that they have said it is in vain to inquire into the reason of the difference that is made here of meats: concerning which P. Cunæus declares (as Plutarch doth of the laws of Solon and Lycurgus), that no doubt they were enacted with wise counsel; but the reason of the authors cannot be known, (lib. ii. Republ. Heb. cap. 24.) But others think the reason is plain enough; and the Jews are of opinion, that the creatures here called unclean, were forbidden to be eaten, because they were unwholesome food. So Maimonides discourses at large in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 48. where he saith, there can be no doubt that every thing here prohibited yields a bad nourishment, except it be swine's flesh and fat: and yet he endeavours to shew, that there is no reason to think otherwise of those two. R. Levi of Barcelona is of the same mind, but pretends not to be able to demonstrate it, as Maimonides doth. For the sum of a long and pious discourse, which he hath upon this subject (Præcept. lxxix. where he treats of that flesh which was torn by wild beasts) amounts to this: "that the body being the seat of the soul, where it doth its business, God would have it fitted to the desires and employments of the soul. And therefore the law (saith he) removes from us all those things which may hinder the soul in its operations. For which reason such and such meats are forbidden, as breed ill blood: among which, if there be some whose hurtfulness is neither visible to us, nor to physicians, do not wonder at it; for the faithful Physician who forbids them, is wiser than any of us."

This opinion I cannot think to be wholly groundless: for though there be some creatures here prohibited, which seem to us of as good nourishment as those which are allowed; yet, considering that climate wherein the Jews lived, and the temper of their blood, which was very hot, and apt to be extremely corrupted (as appears by the unusual leprosy to which they were obnoxious, more than other nations), it is reasonable to conclude, that God had some respect to this, in the ordering of their diet. (See J. Wagenseil Confut. Carminis R. Lipmanni, p. 556.) Yet I cannot think this to have been the chief reason of this law, (though it be very agreeable to the peculiar care God had of this people, that he should not only give them civil and sacred laws, but direct them in the smallest matters, as he did in their apparel, building, &c.) but the main drift and scope of it was, that the Israelites might be separated from all other nations in the world by a diet peculiar to themselves: which kept them from such a familiar conversation, as otherwise they might have had with the gentiles; and consequently from learning their idolatrous customs. And I do not see why I should not add, most of the creatures, which are reckoned unclean, were such as were in high esteem and sacred among the heathen. As a swine was to Venus, the owl to Minerva, the hawk to Apollo, the eagle to Jupiter, and even the dog to Hecate, &c. Whence Origen justly falls into a high admiration of Moses's wisdom; who so perfectly understood all animals, and what relation they had to demons, that he pronounced all those to be unclean, τὰ νομιζόμενα παρ' Αἰγυπτίοις καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων μαντικὰ, &c. which were esteemed by the Egyptians, and other nations, to be the instruments of divination; and those to be clean, which were not so, (lib. iv. contra Celsum, p. 225.) And if in Moses's time such creatures were not sacred to demons, it is a greater wonder that he should mark those out for impure, which proved to be so sacred in after-ages: as a great number of birds mentioned by Porphyry (lib. iii. περὶ Ἀποχῆς), who saith the gods used them as Κήρυκες, to declare their mind to men:

and several other creatures, mentioned by other authors, as peculiarly appropriated to other deities.

Many have discoursed largely of the moral reasons of these precepts; particularly a very learned man now living, Joh. Wagenseil, in his annotations on that title in the Misna called Sota, (fol. 1171, &c.)

Ver. 3. Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is cloven-footed.] There are some creatures which Porphyry (in the book forementioned, lib. iv.) calls μώνυχα, whose hoofs are solid, and not at all divided; such as horses, asses, and mules: others that are πολυσχιδῆ, divided into several parts, like toes; as lions, wolves, and dogs: but a third sort that are only δίχηλα, (as Aristotle calls them), divided into two parts; as oxen, deer, sheep, goats, &c. And these are of two kinds; for some divide the hoof in two parts, but it is not cloven quite through; as the camel, whose hoof is parted above, but joined by a thick skin below, and therefore reckoned among the unclean beasts. Others both divided and cloven, which are those allowed by this law to be clean creatures.

And cheweth the cud among the beasts, &c.] As all those beasts do, which are not ἀμφόδοντα (as Aristotle calls them, lib. x. cap. 50.) that is, have not a set of teeth both above and below: such are oxen, sheep, and goats, which want upper teeth; and therefore bring their meat up again into their mouths, after it hath been some time in the stomach; that it may, by a new chewing of it, be better prepared for digestion. So the author of Porta Cœli, who explains this very exactly, when he saith, "For want of upper teeth they cannot chew their food perfectly at one time; nor can the stomach make a perfect digestion till it be ground a second time. And therefore such creatures are provided with a double stomach; an upper, into which the meat goes down after the first chewing; and another, into which it is sent, after it hath been grinded a second time."

That shall ye eat.] The Hebrews truly observe, (particularly R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. clix.) that all kinds of animals, which had not every one of these marks (of parting the hoof, and being cloven-footed, and chewing the cud) were unlawful to be eaten.

Ver. 4. Nevertheless, these shall ye not eat, of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the hoof.] This is added as an explication of the foregoing rule, to shew, that if any of the forementioned marks were wanting, such creatures must not be eaten.

As the camel, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof, &c.] The latter part of this character is not to be understood, as if the camel did not divide the hoof at all; but not quite through, so as to be cleft, as well as divided. For, though its hoof be divided above, it coheres below, as R. Solomon observes. And so doth Aristotle, (lib. ii. cap. 1.) and Pliny, (lib. ii. cap. 45.) This being so very plainly expressed in this law, it is something strange that Heliogabalus should order the flesh of camels and ostriches to be served up to his table, "Dicens, præceptum Judæis ut ederent:" saying, the Jews were commanded to eat them: as Lampridius reports his words, (cap. 28.) Salmasius, indeed, upon that place, saith, he found these two words, struthiones and camelos, joined together, to make one word in a MS. of the Palatine library, which reads struthiocamelos exhibuit in cœnis. Which seems to some to mend the matter; but then they are forced to interpret præceptum by concessum; as if he had said, God did not forbid this meat to the Jews: which is altogether uncertain. It is better to say, that though many of the pagans did read the law of Moses, yet they did it carelessly, without sufficient attention to it.

Ver. 5. And the coney.] Much might be said to justify our translation of the word saphan, by the English coney, if it could be proved that they chew the cud: which they do not, having upper teeth. Therefore, Bochart, by many arguments, proves this word, saphan, to signify a mountain mouse; which, as Solomon saith, (Prov. xxx. 26.) make their holes in rocks: which rabbits do not; but this creature doth, as he proves out of the Arabian writers; who call it aliarbuo, and say it chews the cud. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 33.)

Because he cheweth the cud, &c.] Or rather, though he cheweth the cud, yet, wanting the other mark, they were to look upon it as unclean.

Ver. 6. And the hare, because he cheweth (or though he cheweth) the cud, but divideth not the hoof, he is unclean unto you.] The same author shews in the same book, (cap. 37.) that the Hebrew word arnebeth is rightly translated a hare. For though no author, but Moses, saith it chews the cud, yet Aristotle saith something like it, lib. iii. cap. 22. where he observes, it hath a runnet in the stomach. And Tho. Bartholinus, in his Anatom. Hist. Cent. 2. Histor. lxxxvi. tells us, that in his dissection of a hare, though he found but one stomach, which made him wonder, at first, that Moses should reckon it among the creatures that ruminate, yet he found, that what was wanting in the simple stomach was supplied by the largeness of the intestinum cæcum, which gut is of a great bigness, consisting of two parts. In one of which he found liquid and white excrements (like to chyle), as if it were another stomach: the other part towards the ileon, being full of black excrements.

Ver. 7. And the swine, though he divide the hoof, and be cloven-footed, yet he cheweth not the cud: he is unclean to you.] Though the swine hath the first part of the mark of a clean creature completely, being cloven-footed, as well as having the hoof divided, yet not chewing the cud, it is forbidden to be eaten. And this, no doubt, was the sole foundation of the Jews abstaining from this meat. Whose filthy feeding and wallowing in the mire, Maimonides fancies, was the only cause why it was prohibited, (More Novoch. par. iii. cap. 48.) To which others add, its feeding upon flesh, as Vossius observes, lib. iii. de Orig. et Progressu Idol. cap. 42. where he gives other reasons also for it. One of which, viz. that it was apt to breed the leprosy, to which they were very subject in those countries, is ingeniously treated of by Petrus Cunæus in his Republ. Hebræor. (lib. ii. cap. ult.) and more lately by another very learned person, J. Wagenseil, Carminis R. Lipmanni Confutatio, p. 556. To which Clemens Alexandrinus adds several other reasons, (lib. vii. Strom. p. 718.) and there are many more in Lactantius relating to mortality, (lib. iv. Divin. Instit. cap. 17.) But whatsoever grounds there might be of this prohibition, that alone could not be the reason why the whole nation of the Jews abhorred this more than any other unclean creature, which was equally forbidden with this. Insomuch that they would not, when they spoke of it, mention its proper name; but called it another (or a strange) thing. Which arose sure from some other cause; that, in process of time, made this the most abominable of all other creatures. And that was, I take it, because the gentiles used it in their sacrifices and mysteries of religion; and because nothing was accounted a more delicious food among many great nations: which (if a vehement abhorrence had not been infused into the Jews of this creature) might have invited them to their tables, and bred such familiarity with them, as might have concluded in idolatry. Pliny observes, (lib. viii. cap. 51.) that no creature affords greater plenty of delicious dishes at their tables than this, "Neque alio ex animali numerosior materia ganeæ," &c. Insomuch that old Homer, relating how Eumæus entertained Ulysses, (Odyss. xiv.) saith only, that he killed a great hog of five years old, and that only for five guests. They that would see more of this, may look into Petrus Castellanus, lib. ii. de Esu Carnium, cap. 1, 2, &c. where he shews also, out of Varro, (lib. ii. de Re Rustica, cap. 4.) that the gentiles knew of no ancienter sacrifices than this, after they began to offer animals upon their altars. For they thought that would be most acceptable to their gods which best pleased themselves: insomuch that a swine, which the later Greeks called ὗς, was anciently called θῦς, ab illo verbo quod dicitur θύειν, from that word which signifies to sacrifice. For the first sacrifices were of this creature, as appears by the mysteries of Ceres, in which a sow was offered; and at their marriages the ancient kings and great men of Etruria offered the like sacrifice; and so did the Latins and Greeks in Italy. The Hierapolitans, indeed, looked upon swine as unclean, and would neither eat them, nor offer them to their gods; nor would they of Pessinuntium, in Galatia: "quod prorsus Mosaicum est," which they learnt, in all likelihood, from Moses, as Huetius thinks, (Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 11. n. 1.) But in many other nations this food was highly valued: and Athenæus, I observe, gives the very same reason of its name that Varro doth, (lib. ix. Deipnos.) Οἱ δὲ σὺν εἰρῆσθαι οἱονεὶ θῦν, τὸν εἰς θυσίαν εὐτεθοῦντα. From whence it is, that Aristophanes calls them Μυστικὰς Χοίρους, mystical swine, in his Acharnan. because, as the scholiast there explains it, διὰ τὸ ἐν τοῖς Μυστηρίοις Δήμητρος θύεσθαι, they were offered in the mysteries of Ceres. And Julian himself, in his oration upon the Mother of the Gods, (Orat. v.) confesses Φίλον εἶναι πεπίστευται θῦμα τοῖς χθονίοις θεοῖς οὐκ ἀπεικότως, it was deservedly believed to be a grateful sacrifice to the terrestrial gods, (p. 332. Edit. Patav.)

Ver. 8. Of their flesh shall ye not eat, and their carcass shall ye not touch.] Some think the latter part of this precept signifies no more, but that they should not meddle with their carcass to prepare it for meat, (as the word touch seems to be used, Gen. iii. 3.) though they did not eat it. But others take it more largely, that they should not so much as open them, to take out the fat, and apply it to any use. In this the Jews are so scrupulous, that they say they may not touch them (though alive) with one of their fingers, for fear of the leprosy. It being a proverbial saying among them, which we read in the treatise Kidduschin, that "ten measures of leprosy descending into the world, swine took to themselves nine of them, and the rest of the world one."

If we may believe Herodotus, (lib. ii. cap. 47.) the Egyptians looked upon swine as so unclean, that if any one touched one of them by chance, as he passed by, he was bound to wash himself, with his garments, in the river. Certain it is, that not only they, but the Arabians, and some other neighbouring nations, did abstain from swine's flesh, as Bochartus and others have observed, (see his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 57. p. 702. and Petr. Castellanus, lib. ii. de Esu Carnium, cap. 4.) which they learned, I doubt not, at first from the Jews; and afterward found other reasons for it. This abhorrency of swine is propagated into far distant countries among the Mahometans; particularly into Mindanao, one of the Philippine islands; where, if any one have but touched one of these creatures, he is not permitted to come into any body's house for many days after. So Dampier relates in a late Voyage round the World, (chap. 12. p. 343.) where he says, "the sultan's brother having a pair of shoes made him by one of their ship's crew (which they seldom wear there), fell into a great passion, when he was told the thread wherewith the shoes were sewed, was pointed with hog's bristles; and would not wear them."

Ver. 9. These shall ye eat of all that are in the waters.] Though some of the heathens abstained perpetually from all fish, and others only for some time, ἐν ταῖς ἁγιστείαις, when they were under strict obligations of purity, (as Julian tells us in the forementioned oration v.) yet God left his people at greater liberty, forbidding to them only some kinds of fish; by abstinence from which they were sufficiently distinguished from those nations which did eat all indifferently, and accounted fish the greatest delicacy.

Whatsoever hath fins and scales.] If both these marks did not concur in a fish, they were not to eat it. But their doctors say, (as we learn from R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cl.) that if but one scale was found on a fish, it was accounted lawful; and they needed not to observe whether it had fins or no: for all that have scales, they say, have fins; though, on the contrary, all that have fins have not scales. They observe also, secondly, that it was lawful to eat young fish before their scales appeared, if they were of that kind which have scales when they are grown. And, thirdly, all fishes that have scales when they are in the sea, but cast them when they are taken out, are lawful.

In the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers.] By waters in this place, as distinguished from seas and rivers, are meant lakes and ponds. And so Moses expresses all the places where fish is found.

Ver. 10. And all that have not fins, nor scales, &c. shall be an abomination to you.] There was an ancient law among the Romans, made by Numa, that no fish which wanted scales should be used in those feasts which they made in honour of their gods. So Pliny tells us, lib. xxxii. Nat. Hist. cap. 2. where he quotes an ancient writer for it.

Ver. 11. They shall be even an abomination unto you.] The next words explain what he means by abomination: that they should not eat their flesh, nor touch their carcasses.

Ver. 12. Whatsoever hath no fins nor scales in the waters, that shall be an abomination unto you.] He repeats it again, that they might take notice, that this alone was a sufficient mark of difference: and, therefore, he doth not give any instance of particular fishes that might be eaten or not eaten; as he did of beasts. He uses also the word abomination concerning prohibited fishes (which he doth not of such beasts, whom he only calls unclean), because there was greater danger of their transgressing in this matter; fishes being a more usual food among the eastern people than flesh. Insomuch, that among the later Greeks, the word ὄψον, which signifies all manner of victuals, came to be used peculiarly for fish. See Bochartus, in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. i. cap. 6. where he observes, also, the greatest luxury was committed in this sort of food; which any one may see that reads Athenæus.

Ver. 13. And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls; they shall not be eaten.] Here are no notes given, as in the two foregoing sorts of creatures, to distinguish clean birds from unclean: and therefore the Hebrew doctors say, all birds are lawful to be eaten, but these twenty-four mentioned in this chapter, which they were to have in abhorrence. Yet they adventure to give four marks of a clean bird; the principal of which are, if it do not fasten its talons; i. e. be not rapacious; and have one claw longer than the rest. (See R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. clxi.)

They shall be an abomination.] This is repeated to make them more careful in this matter.

The eagle.] He names in the first place, the king of birds, as Pindar calls the eagle, whose flesh is very hard, and whose nature is very rapacious: and therefore, both upon a natural and moral account, some authors fancy it was forbidden to be eaten. (See Vossius, lib. iii. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 77.) But I think Origen hath given a better account of it, in the place I named above; that Moses by his admirable wisdom understood what creatures were looked upon as prophetical by the Egyptians and other nations; and these he prohibited to the Jews: among which he expressly names the eagle and the hawk, (lib. iv. contra Celsum, p. 225.) For Diodorus Siculus saith, (lib. i.) that τὸν δ' ἀετὸν Θηβαῖοι τιμῶσι, the people of Thebes worship the eagle, looking upon it as a royal bird, and worthy of Jupiter. And Julian in his oration upon the Mother of the Gods (Orat. v.) saith, that in the time of their strictest purifications, they were permitted πτηνοῖς χρῆσθαι (so Spanhemius truly reads in the late edition of Julian's works), to eat birds, πλὴν ὀλίγων, οὓς ἱεροὺς εἶναι πάντη συμβέβηκε, except a few which had been commonly held sacred. Which is a plain acknowledgment of the sacredness of some birds among the gentiles.

——— οἰωνῶν Βασιλῆα,

The ossifrage.] All authors in a manner agree, that the Hebrew word peres signifies a kind of eagle; but what kind is not so certain. Bochartus thinks it is rightly translated by Junius, as it is by us, the ossifrage; for the Hebrew word paras, in Micah iii. 3. is used for breaking of bones. (See Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 5.)

The osprey.] This is also of the same species; and signifies that sort which the Greeks call halietus, the sea-eagle. But Bochartus in the same book, cap. 6. thinks the Hebrew word oznija, rather signifies that which they call malaniætus, the black eagle. Which though it be the least, yet is the strongest of all other, and therefore called valeria by the Romans: and was so noted for many other qualities, besides its great strength, that it makes it probable Moses did not here omit it.

Ver. 14. And the vulture, and the kite after his kind.] No wonder interpreters differ in their translation of the two Hebrew words, daa and aja; the former of which we translate a vulture, the latter a kite (which others translate quite contrary, taking daa, or raa, as it is called in Deuteronomy, for a kite), because there is no way to find the signification of them, unless it be by the roots, from whence they may be thought to be derived. Which makes Bochart think the first ought to be translated a kite, called daa, from its very swift flight. Most of the ancient and later interpreters also are of his mind. As for the second word in this verse, aja, some take it for a vulture: but Bochart, from several observations, judges it to be a kind of hawk or falcon. (See the same book, cap. 8.) After this word there follows in Deuteronomy xvi. 13. the name of a bird which is here omitted, called daja, which he takes for the black vulture; as the reader may find in the next chapter, (cap. 9.)

After his kind.] Though there be some little difference in shape, yet these birds all belong to one species. (See ver. 22.)

Ver. 15. Every raven after his kind.] Nobody doubts that the Hebrew word oreb (which signifies blackness), is rightly translated a raven; of which the Arabian writers mention four kinds. And some think under this name is comprehended, not only crows, and daws, and choughs; but starlings and pies also. (See Bochartus, cap. 10. p. 202.)

Ver. 16. And the owl.] The Hebrew word bath-jaana, it appears by many places in the prophets, signifies a bird which inhabits the wildernesses and desolate places. (See Isa. xiii. 21. xxxiv. 13. Jer. l. 39, &c.) By which the ancient interpreters of Scripture almost unanimously understand the ostrich; though a very learned man of our own nation (Nic. Fuller, in his Miscellanies, lib. vi. cap. 7.) endeavours by a probable argument to support our translation. But it hath been the constant persuasion of the Jews, that God did not permit them to eat the flesh of an ostrich, which is no where forbidden, if not in this word. And therefore Bochartus maintains against our Fuller, and labours to prove that bath-jaana signifies the female ostrich, par. ii. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 14, where he shews the word bath (i. e. daughter) is prefixed to the name of many birds, without any respect to their age, and doth not signify their young ones; but only the females.

And the night-hawk.] In the next chapter to that now named, the same Bochart proves, that the Hebrew word thacmus (which we here translate the night-hawk), signifies male ostrich. For there is no general name for this bird in the Hebrew language, to comprehend both sexes (as there is for an eagle and raven), and therefore Moses mentions both male and female distinctly, that none might think, by forbidding one of them only, he allowed the other.

And the cuckoo.] The LXX. St. Jerome, and some later interpreters, translate the Hebrew word sachaph by the Greek word Δάρος, a sea-gull. Which the same great man, beforementioned, thinks most probable, (cap. 18.)

And the hawk after his kind.] There is the greatest consent in the translation of the Hebrew word netz, which all agree signifies a hawk; from its strength and swiftness in flight, which made it sacred to Apollo. For Eustathius observes upon Iliad. x. that ὀξυπετὴς ὁ ἱέραξ, καὶ Ἥλιος ὀξυκίνητος, a hawk flies, as the sun moves, very swiftly. And every one knows there are very various kinds of these birds. Callimachus mentions six, Aristotle ten, and Pliny sixteen sorts. (See Bochart in the same book, cap. 19.)

Ver. 17. And the little owl.] Interpreters generally agree that chos signifies a kind of owl, following the LXX. who translate it νυκτικόραξ. Yet Bochart hath collected a great many ingenious arguments, to prove that it signifies that bird which the Greeks call ὀνοκρόταλος, a bittern. (See there, cap. 20.)

And the cormorant.] Though the same learned person doth not approve of this translation, yet he acknowledges the Hebrew word salach signifies some sea-bird, which sits upon rocks, and strikes at fishes with great force, and draws them out of the waters. And so the Talmudists, in the treatise called Cholin, expound it; and the gloss upon it there says, it signifies the crow of the waters, that is, a cormorant.

And the great owl.] There are various translations of the Hebrew word jansaph, which St. Jerome takes for a stork, and others for a bustard: but Bochart acknowledges the Syriac and Chaldee translation to be the most probable, which is the same with ours.

Ver. 18. And the swan.] In this translation we follow St. Jerome: but Jonathan takes it for a kind of owl, which he calls otia. Whereby he means, no doubt, that bird which Aristotle calls ὠτός: which he saith is like an owl, having tufts of feathers about its ears, from whence it hath the name of otus, (lib. viii. cap. 12.) And so the Chaldee, the Syriac, and the Samaritan here translate the Hebrew word thinsemeth, which a great many modern interpreters follow; who take this for that which the Latins call noctua, as the former for that owl which they call bubo.

The pelican.] That the Hebrew word kaath signifies a pelican is not disputed. But that it also signifies the bird we call a heron, is not improbable; being joined with chos in Psalm cii. 6. which is a bird that makes an unpleasant noise, especially that kind of them that cries like a bittern, and is called by later writers butorius.

And the gier-eagle.] There are many various opinions about this bird, which the Hebrews call racham. But Bochart hath shewn, out of the Arabian writers, that it signifies a kind of eagle, or vulture: for sometimes they call it by one of these names, sometimes by the other. It being of a dubious kind, between an eagle and a vulture; and therefore happily by us translated a gier-eagle, that is, a vulture-eagle, which Aristotle calls γυπαίετος. See Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 25—27. where Bochart shews it is such a harmless and good-natured bird, that thence it had the name of racham, and in Arabic of rachama: and was made the hieroglyphic of mercy and tenderness among the Egyptians, if Horus Apollo may be believed.

Ver. 19. And the stork.] There are vastly different interpretations of the word chasida; which imports kindness no less than the foregoing racham. But there is no reason to depart from the opinion of the later Hebrews, who take it, as we do, to signify a stork. The piety (as the Latins call it) of which bird is celebrated by all authors, and is the very import of the Hebrew word chasida. But it feeds upon serpents, and therefore, as Bochart imagines, was prohibited to be eaten by the Jews: though upon this account it was had in honour by the people of Thessaly, and by the Egyptians, as he observed in the forementioned book, cap. 29.

The heron after his kind.] There are at least ten different interpretations of the Hebrew word anapha; among which ours is one. But it being derived from a word which signifies anger, Bochartus rather takes it for a mountain-falcon, which is a fierce bird, and very prone to anger.

And the lapwing.] The Hebrew doctors take dukiphah for a mountain-cock, which had a double crest, and thence hath its name, according to R. Solomon. Or rather it may be so called from the place where it resorts; for dik in Arabic is a cock, and kapha a rock, from whence Bochart probably conjectures this bird had its name, because it lives in mountainous places. And he thinks the LXX. and the Vulgar have rightly translated it ἔποπα, and upupam: which is the sense also of four Arabian interpreters. It is a portentous kind of bird, which hath a crest from its bill to the hindermost part of its head; and one of the principal birds used in the ancient superstitions of the magicians and augurs, as he observes cap. 31.

And the bat.] As Moses begins the catalogue of birds with the noblest, which is the eagle, so he ends it with the vilest, which is a bat; being of a dubious kind, as Aristotle observes, between a bird and a mouse, lib. iv. cap. 13. where he saith it doth ἐπαμφοτερίζειν τοῖς πτηνοῖς καὶ πεζοῖς, &c. See the famous Bochartus, who shews that its name in Hebrew, which is attaleph, imports it to be a bird of darkness. Whence that phrase in the prophet Isaiah, ii. 20. "In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver and gold to the bats, and the moles;" i. e. they shall no more appear to delude men with their glittering brightness, but be utterly destroyed.

Ver. 20. All fowls that creep.] The Hebrew word oph is not well translated fowls; but signifies rather all flying things going upon all four. All flying things that go upon four feet are here forbidden; such as all kinds of flies, and wasps, and bees, as Jonathan here explains it. A fly indeed is observed to be ἑξάπους: but though it have six feet, yet it goes only upon four, as not only Lucian, but Aristotle notes; the two fore-feet serves for other uses. (See Bochart in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 9.)

Shall be an abomination to you.] It is observed by some, that the birds here forbidden are either rapacious, and live on flesh, (as eagles and hawks, &c.) or are night-birds, (as owls, &c.) or haunt lakes and marshes, (as the bittern, &c.) or are heavy, and not easily raised from the earth, as the ostrich; or live in graves or in dung, as the upupa, and some of those flying things mentioned in this verse: and upon these accounts are forbidden by Moses; who allows all those that live upon a cleaner food, as those that follow do.

Ver. 21. Yet these may ye eat, of every flying, creeping thing, &c.] In this verse he excepts such flying insects, as, besides their four feet wherewith they go, have two legs or thighs, which enable them to leap upon the earth, as well as to go. Such are all the locusts mentioned in the next verse; unto which Aristotle ascribes six feet, whereas Moses mentions but four. In which they do not disagree; for Aristotle plainly saith, they have six feet, σὺν τοῖς ἁλτικοῖς μορίοις, if we take into the number the parts with which they leap, (lib. iv. cap. 6.) Which two hinder leaping legs Moses distinguishes from the other four wherewith they go.

Ver. 22. Even these of them ye may eat.] There are nine kinds of locusts mentioned in the holy books; four of which are here permitted to be eaten.

The locust after his kind.] The Hebrew word arbeh is sometimes a common name for all locusts; but here signifies a peculiar sort, of that kind beforementioned, which leaped as well as went.

The bald locust after his kind.] The Hebrew word is solam: so called, as Aben Ezra thinks, because it climbs up roots, in which it delights.

The beetle after his kind.] This sort of locusts called chargol, seems to have its name from the vast company wherein they fly together. But it is not fitly translated a beetle; for none ever ate beetles; nor are they four-footed, with legs to leap withal. Therefore chargol is another sort of locusts, unknown to us in these countries; and so is that which follows; for a grasshopper is not a sort of meat: but there were locusts of that shape, which were large and fleshy in the eastern countries, and very good food.

The grasshopper after his kind.] The Hebrew word chagab signifies (as I said) a sort of locusts, the original of whose name Aben Ezra intimates may be found in the Arabic tongue. In which ghahageba signifies to cover as with a veil: and in such troops these locusts fly, that sometimes they seem to darken the sun itself. But by what marks these were distinguished from one another, the Hebrews differ so much, that it plainly shews they are wholly ignorant in this matter. The most that can be made of what they say, is, (as a man very learned in these things hath observed, Job. Ludolphus, in his dissertation de Locustis, par. i. cap. 23.) that chargol hath both a bunch on its back and a tail also: arbeh hath neither: solam only a bunch, and not a tail; and chagab a tail, but no bunch. Which whether it be true or false it doth not much concern us to know. But it is evident, that before our Saviour's time they knew very well and certainly what kind of locusts is here meant; and accordingly perfectly understood what they might eat, and what not. For otherwise John the Baptist would have been hard put to it, who had no other diet but this and honey. And, indeed, in desert places there was little other food but this; by which whole armies of men have been relieved, when they were in danger to perish in Lybia. For, that locusts were a common food in the eastern and southern countries is so known, that I need not produce any authors for it. Nay, among the Greeks also, as Bochartus hath shewn in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 7. and Vossius, lib. iv. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 78. But nobody hath given such satisfaction in this matter as the forenamed Ludolphus, who hath shewn at large how many nations live upon them, in his commentary upon his Ethiopic History: and more lately in his most excellent Dissertation concerning Locusts. Wherein he relates what clouds of them came into Germany not long ago (in the month of August, in the year one thousand six hundred and ninety-three); of which he seeing hogs and hens and other creatures feeding greedily, he and his family adventured to eat freely of them also, and found the taste of them like that of a crab. And a Jew of Jerusalem, who was then in their country, assured him, that the locusts in Judea were much of the same shape with these in Germany, which he demonstrated to him by a draught he had made of them.

After his kind.] Here it may be fit to note, in the conclusion of all, that this phrase, after his kind (which is so often repeated in this discourse of fowls and flying things), doth not necessarily signify that there are different kinds of every bird or flying thing to which it is applied; but only imports every one of that kind. For he doth not speak in the plural number, according to their kinds, but in the singular, after his kind; which only denotes that the whole species is prohibited. And what he saith of some fowls, is in reason to be applied to all; though, to avoid repetition, he doth not add these words [after his kind] to every one of them.

Ver. 23. But all other flying creeping things which have four feet, shall be an abomination to you.] Whether they were locusts, or any other kind of creature, who came under this character, they were to avoid them carefully.

Ver. 24. And for these ye shall be unclean: whosoever touches the carcass of them shall be unclean.] If they did either eat of them, or so much as touch the carcass of them, they might not be admitted to come into the tabernacle, nor eat of any holy thing, nor converse with their neighbours.

Until the even.] He doth not say they were to wash themselves, or their clothes (as in the following verse), which would incline one to think, that their mere separation for all the day, from communing with God and with one another, was their cleansing, without any other purification. But there are so many commands for washing themselves, and their clothes, in other defilements no greater than this, that it hath persuaded some to think such cleansing was necessary in this case also. (See xv. 5—8. 10. and several other verses in that chapter.)

Ver. 25. And whosoever beareth aught of the carcass of them.] Though it were only to carry them out of the camp or city, or remove them out of the way, that they might not infect the air.

Shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even.] His body also, in all likelihood, was to be washed, as was required in other purifications. No time is appointed for this, which, perhaps, a man might think fit to do presently; but, notwithstanding, he was to remain unclean till the setting of the sun.

Ver. 26. The carcass of every beast which divideth the hoof, and is not cloven-footed, &c.] He takes occasion from hence to inform them, that it was as unlawful to touch the carcasses of beasts before prohibited to be eaten, (ver. 3, &c.) as of the fowl and flying things now mentioned. But while they were alive it was not unlawful to touch them; for they used camels, and horses, and asses, for their necessary service; and therefore it is so expressed in other things, (ver. 31.) when they are dead.

Ver. 27. And whatsoever goeth upon his paws, &c.] Hath feet with fingers like unto a hand; for so it is in the Hebrew, Whatsoever goeth upon his hands, such as the ape, the lion, the bear, dogs and cats, &c. whose fore-feet resemble hands: these might neither be eaten, nor their carcasses touched, without incurring uncleanness till sunset.

Ver. 28. And he that beareth the carcass of them, shall wash his clothes, &c.] See ver. 25.

Ver. 29. These also shall be unclean unto you.] So that they might not so much as touch them (as it is explained ver. 31.) when they are dead, much less eat them.

Among the creeping things that creep upon the earth.] Among things that have such short feet, that some of their bellies seem to touch the ground.

The weasel.] Though most interpreters follow this translation of the Hebrew word choled; yet Bochartus hath alleged a great many probable reasons that it signifies a mole; and one is, because it is joined here with the mouse. See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 35. where he treats of this very largely.

The mouse.] All acknowledge the Hebrew word achbar signifies a mouse, and more especially a field-mouse, which doth great mischief there; and thence hath its name, as the same Bochartus shews in the foregoing chapter of that book. But all sorts of mice are here to be understood, as Jonathan observes, who thus paraphrases this word, the black mouse, the red, and the white; for they are of so many colours.

The tortoise after his kind.] The same author has taken a great deal of pains to prove that tzab doth not signify a tortoise; but, as the LXX, and St. Jerome take it, a land-crocodile, which is a large sort of lizard, a cubit long, with which Arabia abounds; out of which language he endeavours at large to prove the truth of this interpretation, (lib. iv. cap. 1.)

Ver. 30. And the ferret.] Out of the same language, and the Syriac and Samaritan paraphrase, the same judicious writer proves, that anaka signifies another sort of lizard, which the Latins called stellio, and in those countries hath a shrill cry. (See there, cap. 2.)

And the chameleon.] Most of the ancient interpreters take coach for another sort of lizard, which is the strongest (as this name imports) of all other; and in these countries was famous for its encounters with serpents and land-crocodiles; as the forenamed Bochartus shews out of the Arabian writers, (Ib. cap. 3.)

And the lizard.] All the ancient interpreters agree, that the Hebrew word letaa signifies a sort of lizard, but of what kind it is hard to determine. The aforesaid Bochart out of the Arabian writers hath shewn, it is like to that which is of a reddish colour, and lies close to the earth, infecting the meat which it touches with its venom, (Ib. cap. 4.)

The snail.] The same admirable person, with great probability, still thinks Moses speaks of a sort of lizard called here chomet, because it lies in the sand, which, in the Talmudic language, is called chometon, (Ib. cap. 5.)

And the mole.] It is apparent that the word thinsemeth, which we here translate a mole, is of a very doubtful signification: for in the eighteenth verse of this chapter it signifies a sort of fowl; as here, in all probability, another sort of lizard. And if we may guess what sort, by the original of the word, it probably signifies the chameleon, which gapes to draw in air. (See Bochart. Hieroz. par. i. lib. iv. cap. 6.) But, after all that can be said, it must be acknowledged, the significations of all these words are lost among the Jews; as Aben Ezra confesses upon this verse: "Neither these eight sorts of creeping things, nor the birds beforementioned, are known to us, but by tradition." Which is as much as to say, they are not known at all; for there is no tradition about them, as the Talmudists acknowledge; who send those who are doubtful what birds are lawful, and what not, to be informed by those that are masters of the art of fowling. Which might help to convince the Jews, were they not resolved to shut their eyes, that difference of meats is now ceased, because they know not what is forbidden, and what not, in many cases. And, consequently, the Messiah is come, to whom the gathering of the people was to be, (according to their father Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10.) so that they should be no longer separated, but all nations collected into one body, and converse freely together, without any danger of being defiled. For idolatry being abolished by him, there was no reason remaining for keeping up the discrimination between Jews and gentiles by a different diet. This some of the ancient Jews saw very well, who said, that in the days of the Messiah it should not be unlawful to eat swine's flesh, no more than it was while they were subduing the land of Canaan. This tradition is acknowledged by Abarbinel himself in his Rosch Amanah, where he disputes for the eternity of their law, and endeavours to elude this tradition of the ancient doctors by allegorical interpretations. (See J. Carpzovius in Schickkard. Mischpat hammelech, cap. 5. Theorem. xviii.)

Ver. 31. These are unclean to you among all that creep: whosoever toucheth them when they be dead, shall be unclean.] The Jews understand this with respect to the touching the dead carcasses of these creatures, and make the sense of it to be, These eight alone are unclean to you; all other reptiles, as serpents, and scorpions, &c. you may touch and not be polluted. Thus R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. clii. For nothing was unclean by Moses's law, whilst it was alive, but only a leper, and a woman in her separation. Worms, dogs, swine, &c. were unclean to be touched, only when they are dead.

Until the evening.] See ver. 4. This was a plain document, as Pellicanus there observes, that there was no impurity in the things themselves; but it was merely a prudential constitution, to make such defilements end with the day wherein they were contracted.

Ver. 32. And upon whatsoever any of them, when they are dead, doth fall, it shall be unclean.] That is, it might not be used till it was cleansed. Whence the same R. Levi saith, the Jews are wont to call these the fathers of pollutions; because by their contact they defiled other things, (vessels and raiment, &c.) as well as men, (Præcept. clii.) where he acknowledges that the reason why these creatures made things unclean, more than others, is not manifest. But he gives this pious admonition thereupon: "If by our reason we be able to discern the usefulness of some precepts, let us be very thankful for it: but if we cannot find how they are any way profitable to us, let us believe that God, in his infinite wisdom, saw the benefit we should receive by it, and therefore commanded it."

Whatsoever vessel it be wherein any work is done, it must be put into water, &c. so shall it be cleansed.] The heathens purified all things, in a manner, by washing them in water; but Moses requires only these things, which were of common use, to be so purified, in case of any defilement. And therefore Maimonides saith, "Such laws as these were made to lessen their labour and service; and if there be any thing in them that seems too troublesome and tedious, it arises from our ignorance of the rites and customs of those times, which make such precepts necessary," (par. iii. More Nev. cap. 47.)

Ver. 33. And every earthen vessel, whereinto any other of them falleth, whatsoever is in it shall be unclean.] It defiled both the vessel and that which was contained in it.

And ye shall break it.] This is prescribed vi. 28. because such vessels were of no great value.

Ver. 34. Of all meat which may be eaten, that on which such water cometh shall be unclean.] The Jews have many observations about these sorts of pollutions: but the simple meaning is, that any meat, which might otherwise be lawfully eaten, was made unclean, if any water poured out of such a vessel as is beforenamed had come upon it. For the water being defiled, it made the meat on which it came to be unclean also. This appears to be the sense by what follows.

And all drink that may be drunk in every such vessel shall be unclean.] It might not be drunk out of such a vessel, though otherwise it was not prohibited; but though liquid things were by such means made unclean, yet not dry things (such as bread), because they did not so soon receive any effluviums from a dead carcass as liquid things did. This they gather from ver. 37, 38.

Ver. 35. And every thing whereupon any part of their carcass falleth shall be unclean.] Though the whole carcass did not fall upon the things here named, yet, if any part of it did, they were not fit to be used any more, but were to be broken in pieces. (See ver. 33.) The design of all which laws is very visible, that by making the Israelites very cautious how they touched these things, or any other on which they fell, they might much more abhor to eat any unclean creature; and thereby be kept a separate people from all other nations, from whose familiar conversation they were by this means restrained, and consequently in less danger to learn their idolatrous customs.

Whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, &c.] Some translate the words simply pots: and Conr. Pellicanus hath pertinently observed, that those places where meat and drink were commonly prepared (such as oven, and pots, and wine vessels, and cellars), it became them to preserve very clean and pure: which is the reason that Moses requires them to be broken down, if any part of the carcass of unclean creatures fell upon them.

For they are unclean.] Rendered hereby unfit for use.

And shall be unclean unto you.] And therefore shall not be used by you as heretofore.

Ver. 36. Nevertheless a fountain or pit (or cistern, as some translate it), wherein there is plenty of water, shall be clean.] This exception seems to have been a merciful provision for their speedy cleansing from such pollutions as they frequently contracted; by allowing them to make use of any collection of waters (notwithstanding any such carcass had fallen into them) in their own private grounds, as well as in the public baths; such as Bethesda seems to have been, which had five porches; that they who laboured under the same sort of pollution, might betake themselves to the same porch, and go down into the water together. If this had not been permitted, it might have been impossible (considering the few rivers they had in that country) to have cleansed themselves after their defilements.

But that which toucheth their carcass shall be unclean.] The man who drew out these carcasses out of such waters was to be unclean till the even; i. e. separated, as I said before, from the tabernacle and from common conversation. Or the meaning may be, that the instrument, whatsoever it was, which he used to pull the carcass out of the fountain or cistern, should be unclean, and not used any more.

Ver. 37. If any part of their carcass fall upon any seed which is to be sown, it shall be clean.] If a mouse, for instance, was found dead among the wheat that was to be sown, it might notwithstanding be used for seed: but other wheat, which was not intended for seed, was made unclean, and might not be used till it was washed. The reason of this difference is plain, because the seed that was to be sown went through many alterations before it could become food, which took away all the pollution.

Ver. 38. But if any water be put upon the seed, and any part of their carcass fall thereon, it shall be unclean unto you.] Wet seed might be supposed to have received some tincture from the carcass, which dry did not: and not being so fit to be sown till it was dry, was in that time to be cleansed.

Ver. 39. And if any beast of which ye may eat die.] Either of itself, or torn by wild beasts, or be suffocated, so that the blood remains in the veins.

He that toucheth the carcass thereof shall be unclean until the even.] Such meat became unlawful, not only to be eaten, but to be touched.

Ver. 40. He that eateth of the carcass of it shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: he also that beareth the carcass, &c.] See ver. 24, 25. He speaks of such as ate of this meat ignorantly: for if they did it knowingly, it was a presumption to which cutting off is threatened, (Numb. xv. 30.)

Ver. 41. And every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.] Except those beforementioned, ver. 21, &c.

Shall be an abomination: it shall not be eaten.] Such as worms and serpents: which for this very reason are counted vile and filthy, because they crawl upon the earth.

Ver. 42. Whatsoever goeth upon the belly, and whatsoever goeth upon all four, and whatsoever hath more feet, &c.] This verse seems to be an explication of the foregoing. For some creeping things have such short feet, that they are not to be discerned by our naked eyes, but they appear as if they went upon their bellies. Others have feet apparently; and some only four, (as moles, &c.) others have many more than four, as caterpillars and hog-lice, which we call millepedes, and those called centipedes in the Philippine islands, (mentioned in Dampier's late Voyage round the World, p. 320.) not because they have really a thousand or a hundred feet, but because they have a great many. And the scolopendra, which the Arabians call nedall, is another of this sort, which, they say, hath precisely fourty-four feet, viz. twenty-two on each side, as Bochart notes, lib. iv. cap. 6. p. 1. And so the English call the centipedes, beforementioned, forty legs, which are on each side of the belly.

Among all the creeping things that creep upon the earth.] Here Nachmanides is something curiously critical, and bids us observe, that Moses speaking (both here and in the foregoing verse) not merely of creeping things, but of such as creep upon the earth; doth not intend such little worms as are in pease, or figs, or dates, or other fruit, which were not included in this precept, but might be eaten.

Ver. 43. And ye shall not make yourselves abominable by any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby.] They made themselves abominable if they did eat them: and they made themselves unclean if they did but touch them. R. Levi of Barcelona fancies, that in this verse Moses speaks particularly of things creeping in the waters; as in the foregoing, of things creeping on the earth. And then, as all those worms which are in fruit, were not to be deemed unlawful; so all those little animals which move in the waters might be drank, together with the water which was drawn out of wells, or pits, &c. and which were bred in water kept in vessels.

Ver. 44. For I am the Lord your God.] See Exod. iii. 15. 18.

Ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves.] By this separate sort of diet, and other forementioned observances.

And ye shall be holy; for I am holy.] The word holy signifies sometimes that which is most excellent and highly exalted above all other things. In which sense God here puts them in mind, that he being the most eminent in all perfections, incomparably above all the gods of the nations, both in his nature and in his works, (particularly in their redemption out of Egypt, ver. 45.) it was but reasonable that they should be distinguished from all other nations in their manner of living; and particularly by abstaining from all the defilements beforementioned. For he having declared them a holy people, (Exod. xix. 6.) it was but just that they should live after another fashion than the rest of the world; and look upon those things as unclean to them, which were not so to other people. (See Exod. xxii. ult.)

Neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.] Here being a different word used in the last clause from that in the foregoing (both which signify creeping things), Maimonides here distinguishes between them: and saith, that the first word scheretz signifies such creeping things as are produced by male and female; and romesch (which is the other word) such as arise out of putrefaction. Which is now discovered to be an error; there being no such animals as are produced merely by the power of the sun, out of putrefied matter; but all out of some seed or other which comes from male and female. This, therefore, is only a repetition of what was delivered before, and now confirmed by an unanswerable reason.

Ver. 45. For I am the Lord your God, that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt.] This was a benefit so fresh in their minds, that he speaks of it as if it were now a doing: and being the first and greatest benefit (the very foundation of the rest), there could not be a higher aggravation of guilt, than to be insensible of this obligation, (Exod. xxxii. 8.)

To be your God.] He having redeemed them out of slavery, made them thereby his own people; over whom he had a peculiar dominion, in the right of this redemption. (See Exod. xx. 2.)

Ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy.] They being his peculiar people, he separated them from all other nations by peculiar laws; which made them different from all other people, as he himself was from all other beings.

Ver. 46. This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, &c.] That is, this is the rule you are to observe in eating of beasts, and fowl, and fish, and things that creep on the earth. Of which four sorts of living creatures, Moses hath treated in this chapter, though not in that very order in which they are set down in this verse; but first of beasts, (ver. 2, 3, &c.) then of fishes, (ver. 9, &c.) then of birds, (ver. 13, &c.) and lastly of creeping things, (ver. 20, &c.) Some of all which kinds he forbade them to eat, for such reasons as I have already mentioned: unto which this may be added, that by not allowing them an entire liberty to eat every thing, but rather laying many restraints upon them, he intended to prevent that gluttony and luxury which is the ruin of a state; unto which nothing administers more than too great variety of meats, the desire of which is insatiable.

Ver. 47. To make a difference.] To direct you how to make a difference.

Between the unclean and the clean, and between the beast that may be eaten, and the beast that may not be eaten.] There was no uncleanness in any of these things, but what was made by this prohibition of them. But there being great reason to prohibit them, it was very necessary that both priests and people should observe, and be well skilled in the marks whereby what was lawful to be eaten, might be known from what was unlawful. Upon which account this is so oft repeated, and the same here expressed twice in different words.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The directions in this chapter are given to Moses alone; whereas those in the foregoing were delivered unto Aaron also; as those are in like manner which follow, about the leprosy, (xiii. 1.) because Aaron and his sons were peculiarly concerned in those matters, to make an exact difference between clean and unclean, (x. 10, 11. xiv. 57.) in which there was some difficulty; and therefore they are charged by God himself, to attend carefully to the laws he gave about them. But there was no such difficulty in what belonged to the purification of women; and therefore it was sufficient that they received admonitions from Moses concerning it.

Ver. 2. If a woman have conceived seed, and born a man-child.] Whether it were born alive or dead; were an abortive, or come to its full time: this made no difference, as the Hebrew doctors understand it.

She shall be unclean seven days.] For the first seven days after the birth of the child, she was neither to partake of any holy thing, nor to have common conversation with others; her husband not being permitted to eat and drink with her all that time: for they that attended her became unclean also. And so they were accounted among the heathen, as Dilherrus observes out of Plautus, in his Dissert. Special. de Cacozelia Gentilium, cap. 3. where he saith, the women that assisted at the labour solemnly washed their hands, and had a sacrifice offered for them on the fifth day after the delivery. Plautus's words indeed will not warrant all this, which I find in his Truculentus, act. 2. scen. 4. where the harlot says, she will sacrifice for the child on the fifth day, according to the custom:—

"Quin Diis sacrificare hodie pro puero volo Quinto die, quod fieri oportet."——

Where Scaliger observes, that the Greeks were wont to purify their children on the fifth day; but the Latins on the eighth, if they were daughters; and on the ninth, if they were sons; which was called Dies lustricus.

According to the days of the separation for her infirmity, shall she be unclean.] That is, her case shall be the same with that of a menstruous woman, who was in a state of the highest uncleanness, (xv. 19, 20.) For every thing she touched was unclean, and made those so who touched that thing.

Ver. 3. And on the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised.] This is here mentioned to shew, that one reason for not circumcising the child till the eighth day was, its mother's uncleanness the first seven days of her lying-in; which made the child unclean also.

Ver. 4. And she shall then continue.] From the seven days' end.

In the blood of her purification.] In the purification of her blood: for all the following days were days of purification; not of entire separation.

Three-and-thirty days.] All the days of her uncleanness were forty: and for the first seven days she was to be separate from all conversation with her neighbours; but the following three-and-thirty she had free conversation with them, and was only excluded from the sanctuary, and from eating of the peace-offerings, or the paschal lamb, and (if she were the wife of a priest) of the tithes, and other lesser holy things; of which otherwise she might have eaten.

She shall touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purification be fulfilled.] If Maimonides may be credited, the Zabii, an ancient sort of idolaters in those eastern parts, had a great number of tedious and tiresome customs about the purification of their childbed women; from all which God freed his people, by restraining them only from coming into his sanctuary, or partaking of holy things; but, otherwise, leaving them at liberty to perform all manner of offices in their family, during the time of their purification, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.) It is apparent, also, that other gentiles kept their women from their temples, a long time after their childbirth; and that superstitious people would not so much as go within their doors. See Dilherrus, in the forenamed book and chapter.

Ver. 5. And if she bear a maid-child, then shall she be unclean two weeks, as in her separation.] The time of strict separation, when they brought forth a female, was double to that which was prescribed (ver. 2.) when they brought forth a male. And so also was the time of their purification: which lasted threescore and six days, as they in the other case by thirty and three. The reason of which difference, not only the Jews, but others also, derive from the greater redundancy (as R. Levi Barzelonita calls it, Præcept. clxvi.) of blood in the latter case than in the former; and from the slowness of nature in its operation, which made the purgation longer before it was effected. Hippocrates himself treats of this difference, in his book de Natura Puerp. where he saith, women are sooner purged after the birth of males than of females: (see Joh. Meursius in his Syntagma de Puerperio, cap. 6, 7.) The natural weaknesses of women also, during this time, required quiet, and little company: from which the very temper of their blood, in those climates, made a longer separation more necessary than in these colder regions. But if there were no such apparent reason to be given of these things, yet "vel ex ipsa veneranda antiquitate, et simplicitate suscipienda forent et minimè contemnenda," (as Conrad. Pellicanus speaks upon the foregoing chapter, ver. 35.) they ought, for the sake of their venerable antiquity and simplicity, to be duly regarded, and not to be despised.

Ver. 6. And when the days of her purification are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter.] Which were not till the end of the fortieth day for a son, and the eightieth day for a daughter. And therefore, the offerings here mentioned were not offered till the day after, viz. the forty-first day for the one, and the eighty-first day for the other; because, till then her purification was not perfected, as Maimonides observes in his book de Sacrificiis, (Tract. v. sect. 5.) where he observes, also, that they might not eat of holy things, till these sacrifices had been offered for them.

And she shall bring a lamb of the first year.] Which then was in its greatest perfection, as hath been often noted.

For a burnt-offering.] In gratitude to God for giving her a safe deliverance, and bestowing a child upon her, and raising her up to her former strength, and bringing her again to his sanctuary. Where, by this offering, she also commended herself and child to his continued care and blessing, and implored his Divine guidance and assistance in its education. For these offerings, as I observed before, were a kind of supplication, which they that brought them made to God: and there was nothing that pious people could more earnestly desire on such occasions, than that God would take their little ones into his tuition. Who are continually liable to so many dangers, that without the special favour of God, and the custody of his angels, they could never grow to be able to take any care of themselves. They are the words of Conradus Pellicanus upon this place: who thence infers, how necessary it is that the people of the church should be admonished frequently, to commend their children unto God both by private and by public prayers, and take care of their instruction, "lest they become like the horse and the mule, that have no understanding."

And a young pigeon, or a turtle-dove, for a sin-offering.] To complete her purification from her uncleanness. For that is here meant by sin; the impurity which the law made, by separating such persons from others, and from the sanctuary for a time. And thus a sin-offering is commanded to be brought by a leper, when he was cleansed; who was charged only with a legal uncleanness, not a moral. And it is more plain, from what is ordained concerning menstruous women, whose courses were purely natural, and yet they were to offer a sin-offering when they were gone, (xv. 30.) because the law accounted that a state of uncleanness: and from the case of a Nazarite, who had unwillingly touched a dead body, Numb. v. 11. where it is said, he had sinned by the dead; i. e. was legally polluted. And this may be the reason, perhaps, why a burnt-offering is here mentioned before the sin-offering, which is wont to precede the other, (ver. 7, 8.)

It may be conceived, indeed, that in all the forementioned cases, those persons (especially lepers) had some way offended God, before or in their state of separation; and therefore were to have their sin (properly so called) expiated by a sin-offering. And R. Bechai also gives another probable account of it; that this sacrifice was offered not for her own sin, but the sin of her first parent, the mother of all living, who brought sin and sorrow into the world: for from a bad stock there cannot sprout good branches; and therefore God appointed this offering for the expiation of that primary sin.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest.] It was a most wise constitution (as a person of excellent learning, Dr. Alix, observes), which bound this people, from their first coming into the world, to their going out of it, to have a dependance upon the priests and the Levites, (who for that purpose were dispersed through all the tribes of Israel, that people might be instructed by them how to govern themselves in all the passages of human life.) For there are laws not only about marriages and successions, but about their lying-in, whether of a son or daughter, and about all they were to do while that time lasted, and when it ended; and indeed all the time they lived, and when they went out of the world; in their funerals, and mourning for the dead.

Ver. 7. Who shall offer it before the Lord, and make an atonement for her.] By this offering she was restored to the liberty of God's house, and to partake of holy things. For so it follows.

And she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood.] No longer separated from the holy society.

This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female.] All this principally respected the woman; yet not excluding her child; who (it appears by St. Luke, ii. 22.) was on this day of his mother's purification presented unto the Lord. That indeed had respect to the law about the first-born: but a very ancient MS. and the Syriac, and Origen, taking this for the day of their purification, and not merely of hers (καθαρισμοῦ αὐτῶν), it plainly shews the child could not be admitted into the Divine presence, no more than the mother, till the days abovementioned were accomplished.

Ver. 8. And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, and two young pigeons, &c.] This was a merciful provision for the poorer sort, as in other cases, (v. 7. 11.) And from this very place we may learn, in how mean a condition the mother of our Lord was; who for her purification did not bring a lamb (unto which her piety, no doubt, would have prompted her, if she had been able), but only this lower sort of offering, as we read Luke ii. 24.

And the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.] This sacrifice was as available as the other to restore her to communion with God's people. The Greeks imitated this; among whom the fortieth day was insignis (as Censorinus speaks), famous or remarkable upon more accounts than one. For women with child did not go to the temple ante diem quadragesimum, before the fortieth day: and after their delivery, commonly, they were not fit to go out till forty days more (his words are, "Quadraginta diebus pleræque fœtæ graviores sunt, nec sanguinem interdum continent"), during which time their little ones were sickly, never smiled, nor were out of danger. Which is observed by that great physician Celsus, (lib. ii. cap. 1.) "Maxime, omnis pueritia primum circa quadragesimum diem periclitatur." And therefore, when this day was past, they were wont to keep a feast (as Censorinus there tells us, cap. 11. de Die Natali), which they called Τεσσαρακοστόν at which time, it is likely, they offered sacrifices also, as the Jewish women did.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying.] Here God speaks to Aaron again, as well as unto Moses, (see xi. 1.) because he and his posterity were peculiarly concerned in the following laws about the leprosy, both in judging and cleansing of it.

Ver. 2. When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh.] For there this disease lay and shewed itself.

A rising, a scab, or a bright spot.] The leprosy appeared in one of these three forms, either as a tumour or swelling, or a scab, or a bright spot in the skin.

And it shall be in the skin of his flesh, like the plague of leprosy.] There were some swellings, and scabs, and spots, which were not the leprosy, but only like it. And therefore Moses here teaches the priests how to discern between a true leprosy and the resemblance of it; that accordingly they might either pronounce a person clean or unclean; shut him up, or let him have his liberty; shave him, or let his hair grow.

Plague of leprosy.] If we may believe Pliny, (lib. xxvi. cap. 1.) this disease was peculiar to Egypt, which he calls genitrix talium vitiorum: and if Artapanus, in Eusebius, saith true, (lib. ix. Præpar. Evang. cap. 27.) Pharaoh, who sought to kill Moses, was the first who was struck with this disease, and died of it. So false is the story of Manetho, who, to hide the true cause of the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, saith, that they cast out a company of leprous people, of whom Moses was the captain. Out of Egypt, it is likely, this disease spread into Syria, which is noted likewise to have been much infested with such foul irruptions in the skin: which have as many various names, as there are risings, or breakings-out, or spots there; and are commonly all comprehended under the name of leprosy, as P. Cunæus observes, (lib. ii. de Republ. Judæorum, cap. ult.) But Moses here distinguishes them, and seems to instruct the Israelites, that the leprosy which he speaks of was no common disease, but inflicted by the hand of Heaven. So the Hebrew doctors understand it; particularly R. Levi Barzelonita: (Præcept. clxviii.) "a leprous man ought not to look upon his disease as a casual thing; but seriously consider, and acknowledge, that some grievous sin is the cause of it." Which made the knowledge of their priests so admirable, (as the author of the book Cosri speaks, par. ii. sect. 58.) that they were able to understand what was Divine in the leprosy, and what was from natural temper. For that there was something Divine in it is confirmed by the story of Naaman, (2 Kings v. 7.) where the king of Israel plainly declares, none but God could cure a leper: whom therefore they looked upon as smitten by God; and thence called this disease the plague, or stroke, of leprosy, and sometimes simply the plague or stroke, (ver. 3. 5. 17. 22. of this chapter.) For they could not understand how such a pestilent disease, as infected not merely men's bodies, but the very walls of their houses, and garments, should proceed merely from ordinary causes; and therefore they thought there was an extraordinary hand of God in it.

Then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, or unto one of his sons the priests.] Not to the physicians, but to the priests; who were the only judges, whether it was a true leprosy or no: and if it were, could best direct him to his cure (by repentance and prayer to God), and cleanse him when he was cured. But they might resort to any priest whatsoever, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Talmud (where there is a large treatise of this matter), though he was maimed in any part of his body, and so unfit to minister at the altar, provided his eyes still continued good, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 14. num. 5.)

Ver. 3. And the priest shall look on the plague in the skin of his flesh.] When there is a suspicion that it is a leprosy. The same great man observes, that this inspection might be made upon any day of the week, but the sabbath or festivals. Yet not in the night, nor in any hour of the day, but the fourth, fifth, eighth, and ninth: for they accounted the morning, evening, and noon, not such proper times to make this inspection. Which, they say, also might be made by an Israelite; though none but the priest could pronounce one clean, or unclean. For though perhaps the priest was ignorant, and stood in need to be informed by wiser persons than himself, yet that man who was not a priest could only direct him what to judge, but not give the judgment. According to that law, (Deut. xxi. 5.) Out of their mouth, or, by their word, shall every stroke be tried: which particularly relates to the leprosy, (xxiv. 8.)

And when the hair in the plague is turned white, &c.] He begins with the last of the three indications of a leprosy, viz. the bright spot. In which, if the very hair was turned white, and it was not only a superficial whiteness, but the spot seemed to have eaten deeper into the very flesh, then it was to be judged a true leprosy. R. Levi Barzelon. expresses it thus: "When there was one or more places so white, that their whiteness was like that of an egg-shell, or more glossy, then it is the leprosy."

And the priest shall look upon him.] Having made this inspection, and found it to be the leprosy.

And pronounce him unclean.] Command him to be separated from the congregation, and shut up by himself, (ver. 46.)

But though all the Israelites, children and servants, as well as others, were under this law, yet no gentile, nor the proselytes of the gate, were, as Maimonides, and the rest of the Hebrew doctors tell us.

Ver. 4. If the bright spot be white in the skin of his flesh.] i. e. If there be barely a white spot in the skin which hath not altered the hair.

And in sight be not deeper than the skin, and the hair thereof be not turned white.] The forenamed R. Levi explains this passage thus: If it were not a perfect white, but something duskish, below the whiteness of an egg-shell, he was to look upon it as that which might prove a lesser sort of foulness in the blood and skin, short of the leprosy, which infected the very hair in that place.

Then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days.] He had something like the plague, which might prove to be it; and therefore he was to be separated from others so long, that some judgment might be made, whether it was, or would be so or not: for seven days commonly make considerable alterations in the state of all diseases.

Ver. 5. And the priest shall look on him the seventh day.] Until which it was not likely any certain judgment could be made.

And behold.] Observe this.

If the plague in his sight be at a stay.] In the Hebrew the words are, If the plague standeth in his sight; i. e. seemeth to him not to have spread itself at all in the skin, as it follows in the next words. Or, as it may be translated, if it continue in the same colour, which it had before, and were not altered: for the Hebrew word signifies colour, as well as sight. And if this translation be right, then here are two marks which the priest was to observe (viz. whether the spot had not altered its complexion, and whether it had not spread further in the skin); but according to our present translation there is but one, the next clause being but the explication of this.

Then the priest shall shut him up seven days more.] The case remaining dubious, he was to make a further trial.

Ver. 6. And the priest shall look on him again the seventh day; and behold, if the plague be somewhat dark.] The priest was to mark diligently whether there were any alteration in the colour, and that which was bright before now looked dark; which justifies the second interpretation of the first clause in the foregoing verse.

And the plague spread not in the skin.] This was another token by which the priest was to be governed in his judgment.

The priest shall pronounce him clean.] He was to be shut up no longer, but left at liberty to go abroad and freely converse with his brethren.

It is but a scab.] An ordinary scab, or scurf, short of the leprosy: such as is now in Guam and Mindanao, which Dampier (in his late New Voyage round the World, chap. 12.) describes to be a dry scurf all over the body, that causeth great itching, and raiseth the outer skin in small white flakes, like the scales of little fish, when they are raised on end with a knife. But he did not perceive that they made any great matter of it, for they did not refrain any company for it.

And he shall wash his clothes, and be clean.] Having been suspected to have a leprosy, and something like it appearing, which had kept him separate from his brethren several days, he was to use this small purification; because there was some kind of impurity in his blood, which broke out into the skin, though not infectious.

Ver. 7. And if the scab spread much abroad in the skin.] The second sort of leprosy was a scab, (ver. 2.) which seems to have been of two kinds: one of which Moses joins to what he saith of the swelling; and the other to what he saith of the bright spot.

After he hath been seen of the priest for his cleansing.] That is, after the priest had pronounced him clean, (ver. 6.)

He shall be seen of the priest again.] A new inspection was to be made by the priest. And if any man (as Maimonides saith) was so profane as carelessly to neglect it, by not going to the priest, and shewing him his case, his punishment was to have his leprosy cleave to him for ever.

Ver. 8. And if the priest see, that, behold, the scab spreadeth in the skin.] Though it lurked for a time, yet this spreading of it in the skin was to be taken for an evident mark that it was the leprosy.

Ver. 9. When the plague of leprosy is in a man.] That is, when there is a suspicion of the first sort of leprosy, mentioned ver. 2. and called a rising or swelling.

Then he shall be brought unto the priest.] By those who feared his company might be infectious; but good men went of themselves to him.

Ver. 10. And the priest shall see him.] Diligently view, and consider the nature of the scab.

And, behold, if the rising be white in the skin, and it have turned the hair white, and there be quick raw flesh in the rising.] If upon examination the priest found a third mark, besides the two former (whiteness in the skin, and the hair turned white), viz. that it had eaten into the very flesh; he was to look upon it as an undoubted leprosy.

Quick raw flesh in the rising.] Quick or living flesh (as the Hebrew word is) signifies sound flesh not corrupted. So the meaning seems to be, if it have broken through the skin, and in the raw sound flesh there appeared white spots, there needed no further consideration; for it would soon taint the whole mass of blood.

Ver. 11. It is an old leprosy in the skin of his flesh.] The two first signs were very bad, particularly the second, the hair turning white (just as a plant, saith Procopius Gazæus, or a flower dies, together with the earth in which it grows), but this last was far worse; being a mark of an inveterate evil that had been long breeding, and got not only into the skin and the hair, but into the very living flesh; which, as the same Procopius speaks, it began to corrode, and would devour.

And the priest shall pronounce him unclean.] Without any further examination.

And shall not shut him up.] Because there was no need of any more proof, nor any doubt, whether it was the leprosy or not.

For he is unclean.] It was apparent from the tokens, which were already very visible.

Ver. 12. And if a leprosy break out abroad in the skin.] He calls that a leprosy, which was not truly so, but was by some thought to be so, because it had a likeness to it.

And the leprosy cover all the skin of him that hath the plague.] i. e. Seemeth to have it.

From his head even to his foot, wheresoever the priest looketh.] An eruption in every part of his body, which was spread all over with scabs.

Ver. 13. He shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague.] This sort of breaking-out, from top to toe, as we speak, was not to be looked upon as the plague of leprosy; being rather a relief to the body, than a disease.

It is all turned white, he is clean.] There was no danger in this eruption; nature having only discharged those putrid salt humours which were in the blood. Just as those among us, who have the measles and small-pox, are likely to do well, when they come out every where; but not when they stick in the skin.

Ver. 14. But when raw flesh appeareth in him, he shall be unclean.] When the sound flesh appeared speckled with the forementioned spots, it was an evident token that it was a settled leprosy: nature being not able to throw out the ill humour into the skin; but working inward into the flesh.

Ver. 15. And the priest shall see the raw flesh, and pronounce him to be unclean.] When he sees the sign beforenamed, he shall make no further examination, but declare him to be unclean.

For the raw flesh is unclean; it is a leprosy.] This was so undoubted a mark, that there needed no more. Which makes Moses repeat it, that the priest might observe it the more carefully, when he made his inspection.

Ver. 16. Or if the raw flesh turn again.] If there was such an alteration in it, that it was freed from these pestilent spots.

And be changed into white.] Look like other flesh, which hath a white skin upon it.

He shall come unto the priest.] Desire him to make a new examination of the state of his body.

Ver. 17. And the priest shall see him.] Take a view of his body; especially in those parts where the leprosy was suspected to be.

And, behold, if the plague be turned into white, &c.] If, upon due consideration, his body appear alike white every where, and no spots to be seen in the flesh, the priest was to declare him to have no leprosy remaining.

Ver. 18. The flesh also, in which, even in the skin thereof, was a bile, and is healed.] In this and the following verses he treats of such a leprosy as arose out of ulcers which had been healed: and afterward there was a new eruption, which might prove a leprosy.

Ver. 19. And in the place of the bile.] Where the bile formerly broke out; but seemed to be healed.

There be a white rising, or a bright spot, white.] These two are the first and last indications of a leprosy, mentioned ver. 2.

And somewhat reddish.] This is a mark not hitherto mentioned: which some render exceeding shining; or an inflammation which looked very red. For so the Hebrew word adamdameth seems to import; it being certain, that the doubling of the radicals of any word increases the sense. This is apparent from abundance of instances in other words; which are heaped up together by Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6.) where he observes, with respect to this word, that it being impossible that the same thing should be both very white and very red, it hath made most interpreters expound this word adamdameth as we do, somewhat reddish; quite contrary to the true sense of the word, which imports a high degree of some colour, and therefore ought to be translated exceeding glistering. For Adam signifies not only red, but also to glister: and accordingly, persons very leprous are said in Scripture to be as white as snow, (Exod. iv. 6. Numb. xii. 10. 2 Kings v. 27.) See ver. 49. of this chapter.

And it be shewed to the priest.] That he might pass his judgment upon it, whether it were the leprosy or not.

Ver. 20. And if, when the priest seeth it, behold, it being in sight lower than the skin, and the hair thereof being turned white, &c.] If, upon a serious search, it appear to have the two marks here mentioned, (which are those before set down, ver. 3.) the priest was to declare him unclean.

It is a plague of leprosy broken out of the bile.] In the place where the bile formerly was, (ver. 19.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 21. But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there is no white hair therein, and it be not lower than the skin.] If he find upon search neither of the two marks beforenamed.

But be somewhat dark, &c.] Though it had not eaten into the flesh (which was a certain sign of a leprosy), yet, if it changed colour, there was some ground of suspicion: and therefore he was to be shut up seven days. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 22. And if it spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean.] The spreading of the spot was a token the blood was much vitiated, and that this foul disease was begun in the body.

It is a plague.] Of leprosy.

Ver. 23. But if the bright spot stay in its place, and spread not, &c.] If it continued in the same condition, and made no progress, it was an indication the bile was breaking out again; which did not make him unclean.

Ver. 24. Or if there be any flesh in the skin, whereof there is a hot burning.] In the Hebrew the words run thus, Or the flesh, when it shall be in the skin a burning fire. That is, when there is an inflammation made in the skin and the flesh, by a hot burning coal, or some such thing falling upon it. For in the foregoing paragraph (ver. 16, &c.) he speaks of ulcers which arose of themselves from bad humours in the body: and here of such as were made by fire.

And the quick flesh that burneth.] The part of the body that is burnt.

Have a white bright spot, somewhat reddish, or white.] Very shining. (See ver. 19.) For this was a sign of the leprosy broken out in that burnt place, which otherwise would have looked black.

Ver. 25. If the hair in the bright spot be turned white, &c.] See ver. 20.

Ver. 26. But if the priest look upon it, and, behold, there be no white hair, &c.] The same direction is given here, as in the foregoing case, (ver. 21.)

Ver. 27. And the priest shall look upon him the seventh day, and if it be spread abroad much in the skin, &c.] This verse and the next contain the same marks with those ver. 23, 24.

Ver. 28. It is a rising of the burning.] A tumour made by fire, or a hot iron, &c. which burnt the part. A mere inflammation (as he calls it in the end of this verse) arising from that burning.

Ver. 29. If a man or woman have a plague upon the head, or the beard.] Such a kind of disease, Pliny saith, came into Italy in the middle of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, which they called mentagra, because it commonly began in the chin; and was so filthy, "ut quæcunque mors præferenda esset," that any death was preferable to it. (Lib. xxvi. Nat. Hist. cap. 1.)

Ver. 30. Then the priest shall see the plague: and, behold, if it be in the sight deeper than the skin, &c.] There are the same marks of this sort, with those of the former: only instead of a white hair, which there was in other kinds of leprosies, there was a yellow hair in this; and not so thick as the white.

Ver. 31. If it be not in sight deeper than the skin, &c.] This was some indication that it was not a leprosy; yet if there were no black hair in it (as it here follows) which was a sign of soundness and health, (ver. 37.) the case was not certain, but doubtful; and therefore he was to be shut up seven days, to see what it would prove.

Ver. 32. And in the seventh day the priest shall look on the plague.] So he calls it, because it had a resemblance of the leprosy.

And, behold, if the scall spread not.] For this was the nature of the disease, which Pliny describes in the place abovementioned, that it spread itself in many persons, from the chin all over the face, except the eyes; and went down to the neck, the breast, and the hands, fœto cutis furfure, with a filthy scurf of the skin, which is here called a scall.

And there be no yellow hair in it.] This, with the foregoing and the following sign (that it was not in sight deeper than the skin), made it probable it was not the leprosy. Yet he was not upon this immediately discharged; but a further trial, as the next verse tells us, was to be made, before he was set at liberty.

Ver. 33. He shall be shaven, but the scall shall he not shave, &c.] For sureness' sake, the head and beard were to be shaven (which might be performed by any body), that the priest might the better discern whether the scall spread, or no. Only the place where the scall appeared was not shaven; because the priest was to observe of what colour the hair in it was. So R. Levi Barzelonita, (Præcept. clxxii.) "They shave round about the scall, leaving only the two next hairs; that they may know the decrease or increase of the disease."

And the priest shall shut him up that hath the scall seven days more.] In which time, some considerable alteration would be made one way or other.

Ver. 34. And in the seventh day.] Before it was completed.

The priest shall look on the scall; and, behold, if it be not spread.] Here are the same marks which were mentioned before; that if the scall did not spread in the skin, nor eat into the flesh, he was not to be shut up any longer, but pronounced clean; and, after he had washed his clothes, be admitted into the society of God's people again. (See ver. 6.)

Ver. 35. But if the scall spread much in the skin after his cleansing.] It fell out sometimes, that the scall, which had stood at a stay for a fortnight, and seemed neither to spread nor corrode at all, began to go on to the neighbouring parts.

Ver. 36. Then the priest shall look on him; and, behold, if the scall be spread in the skin, &c.] If he found this single mark, that after the scall had been at a stand a good while, it began to spread much, he was not to trouble himself for any further token, by seeking for the yellow hair, (ver. 30.) but immediately declare him to be a leper.

Ver. 37. But if the scall be in his sight at a stay, &c.] If after this the scall stopped again, and made no further progress; and withal there was a black hair appeared in it (which the priest could not find before, but now was grown up in it), he was to take it for an evident sign that the man was cured of his leprosy. For the hair being restored to its natural colour, was a certain indication that the blood was cleansed from its impurity.

Ver. 38. If a man or woman have in the skin of their flesh bright spots, even white bright spots.] i. e. No other sign of the leprosy but only this.

Ver. 39. Then the priest shall look; and, behold, if the bright spots in the skin of their flesh be darkish white, &c.] In this case the priest was to observe, whether the spots had any thing of a cloudiness in them; for if they had, it was not a leprosy: if they were perfectly clear and bright, then it was.

Ver. 40. And the man whose hair is fallen off his head.] i. e. From the hinder part of it.

Ver. 41. And he that hath his hair fallen off from the part of his head towards his face, &c.] The design of these two verses is, to instruct the priest that the mere falling off the hair from his head, which made him bald, either behind or before, should not be taken to be a sign of the leprosy.

Ver. 42, 43. And if there be in the bald head, or bald forehead, a white reddish sore, &c.] If either in the hinder or forepart of a bald head there appeared a white sore exceeding bright (as it should be translated), like that which appeared sometimes in the skin, (ver. 24.) then, as it here follows, he was to be looked on as a leprous man.

Ver. 44. The priest shall pronounce him utterly unclean.] As unclean as any of the forenamed persons.

His plague is in his head.] The leprosy appears in his head, as in other persons it appears in the skin of their bodies.

Ver. 45. And the leper in whom the plague is.] Any of the forenamed sort of leprosies.

His clothes shall be rent.] After the manner of mourners (as some take it), that he might sensibly declare his afflicted condition. For upon any sad occasion, they were wont in those countries to rend their clothes, (Ezra ix. 3. 5. Job ii. 12.) Others, indeed, think this was intended only for a mark of his uncleanness: but I do not see why it might not serve to both ends.

And his head bare.] This was another token of mourning. But the Hebrew writers unanimously translate these words quite contrary: the phrase in the original being, his head shall be free; i. e. say they, from cutting or shaving: which was as much as to say, he should let his hair grow long. This also was a sign of sadness and sorrow. (See x. 6.)

And shall put a covering upon his upper lip.] Either he was to cover it with his hand, or with the skirt of his garment, which they threw over their heads, when they were in a state of mourning. Of which this was another sign, (Ezek. xxiv. 17. 22.) as it was also of shame, (Mic. iii. 7.) Some will have all these to be marks only for men to avoid them: but that is sufficiently taken care of, in the last words of this verse.

I shall only add, that the Hebrews well observe, that none were bound to any of these things, who were shut up on suspicion of leprosy; but only such as were absolutely pronounced to be leprous.

And shall cry, Unclean, unclean.] Give notice to passengers not to come near him, by crying out aloud, so that they might hear him, I am in the most unclean condition wherein any man can be. Some fancy this was required, that men might avoid infection: but the true reason was, that they might avoid legal pollutions by conversation with them; as appears by the next verse. Jeremiah seems to allude to this, Lament. iv. 15. And there seems also to have been the like care among the heathen, to give notice of any place which was unclean, that none might be defiled by it. So Servius tells us upon Æneid. iv. that the Romans were wont to set a cypress-tree (which being cut down could not grow again) before the door of a dead man's house, "Ne quis sacram rem facturus, imprudens domum præteriret," lest any man, who was going to perform sacred offices, should unawares pass by his door.

Ver. 46. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled.] Remain in that desolate state.

He is unclean.] Separate from company.

He shall dwell alone.] 2 Kings xv. 5.

Without the camp shall his habitation be.] There were three camps (as the Hebrews commonly observe); that of the Divinity (or the sanctuary), that of the Levites, and that of the Israelites: out of all which a leprous man was to be removed, that no man might have conversation with him, but only such who were leprous like himself; who in aftertimes were shut out of the cities, as now out of the camp, (2 Kings vii. 3.)

Ver. 47. The garment also that the plague of leprosy is in.] This is a matter which we do not now understand; that a leprosy should not only cleave to a garment and infect it, but appear and be seen in it. As, in the next chapter, Moses speaks also of a leprosy in a house, (xiv. 34.) which he doth not mention here, because they had no houses in the wilderness, but dwelt in tents covered with skins, and such-like things: in which, as well as in garments, he supposes the leprosy will be. (See xiv. 34.) But what kind of disease this was, which appeared in insensible things, the Syrians and Egyptians perhaps might then understand, but we now are ignorant, as P. Cunæus speaks; "Cujusmodi id vitium in rebus inanimatis fuerit, Syri fortasse et Ægyptii tunc intellexerunt; nos hercle ignoramus," (lib. ii. de Republ. Hebræor. cap. ult.) And, indeed, it seems to have been a Divine stroke, as Moses himself signifies, (xiv. 34.) and appears not only from the place abovementioned, (2 Kings v. 7. 27.) but from xv. 5. of the same book. And so the Jews have always understood it, particularly Maimonides, who, in his treatise on this subject, (cap. 16. sect. 9.) saith, "that this change in garments and houses did not proceed from natural causes, but was a sign and a miracle in Israel." That is, an extraordinary punishment inflicted by God, as a token of his high displeasure. And it is not at all incredible that such a strange plague should then infest them, which is not now known in the world; when we consider what unusual diseases there have been in other countries, unknown in former times; which afterwards have also vanished, and are now to be found only in books. Pliny mentions several new diseases, "omni priori ævo incognitos," unknown to all ages past; some of which were peculiar to some provinces, and touched not others. Concerning which he did not know what to say, but only this: "Quid hoc esse dicamus, aut quas Deorum iras?" What shall we call this? or from what great anger of the gods doth it proceed, that the diseases which already certainly infest men's bodies (which in number are above three hundred) should not be sufficient; but new ones are still to be feared? (lib. xxvi. Nat. Hist. cap. 1.) He looked, that is, upon these strange diseases as sent by God, when men had highly incurred his displeasure. The last century was famous for such an extraordinary plague (as Johannes Wierus, who then lived, often calls it), when the scurvy, which was confined before to some northern regions, near the sea, overran the Low Countries, being at that time unknown in Germany, Italy, France, and Spain, which were entirely free from it. (See his Observationum Medicarum, lib. i. sect. 1.)

Whether it be a woollen garment or a linen.] There is a great dispute among the Talmudists, whether garments made of camels' hair (which they call the wool of camels) were comprehended under these words or not.

Ver. 48. Whether it be in the warp or woof, of linen, or of woollen.] In the inward or outward part of it.

Whether in a skin, or in any thing made of skin.] They were more likely to be infected than woollen or linen garments; because they had been part of the body of living creatures.

Ver. 49. And if the plague be greenish or reddish in the garments, &c.] There seems to be great reason in what Maimonides saith, in his treatise of the leprosy, that the Hebrew word jerakrak (which is made by the doubling of the radical letters) should be interpreted the most intense green; such as is in the wings of a peacock (as he speaks) or in the leaves of a palm-tree. As the word adamdam, in like manner, signifies the highest degree of another colour, viz. redness; such as the brightest scarlet: (see ver. 19.) And if a spot of these colours were found in a garment or skin, as broad as a bean, it was a sufficient ground to think it might be the leprosy; if it were not so broad, it was accounted clean.

It is a plague of leprosy, &c.] It was justly to be suspected, and therefore was to be brought to the priest for his judgment to be passed upon it. Who was to make a trial what it would prove, by shutting up that garment or skin wherein the spot was for the space of seven days; as is directed in the next verse.

Ver. 50. And the priest shall look upon the plague, &c.] If, upon his inspection, he found the forenamed tokens, he was to do with it as he did with persons who were under a suspicion of a leprosy.

Ver. 51. If the plague be spread in the garment, &c.] There were three certain marks (as Maimonides notes) of the leprosy in a garment; the extreme greenness or redness of the spots in it; and the spreading of them after they were first discovered.

The plague is a fretting leprosy.] The Hebrew word mamereth, which we translate fretting, is very variously rendered by the ancient interpreters; as Bochart hath observed in his Hierozoicon. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. where, from the Arabic tongue, he thinks it may be best translated an exasperated or irritated leprosy: that is, very sharp and pricking (which suits well with our translation), eating into the garment or skin, till it was consumed. Abarbinel translates it painful: because this sort of leprosy in the body of a man was full of anguish. And so this word is used in Ezek. xxviii. 24. where a thorn is called mamir; and translated by us a grieving thorn.

Ver. 52. He shall therefore burn that garment,&c.] It seems this leprosy could never be got out of the garment or skin wherein it was; which therefore was ordered to be burnt, as never likely to be fit for use.

Ver. 53, 54. If it be not spread in the garment, &c.] If the spot was at a stay, and did not proceed further, then the garment, as the following verse directs, was to be washed, and shut up for seven days; in which time it appeared whether the impurity were quite gone, or still remained.

Ver. 55. If the plague had not changed its colour.] If washing had not altered that vicious colour, but it still continued very red or green.

And the plague be not spread.] Or, though it be not spread; yet it was to be pronounced unclean, and adjudged to be burnt.

It is fret inward.] Though it did not spread in breadth, yet it fretted in depth.

Whether it be bare within or without.] In the Hebrew the words are, In the baldness of the hinder part, or in its forepart: which seems to be a manner of speaking taken from ver. 42, 43. where he treats of bald heads. And the meaning is, whether it eat into the right side of the garment (which is compared to the forehead), or into the wrong side (which is compared to the hinder part of the head), making it as bare as a bald head is, when there is not a hair left. For this sort of leprosy was wont to eat off the nap of the cloth, and make it threadbare.

Ver. 56. And if the priest look; and, behold, the plague be somewhat dark, after the washing of it, &c.] If it had changed its colour, from very green or red, and became duskish (or, as Abarbinel understands it, the spot was contracted or shrunk up in the washing; so that it was gone in part, if not in whole), then the priest was to cut out that part of the garment where the spot was; there being some indication that the whole garment might not be tainted.

Ver. 57. If it appear still in the garment, &c.] If, after the spot was out, the neighbouring parts appeared to have a tincture of a very green or red colour, it was to be taken for a demonstration that there was a spreading leprosy (as it here follows) in the garment, or skin, which would proceed till it was entirely infected with it.

Thou shalt burn that wherein the plague is with fire.] Therefore, the leprosy being incurable, there was no other remedy but to destroy the thing wherein it was.

Ver. 58. And the garment, either warp or woof, or whatsoever thing of skin it be, which thou shalt wash, if the plague be departed from them, &c.] Whatsoever, after washing, had no appearance of such spots, as are here beforementioned (ver. 49, &c.) remaining in it, there was no further trial to be made of it, but, being washed a second time, it was to be accounted clean, i. e. fit for common use.

Ver. 59. This is the law of the plague of leprosy in a garment of woollen or linen, &c.] By these rules the priests were to judge whether garments were lawful to be used or not; and accordingly to determine: as, by the rules in the foregoing part of the chapter, they were to judge and pronounce whether men and women were fit to be allowed to keep company with others. And when we consider how nice and diligent many nations were, and still are, in their washings, after any sort of defilement, it it no wonder (as Conradus Pellicanus here glosses) that some laws of cleanliness, even about their garments, were prescribed to the Jews; which admonished them of that inward purgation of their hearts from all impure affections, about which they were to be far more solicitous. I have forborne to apply what is here said of the leprosy, in this chapter, to the various degrees of pollutions that are in men's minds; because that would have made this book too large; and it is done already by a great number of commentators, both modern and ancient; particularly among the latter, by Procopius Gazæus, and Hesychius Presb. Hierosolymorum, who sometimes have done it very ingeniously.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] All that is said before, concerning the rules whereby they were to discern the leprosy from the like diseases, were given unto Aaron as well as unto Moses, (xiii. 1.) For Aaron and his posterity were constituted the judges of such matters, in which they had need to be well studied and versed. But the way and manner of cleansing a leper is delivered only to Moses, to be by him given unto Aaron and his sons, who were to depend on him as God's great minister, and their instructor in all religious rites.

Ver. 2. This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing.] The manner and means which God hath ordained of purifying a leper (as Maimonides expounds it), and restoring him to the communion of God's people.

He shall be brought unto the priest.] Not to the house of the priest; for he was to go out to the gate of the camp (as appears by the next verse), and thither the leper was to be brought to him. But these words seem to import the leper was first to come towards the camp (unto some place which the priest, it is likely, appointed), and then the priest, having notice of it, was to go out and look upon him.

Ver. 3. And the priest shall go forth out of the camp.] To the place where the leper was, (xiii. 46.)

And the priest shall look.] Diligently examine in what condition the leper is, by the rules mentioned in the foregoing chapter.

And, behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper.] The priest, no doubt, had been informed, before he went to make the inspection, that there were good grounds to believe the man was freed from his leprosy.

Ver. 4. Then shall the priest command to take for him, &c.] That some of his friends, or such as he ordered, should provide what follows for his purification.

Two birds alive, that are clean.] The margin of our Bibles translates it two sparrows: and they who take the word in this sense have some pretty conceits about it. Particularly this: that it signifies him who lately sat alone, like a solitary sparrow on the house-top (as the Psalmist speaks), to be now admitted into the society of others again. But Origen takes these birds to have been hens, (and so Scaliger shews out of Nicander, that the Greek word στρουθὸς anciently signified; Exerc. 230.) and the LXX. better translate it, δύο ὀρνίθια, two little birds, of any sort whatsoever, provided they were clean, i. e. lawful to be eaten, as the Vulgar truly interprets it. For to restrain it to sparrows had been very absurd, whether they had been clean birds or unclean; because it had been in vain to say a clean sparrow, when the whole species were so by the law; and more unaccountable to require a clean sparrow, if all had been unlawful, as Bochart rightly observes, lib. i. Hieroz. cap. 22. par. ii.

Grotius takes this to have been the Δῶρον, or gift, which is mentioned Matt. viii. 4. which was presented by the leper in the day of his cleansing; rather than those mentioned ver. 10. of this chapter. But I can see nothing of the nature of a gift or present in these birds, which were not to be offered at the altar.

And cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop.] Why his purification was to be made by these things, Maimonides saith he could never understand, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.) But Abarbinel adventures to guess at the reason, and imagines that these four things, the living birds, the cedar, the scarlet, and the hyssop, signified the leper to be cured of the four evils under which he had laboured; in his flesh, his humours, his colour, and smell, which were represented by the four things beforementioned; and were now all become sound and good. For the living birds, he thinks, were a sign that his dead flesh was restored to vigour and life again. And the cedar-wood, which is not easily corrupted, denoted the putrefaction was cured which the leprosy had made in the humours of his body. The scarlet thread, or wool, was an indication of his good complexion restored to him: for this is a bright and grateful colour, as the leprosy was livid and loathsome; signifying (saith he) his blood was purified, which made a lively colour return into his countenance. And lastly, the hyssop, which in that country was a very odoriferous plant, signified the nastiness and stench of that disease was gone. Whatsoever any one may judge of this account of these things, I think it is very plain, that the Jews being possessed with a great detestation of the filthiness of the leper, it was necessary (as Pellicanus observes) that they should be as strongly persuaded, by a great many prolix, laborious, and public ceremonies used for men's purification from it, that they were fit for their society again.

I omit the moral reasons which are given by R. Levi Barzelonita, (Præcept. clxxiii.) for the use of the foremen-tioned things; and the mystical significations of these, and all the following rites of purification: which the most learned and ingenious Bochartus hath drawn out in near twenty particulars, (Hierozoicon. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 22.)

Ver. 5. And the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed.] Not as a sacrifice; for that could be made no where but at the altar; whereas this was without the camp, at a great distance from the sanctuary; and therefore was used only as a rite of cleansing. (See ver. 49.)

In an earthen vessel over running water.] There seems to be a transposition (as is very usual) in these words; the sense being, over an earthen vessel, that hath running, i. e. spring water in it. For so R. Levi Barzelonita, in the place beforenamed, describes this ceremony: "The priest takes a new earthen vessel, and pours into it living water, till it be a quarter full:" which was the measure, according to the tradition of the scribes. Who say, also, that the best and fattest of the two birds was killed over the water, and the blood pressed out so long, that the water was discoloured with it; and then he digged a hole, and buried the dead bird before the leper.

Ver. 6. As for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar-wood, and the scarlet-wool, &c.] He took a stick of cedar-wood (as R. Levi Barzelonita describes this rite, and Maimonides saith the same), which was a cubit long; and tying the bird to it, with its tail uppermost, together with a bunch of hyssop, of a handful long, and as much scarlet-wool as weighed a shekel; he then dipped the bird's tail and wings, with the hyssop and scarlet-wool, in the water tinctured with the blood of the other bird.

Ver. 7. And he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from his leprosy.] R. Levi will have it, that he sprinkled the back of his hand, towards the top of it, with this water and blood.

Seven times.] In token of a perfect purification. (See iv. 17.)

And shall pronounce him clean.] So as to let him come into the camp (from whence he had been excluded), as, in aftertimes, into the city.

And shall let the living bird loose into the open field.] The manner of doing it (as the same R. Levi relates) was, the priest, going into the city, threw the bird over the walls towards the wilderness; the intention of which was, to shew that the leper was restored to a free conversation with all his neighbours, as the bird was with the rest of its kind. (See ver. 53.)

Ver. 8. And he that is to be cleansed shall wash his clothes.] He was to do this, and what follows, before he could be admitted into the camp.

And shave off all his hair, and wash himself in water.] i. e. Wash his whole body. All which contributed to cleanliness.

And after that he shall come into the camp.] But not enter into his own habitation; as appears by the words following.

And tarry abroad out of his tent seven days.] They lived in tents while they remained in the wilderness, which every man had apart, for himself and for his family. Unto which a leper was not restored immediately after his admission into the camp; for fear there should be any undiscerned remainder of his disease, whereby his wife and children might be endangered. For which reason he might not lay with his wife, till seven days were over.

Ver. 9. But on the seventh day he shall shave all his hair off his head, &c.] This may be thought to have been the time appointed for the shaving mentioned in the foregoing verse: but R. Levi, and other Hebrew doctors, understand it of a second shaving at the seven days' end, that they might be assured nothing of the leprosy remained.

Even all his hair he shall shave off.] Under his arm-holes, and in other places of the body where it uses to grow: as well as the hair of his head, and his beard, and his eyebrows.

And he shall wash his clothes.] This seems to be a second washing, after the first at the end of the seven days. And the Hebrew doctors note, that the killing of the bird, the shaving and the sprinkling, were all to be done in the daytime; the rest might be done either by day or by night.

Also he shall wash his flesh in water.] His whole body. For which end such a measure is prescribed by the Hebrew tradition, as would cover it entirely.

And he shall be clean.] So as to be not only restored to his tent, but admitted to go to the tabernacle of the congregation, and offer the sacrifices appointed (in the following part of this chapter) for his complete purification. Till which time he was called Mechussar Kapparah, one that needed expiation; and was not permitted to eat of the holy things.

Ver. 10. And on the eighth day.] If we may believe the Hebrew tradition, he washed himself again on this day, in the court of the women; where there was a room, called the chamber of the lepers, provided for that purpose. So Maimonides. Which great caution was imitated by the primitive Christians, who would not receive great sinners into their communion again, till they had made a long trial of the truth of their repentance.

He shall take two he-lambs without blemish, and one ewe-lamb without blemish.] There were three kinds of sacrifices to be offered upon this occasion; viz. a trespass-offering, a sin-offering, and a burnt-offering: for which these three lambs were to be provided.

Of the first year.] Such were all the lambs to be, both male and female.

And three tenth-deals of fine flour for a meat-offering.] To each of these sacrifices there was a meat-offering appointed, consisting of a tenth part of an ephah of fine flour, i. e. an omer. (See Exod. xvi. 36.) Which is a thing unusual: for we read of no meat-offerings ordered (in the fourth and fifth chapters of this book, which treat of them) to accompany either trespass-offerings or sin-offerings. But there were peculiar rites belonging to the cleansing of a leper, different from the common usages, to make him sensible how great a mercy he had received from God, who alone could cure this disease which his hand had inflicted.

Mingled with oil.] As the manner was in meat-offerings. (See chap. ii. 1.)

And one log of oil.] Which served to another purpose, mentioned ver. 15, 16. of this chapter. And oil being of a healing virtue, may be thought to denote the perfect health and soundness to which the leper was now restored; as the fragrancy of it put him in mind of the happiness he now enjoyed.

A log was the smallest measure among the Jews, containing about half a pint of our measure, as a very learned prelate of our own (Dr. Cumberland) hath computed in his Scripture Weights and Measures, p. 86.

Ver. 11. And the priest that maketh him clean.] Who performeth this office of declaring the leper perfectly clean.

Shall present the man that is to be made clean, and those things, before the Lord, at the door, &c.] He set the man in the first place at the east gate of the court of the Israelites (which in aftertimes was called the gate of Nicanor), with his face towards the sanctuary. For here all those who needed expiation stood; it being unlawful for them to enter into the court of the Israelites, until the expiation was made. So Maimonides observes in his treatise called Mechussare Kapparah, sect. 4.

Ver. 12. And the priest shall take one he-lamb, and offer him.] Next he was to bring one of the lambs to the same place, and present him to the Lord, as is directed in the end of the verse; for that is meant here by offering him, the slaying of him following in the next verse.

For a trespass-offering.] After the manner that the trespass-offerings were offered, (of which see chap. vii.) that he might beg pardon of God (as Abarbinel understands it) for such sins as he had ignorantly committed.

And the log of oil.] Which was presented at the same time with the lamb.

And wave them.] Both the lamb and the log of oil.

For a wave-offering before the Lord.] Which was done by waving them to and fro, up and down, and turning towards all the four quarters of the world, as was noted before. But Maimonides saith, this was waved towards the east: and if he waved them both together, or separated one from the other, the lamb first, and afterward the log of oil, it made no difference.

Ver. 13. And he shall slay the lamb.] The lamb was brought, saith the same author in the forenamed treatise, to the door of the court where the leprous man stood, who stretched out his hands into the court and laid them upon his sacrifice: after which it was killed, as is here directed.

In the place where he shall kill the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering.] See vi. 25.

In the holy place.] In the court of the tabernacle, at the north side of the altar of burnt-offering, (chap. i. 11.) which was a place more holy than the entrance, or east end of the court, where the peace-offerings were to be killed, (see iii. 2.)

For as the sin-offering is the priest's, so is the trespass-offering.] See vii. 7. Both of them were to be eaten by the priests in the court of God's house; and, therefore, were equally holy.

It is most holy.] See ii. 3.

Ver. 14. And the priest shall take some of the blood of the trespass-offering.] There stood two priests, as Maimonides represents it, (in his treatise beforementioned, sect. 4.) ready to receive the blood of the lamb: one, in a holy vessel, with which he sprinkled the altar; the other, in his right hand, which he poured into his left: and then with the fore-finger of his right hand put it upon the right ear, &c. of him that was to be cleansed.

And the priest shall put it upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot.] The priest standing within the court at the entrance of it, and the man standing still without, the man thrust his head within the gate, and the priest put some of the blood which he held in his hand upon the tip of his right ear. After which, the man stretched out his right arm, and the priest put some of the same blood upon the thumb of his right hand; and next, his right leg, on the great toe of which he likewise put some more blood. Thus Maimonides in the same place. Where he saith, if the priest had put the blood upon the left ear, thumb, or toe, all had been of no effect. And he adds, (sect. 5.) that the blood was put upon half of the flap of his ear, and upon the whole breadth of the top of his thumb and great toe, for if he put it on the sides or beneath it was ineffectual. Which is very reasonable to believe, because there was no natural efficacy in these things to cleanse a leper; but it depended wholly upon the will and pleasure of God, which was punctually therefore to be observed; that, by the exact performance of all these ceremonial signs (as Pellicanus speaks) in the face of the church, all men might be satisfied that he was perfectly purified; and he might be publicly authorized to associate himself with the rest of God's people, and be no longer abominated by them for his impurity. For the signification of these ceremonies some think to have been, that he was restored to free communion with God, and with man. (See Exod. xxix. 20.) And Abarbinel looks upon them as a signification also, that the leprosy began in those parts of the body (which are less fleshy and fat), and were now, therefore, particularly declared clean. But whatever the intention of them was, there was a just and wise reason, no doubt, for them; though at this distance from those ages, countries, and customs, &c. we may not be able to discover it.

Ver. 15. And the priest shall take some of the log of oil, and pour it into the palm of his own left hand.] Or, as Maimonides saith, he might pour some of it into the left hand of the other priest, who sprinkled the blood at the altar.

Ver. 16. And the priest shall dip his right finger in the oil, &c.] The fore-finger of his right hand, as the same Hebrew doctor observes.

And shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the Lord.] At every sprinkling he dipped his finger in the oil, and directed it towards the most holy place, where God dwelt: though, if it were not exactly directed to it, the same doctor saith, the sprinkling was good.

Ver. 17. And of the rest of the oil that is in his hand shall the priest put upon the tip of the right ear, &c.] Then the priest returned to the man who was to be cleansed, upon the tip of whose ear, and thumb, and toe, he had put the blood of the trespass-offering, and put some of this oil upon that blood. Which seems to have been a token of forgiveness by the blood, and of healing by the oil.

Ver. 18. And the remnant of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall pour upon the head of him that is to be cleansed.] Which one thing, if it were omitted, the leper was not cleansed. As for the rest of the log of oil, which was not all poured into his hand, but only some of it, (ver. 15.) that was distributed to the priests (as the same Maimonides observes), who alone might eat it in the court of the tabernacle, as they did other holy things. But none might taste of it before the sprinkling, and other things beforementioned, were performed. If any man did he was beaten; as he was who ate the holy things before the sprinkling of the blood. For that was a great profaneness for any person to take his portion before God had that which belonged unto him.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord.] This seems to suppose that the leprosy was inflicted as a punishment for some sin, which by this sacrifice was taken away. But the word make atonement doth not always signify the taking away sin; but sometimes merely making a thing fit for holy uses. Thus Moses is said to make an atonement for the altar, Exod. xxix. 36, 37. (See there.) And in the same sense may an atonement be said to be made for the leper by this sacrifice; which restored him to be made partaker of the holy things offered at the altar. (See below, ver. 53.)

Ver. 19. And the priest shall offer the sin-offering.] The other he-lamb, mentioned ver. 10. which was to be offered after the manner of the sin-offering for such offences (as Abarbinel understands it) as he knew he had committed.

And make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed.] His atonement was begun by the trespass-offering, (ver. 18.) and was advanced by this; which, Abarbinel thinks, was added, to make men more cautious how they contracted any sort of impurity, which would put them to great charges, before they were purged from it. For he could find no other reason, he saith, for the like sacrifices which were offered by him that had an issue, or had meddled with a menstruous woman, or had been defiled by the dead, or tasted swine's flesh, or any creeping thing.

And afterward he shall kill the burnt-offering.] This being a present to God himself, was not accepted, till, by the other offerings for trespass and sin, the man was purified. And this I take to be properly the Δῶρον, or gift, mentioned by our Saviour, Matt. viii. 4.

Ver. 20. And the priest shall offer the burnt-offering and the meat-offering upon the altar.] There were so many offerings made, to shew the greatness of his uncleanness, and now his perfect cure. We read of no meat-offering made with the two former sacrifices; but the three tenth-deals of fine flour (mentioned ver. 10.) seem to signify, every one of these sacrifices, the trespass-offering, the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering, had its proportion of a tenth-deal of flour offered with it. But if we think the whole was appropriated to the burnt-offering, yet it was the same thing to the leper, whose cleansing cost him as dear one way as the other. Only by understanding it thus, the priest, perhaps, had a greater reward for his pains; if we suppose he only burnt a handful upon the altar (as the manner was in these offerings), and had all the rest to his own use. (See chap. ii. ver. 2, 3.)

And the priest shall make an atonement for him, and he shall be clean.] By this, his atonement was completed; and he was made so perfectly clean, as to be admitted to be partaker of the altar, when peace-offerings were sacrificed.

By this very long process, through so many different rites, and for so many days, before men could be purified from a legal defilement in their bodies, was a plain instruction to all persons of good sense, how much more difficult it would prove to cleanse their souls from those moral impurities which they contracted by long habits of sin: and what great pains must be taken both by the sinners themselves, and by God's ministers, to root them out; and with what repeated prayers the mercy of God towards them was to be implored, of which they ought not hastily to presume.

Ver. 21. And if he be poor, and cannot get so much.] The Divine Goodness always made a merciful provision that his service should not be burdensome to men; and therefore took care the poor should not be charged with too costly sacrifices, and yet partake of the benefit of them as much as the rich. (See i. 14. 17. v. 11, &c.)

He shall take.] After he had undergone all the purgations beforementioned, from the fourth verse of this chapter to the tenth, which continued for seven days together: for though his poverty excused him from such chargeable sacrifices, as others of greater ability were to offer, yet he was to be at all the trouble and pains that others took for their purification; there being not one of the rites before prescribed which is omitted in the following verses, only they were less expensive.

One lamb for a trespass-offering.] It is not determined whether it should be a he-lamb or a ewe-lamb; and, therefore, it was left indifferent, for the greater ease of his poverty; only it was to be of the first year, and without blemish, as is prescribed ver. 10.

To be waved.] According to the directions given ver. 12.

To make an atonement for him.] Which was effected by this, as well as by a more valuable sacrifice; when it was the best he had to offer.

And one tenth-deal of fine flour, mingled with oil.] Instead of three tenth-deals, which the richer sort were to offer, (ver. 10.) But if a poor man had vowed he would offer all that is prescribed in that verse, in case God would be pleased to cure him, he was bound thereby (as Maimonides says in the forenamed treatise), and this smaller sacrifice would not serve for his cleansing; but, by the help of his friends or neighbours, he was to procure all that he had vowed.

And a log of oil.] This is the same quantity, the better sort were to offer; for oil was not dear in this country.

Ver. 22. And two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.] Instead of the other two lambs, required of those who could provide them, (ver. 10.)

Such as he is able to get.] The best he could procure: but the meanest would be accepted, if he could get no better.

And the one shall be a sin-offering, and the other a burnt-offering.] Neither of which was to be omitted, though the things offered were but mean: (see i. 14. v. 11.) it being necessary he should perform all religious services, according to his ability. And I think the observation of Conr. Pellicanus is not absurd, that, though there was an exchange made of two lambs for two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, in consideration of a man's poverty; yet no person whatsoever, whether rich or poor, could be cleansed without the sacrifice of one lamb: which may well be looked upon as the figure of the Lamb of God, who alone taketh away the sins of the whole world.

Ver. 23. And he shall bring them on the eighth day.] This plainly suggests, that this poor man had done all that was prescribed on the seven days foregoing, as well as the rich.

For his cleansing unto the priest, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, &c.] See ver. 10, 11, &c. where all that follows here, unto ver. 33. is explained: there being the same rites prescribed, and in the same words, about a poor man, which were used for the cleansing of the rich.

Ver. 24. And the priest shall take the lamb of the trespass-offering.] See ver. 12.

Ver. 25. And he shall kill the lamb.] See ver. 13.

And shall take some of the blood of the trespass-offering, and put it upon the tip, &c.] See this explained, ver. 14.

Ver. 26. And the priest shall pour of the oil into the palm of his own left hand.] See ver. 15. It is not said either there or here how much, but only some of the oil (as it is there translated), that is, as much as the priest thought would be sufficient.

Ver. 27. And the priest shall sprinkle with his right finger, &c.] According to the directions given before, ver. 16.

Ver. 28. And the priest shall put of the oil that is in his hand upon the tip of the right ear, &c.] See ver. 17.

Upon the place of the blood of the trespass-offering.] It being not said here, upon the blood of the trespass-offering, (as the words are ver. 17.) but upon the place of the blood; the Jews infer from thence, that if the blood laid upon the tip of the ear, thumb, or toe, were by any means wiped off, it was sufficient to lay the oil in the very place where the blood had been. So Maimonides, in the forenamed treatise, concerning those that wanted expiation, sect. 5. But that which he there adds is very unreasonable; that if a man wanted the thumb of his right hand, or the great toe of his right foot, or the lap of his right ear, he could never be purified from his uncleanness. For it is not to be thought, that God would make his cleansing impossible, who was maimed or defective in any of these parts: which had been to add one misery to another. Therefore, in this case, the blood and the oil might be put upon the parts next to these.

Ver. 29. And the rest of the oil that is in the priest's hand, he shall put upon the head of him that is to be cleansed, &c.] See ver. 18.

Ver. 30. And he shall offer the one of the turtle-doves, or of the young pigeons, such as he can get.] i. e. The best that he is able to procure.

Ver. 31. Even such as he is able to get.] He repeats it again, that the man might not be troubled if he was not able to procure the very best, provided he did his endeavour to bring the best that his estate could reach.

The one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, &c.] See ver. 19, 20.

Ver. 32. This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy.] Who was shut out of the camp, because of the leprosy, which formerly appeared in him.

Whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing.] Who is so poor that he cannot procure what is prescribed to those that are able to make such offerings as are beforementioned, (ver. 10, &c.) for their reception into the congregation again, when they are found to be free from their leprosy.

But here Maimonides puts this case: suppose a man, having brought the offering of the poor, suddenly becomes rich; or, on the contrary, having brought a rich man's offering, immediately becomes poor, what is to be done? He answers; if this happen before the sacrifice be finished, he is to proceed according to the state in which he was when his sin-offering was offered: that is, offer the sacrifice of a rich man, viz. another lamb, if he was then rich; or the sacrifice of a poor man, if he was then poor.

Ver. 33. And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying.] Now he again speaks to them both conjunctly, (which he did not ver. 1.) as he had done xiii. 1. because Aaron and his sons were peculiarly concerned to judge concerning the leprosy in houses as well as in their inhabitants.

Ver. 34. When ye come into the land of Canaan.] This seems to import that the leprosy did not infect their habitations, till they came into the land of Canaan. When some of the rabbins say, (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. clxxvii.) that God sent this plague for the good of the Israelites, into certain houses, that they being pulled down, the treasure which the Amorites had hidden there might be discovered. But this looks like one of their dreams, who are not willing to think themselves at any time out of the favour of God.

Which I give you for your possession.] From these words (and those in the conclusion of this verse, where Canaan is called the land of their possession), Moses bar Nachman draws a better conclusion; that the leprosy was a Divine stroke in this country, and no where else; because it was a holy land, bestowed upon the Israelites by God, who dwelt here himself, and punished great offences against his Divine majesty with this sore disease; whereby he banished them from his presence, till they amended.

And I put the plague of leprosy upon a house, &c.] These words seem to be a good ground to think, that this plague was a supernatural stroke: not like the contagion which now adheres to the house and clothes of those who have the pestilence. Thus Abarbinel understands it when he saith, I put the plague, it shews the thing was "not natural, but proceeded from the special providence and pleasure of the blessed God." And so the author of Sepher Cosri: (par. ii. sect. 58.) "God inflicted this plague of leprosy upon houses and garments, as a punishment for lesser sins; and when men continued still to multiply transgressions, then it invaded their bodies." So that it began in the houses, which were not infected by the inhabitants, but the inhabitants by the houses. And Maimonides will have this to have been the punishment of an evil tongue, i. e. of detraction and calumny; which began in the walls of his house, and went no further, but vanished, if he repented of his sin. But if he persisted in his rebellious courses, it proceeded to his household-stuff: and if he still went on, it invaded his garments, and at last his body, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.) The very same is quoted by Muscatus, out of Midrash Ruth, to this sense: "That God is so very merciful, as not at first to inflict punishment on men's bodies, as appears in the case of Job; whose goods were first destroyed, and then his children, before his body was touched: and in the plagues of Egypt itself, whose vines and fig-trees God smote, and then their cattle, before he killed their first-born. In the same manner, the plague of leprosy first invaded a man's habitation; though not the whole house, but some stones only, in the beginning of it. Then it spread all over, till the house was pulled down. From thence it went to men's garments; and, if they did not amend, to their bodies; till in the issue they were shut out of the camp, from the company of their brethren." R. Levi Barzelonita explains it after the same manner, in the place beforementioned. And Abarbinel thinks the end and intention of this miracle (as he calls it) "to be a caution and admonition from God, that the man might be converted from his sins: as if the stone in the wall had cried out, and the beam out of the timber answered it, (as Habakkuk speaks, ii. 11.) to the master of the house, saying, 'Turn unto the Lord thy God, O Israel: behold, the plague is come into thy house; and if thou wilt not be converted, it shall abide upon thee and on thy children.'" And this he saith is the opinion of their rabbins.

In a house.] They had no houses till they came into Canaan; but dwelt in tents.

Of the land of your possession.] The Jews were so fond of Jerusalem, that they have excepted it from this plague; because, saith the forenamed R. Levi, Jerusalem was not divided among the tribes; and, therefore, cannot be comprehended under the name of their possession. This he had out of the Gemara of Bava kama, where this is reckoned among the ten privileges of the holy city; that it was not defiled with the plague of leprosy. (See Con. L'Empereur's annotations on Bava kama, cap. 7. sect. 7.)

Ver. 35. And he that owneth the house shall come and tell the priest, &c.] As soon as any inhabitant (for he is meant by him that owneth the house) had a suspicion that this plague was in his dwelling, he was bound to give notice of it to the priest; or else was in danger to incur a further punishment.

Ver. 36. Then the priest shall command that they empty the house.] Of all the household-stuff: and that the inhabitants also should go out of it.

Before the priest go into it to see the plague.] To see whether that which the man suspected was the plague or not.

That all that is in the house be not made unclean.] Till the priest had given his judgment, all things in the house were accounted clean: as till a man was pronounced by him to have a leprosy, nobody was bound to avoid his company.

And afterward the priest shall go in to see the house.] When it was cleared of every thing that might hinder his exact inspection.

Ver. 37. And, behold, if the plague be in the walls of the house.] They were principally to be searched, together with the pavement, and the roof; where this plague appeared.

With hollow strakes.] There was the same kind of mark of a leprosy in a house, that there was of it in the body of a man: for if a spot was deeper than the skin of the flesh, (xiii. 3.) it was a bad token: in like manner, when there were hollow or depressed strakes in the wall of a house, (or, as it is in the latter end of this verse, in sight lower than the wall), it was a sign of the leprosy, which began to corrode and eat into it. This seems to be the import of the Hebrew word schickharuroth, which signifies something that lies deep, and is sunk into the place where it is. For that is a more probable derivation of the word, from schakah, than that of Forsterus, who derives it from schakar, which signifies false. And so the LXX. translate it by the Greek word Κοιλάδας, signifying the leprosy had so eaten into the stones, as to have pitted them (as we speak in our language), i. e. made a cavity in them. Which the Jews justly looked upon as a thing very extraordinary; a miraculous effect (as Maimonides calls it) of the Divine hand.

Greenish or reddish.] Which was the mark of a leprosy in a garment, (xiii. 49.)

Ver. 38. Then the priest shall go out of the house, to the door of the house.] Where he was to stay till he had seen the house shut up, that none might go into it, and thereby be endangered to be defiled.

And shut it up seven days.] In which time he might be able to make a certain judgment, whether it was the leprosy or not. (See xiii. 4.) For the plague would sooner appear when the house was not inhabited.

Ver. 39. And the priest shall come again the seventh day, and shall look.] Make a new inspection, as he did when a man or a garment were suspected to have the leprosy, (xiii. 6. 51.)

And, behold, if the plague be spread in the walls of the house.] This was a bad sign in a man's body or garment, (xiii. 5. 51.)

Ver. 40. Then the priest shall command that they take away the stones in which the plague is.] As far as it was spread in the walls of the house; which it seems were generally made of stone, when they came to Canaan. Meaner houses, the Jews say, were not infected with the leprosy: nor a habitation called a house (as their doctors affirm) unless it had four walls of four cubits high, built of stones and timber, (ver. 45.)

And they shall cast them into an unclean place, without the city.] Where they threw their dung and all manner of filth. For such places there were without their cities; as there were others where no manner of filth might be thrown; which were called clean places. (See iv. 12.)

Ver. 41. And he shall cause the house to be scraped within round about, &c.] All the rest of the walls, where no spots as yet appeared, were to be scraped; that if any of the contagion stuck to them, it might be taken away, and the spreading of it prevented. For which end these scrapings were also thrown out into the same unclean place where the stones were laid.

Ver. 42. And they shall take other stones, and put them in the place of those stones.] Put fresh untainted stones in the room of the other which were taken out of the walls.

And he shall take other mortar, and plaster the house.] Command them to lay fresh plaster all over the walls, where they were scraped.

Ver. 43. And if the plague come again, and break out in the house, &c. after he had taken away the stones, &c.] If after all the forementioned care (of putting in new stones, scraping, and new plastering the walls) the same marks appeared again, which are mentioned ver. 37. the house was to be pulled down, as it is directed in the next verse but one.

Ver. 44. Then the priest shall come and look.] Upon notice given him; or, perhaps, he was bound to come after a certain time, and examine the state of it.

And, behold, if the plague be spread in the house, it is a spreading leprosy.] Of the same nature with that in a garment, which could not be stopped. (See xiii. 51.)

It is unclean.] Incapable to be cleansed from the leprosy, and therefore (as it follows) to be demolished.

Ver. 45. And he shall break down the house, the stones of it, and the timber thereof, and all the mortar of the house.] This was a damage to the owner, but it was to prevent a greater unto him, and unto others: and was not done till there was no remedy. For if he had hearkened to the stones that cried out of the wall (as Abarbinel speaks), saying, Repent, and amend, &c. (which was the meaning of the plague) the infection would have spread no further. (See ver. 34.) The same author fancies, that this plague in their houses was an emblem of the idolatry they would exercise there, when they came into Canaan: and that the pulling down of their houses, was a sign of the destruction of the sanctuary itself, because of their iniquities. This seems to be something forced: but we may not unfitly look upon this manner of proceeding with their houses, when they were infected (some of the stones whereof were taken out, &c. before all was pulled down), as a representation of God's proceedings with them, when they rebelled against him: for, first, some of them were removed; and then the whole nation, by degrees, very much impaired, before they were all carried captive out of their own land.

And he shall carry them forth out of the city, into an unclean place.] Order them to be carried to the place, where the stones and the scrapings of the house, mentioned ver. 40, 41. were thrown. Which may well be looked upon as a figure of their being carried away for their wickedness into heathen countries, which in Scripture are called unclean lands. Such the land of Canaan was before they came into it, (Ezra ix. 11.) and such were all people uncircumcised, (Isa. lii. 1.)

Ver. 46. Moreover, he that goeth into the house all the while that it is shut up, &c.] If he did but enter within the door of the house, while it remained under a suspicion of being defiled, he contracted a defilement himself, under which he lay till night. Which strict care to keep the Israelites free from all such pollutions, is an admonishment to us (as Conradus Pellicanus well notes) to avoid all suspected places and company: according to the exhortation of the apostle, "Abstain from all appearance of evil."

Ver. 47. And he that lieth in the house shall wash his clothes.] It sufficed for the cleansing of him that only entered into such a house, but made no stay there, to be separated for a short time from society: but he that lay there all night, was to do more for his purification; being in more danger to bring away the infection, if there were any.

And he that eateth in the house shall wash his clothes.] He that made a meal there was also exposed to danger, and therefore was bound to wash his clothes (which were very apt to catch the infection), though he did not stay so long as to lie there.

Ver. 48. If the plague had not spread in the house, after it was plastered, then the priest shall pronounce the house clean.] Just as it was in the leprosy in men's bodies, or garments, (xiii. 6. 53.)

Because the plague is healed.] A stop being put to its progress, it was a sign the house was free from the plague, of which it was suspected.

Ver. 49. And he shall take to cleanse the house two birds, and cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop.] The very same rites are used for the cleansing of a house, which were appointed for the cleansing of man, (ver. 4.) And the reason of it was, as Abarbinel well conjectures, to denote that the house was smitten for the man's sake; who was to look upon himself as saved and preserved by the Divine mercy.

It is not said here, indeed, that these two birds should be alive and clean, (as is directed ver. 4.) but that is necessarily understood; for he is ordered immediately to kill one of the birds, and let the other fly away (as in the former case), and nothing unclean could be of effect to cleanse a man from uncleanness.

Ver. 51. And he shall take the cedar-wood, and the hyssop, &c.] This whole verse is explained before, ver. 6. which differs not from this in any thing; but only that the living bird is there mentioned in the first place, and here in the last: and in this verse is more distinctly declared, that all these things should be dipped in the blood of the slain bird, and in the running water.

Ver. 52. And he shall cleanse the house with the blood of the bird, &c.] There is nothing to be observed here, more than before, but only this, that the house is said to be cleansed by the living bird, as well as by the blood of that which was slain: its flying away being a declaration the house was free for any man's habitation. Thus the scapegoat, which was let run into the wilderness, took away the sins of the people, as well as the goat offered at the altar. (See xvi. 5.)

Ver. 53. And he shall let go the living bird out of the city into the open field.] This justifies what the Jewish doctors say upon ver. 7. (See there.)

And make an atonement for the house.] An atonement was made for the house, no otherway than for the altar, (see upon ver. 18.) by cleansing it so as to make it fit for any man to dwell in it.

And it shall be clean.] The owner (who was commanded to forsake the house, ver. 36.) or any one else, might return to it, and inhabit it, as before it was suspected to have the plague in it.

Ver. 54. This is the law for all manner of plagues, and leprosy, and scall.] The rule whereby to judge and to cleanse all leprosies in the bodies of men; and that leprosy in the head or the beard, called a scall, (xiii. 30—38.)

Ver. 55, 56. And for the leprosy of a garment, and of a house, and for a raising, &c.] The foregoing verse and these two, are a recapitulation of the laws delivered in the thirteenth chapter and in this.

Ver. 57. To teach when it is unclean, and when it is clean.] To guide the priest in judgment when to pronounce a man, a garment, or a house, infected with the leprosy; or when to declare them free from it.

This is the law of leprosy.] Here is a conclusion of what belongs to this matter. Which profane minds, who love to disparage the Holy Scripture, and admire no ancient authors but such as Homer, Virgil, and Plautus, (to use the words of Pellicanus upon ver. 39.) may deride as unworthy to be made a part of a Divine law. But men better disposed may discern herein the great goodness of God to the Israelites, whom he had adopted for his peculiar people, in taking care to give them precepts about all manner of things, which were many ways profitable both for the regulating their manners and preserving their health; and accustoming them to an exact obedience to him in every thing. And who doth not see that by these external rites and ceremonies he admonishes us to keep pure consciences, void of offence both towards God and men, in a strict observance of all the rules of our most holy religion?

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying.] For Aaron was particularly concerned to see these laws observed, as well as the foregoing.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] Moses, it is likely, first delivered these laws to them, in the presence of Aaron; who afterward instructed and exhorted them to the observance of them.

When any man hath a running issue.] He speaks of that disease which physicians call a gonorrhœa: which commonly proceeded from an ill course of life, and had in those countries a great virulency in it. If it proceeded merely from some strain in the back, by carrying too great a burden, or by violent leaping, (and several other natural causes, which Maimonides enumerates in his Mechuss. Kapparah, cap. 2.) the man was not defiled with it, nor concerned in this law. And therefore the causes from whence it proceeded were diligently to be considered, as Maimonides there admonishes; which might be discerned by such effects, as made it a very nasty and offensive disease in those hot countries, as it is sometimes here in these colder climates.

Out of his flesh.] The word flesh signifies the secret parts, as it doth Gen. vi. 10. xvii. 13. Ezek. xvi. 26. and other places.

Because of his issue he is unclean.] Upon that account alone he was to be kept from the sanctuary, and separated from company. (See ver. 31.)

Ver. 3. And this shall be his uncleanness in his issue.] The rule whereby to judge of it.

Whether the flesh run with his issue, or his flesh be stopped from his issue, it is his uncleanness.] Whether there were a continued distillation of the corrupt matter, or it was so coagulated as to stop in the passage: either way, it made the man unclean.

Be stopped from his issue.] Rather, with his issue; as the Hebrew words will bear.

Ver. 4. Every bed whereon he lieth that hath the issue is unclean: and every thing whereon he sitteth, &c.] This and the following verses unto ver. 13. are a demonstration that this disease made a man legally unclean to a very high degree: being so offensive, that not only every thing he touched became unclean, but whosoever touched such things was made unclean also. There is little in them that needs any explication; the only difficulty was, to know whether a man laboured under this disease. Which was not wholly left unto his conscience to determine; but his countenance discovered it: the continual flux making a great alteration in the whole habit of his body. For virulent gonorrhœas sometimes last several years (as Tho. Bartholinus saith, he knew one that had it ten years, and was reduced to skin and bone), being frequently accompanied with inflammations and ulcers in the neighbouring parts, from which the filthy humour flows, (Bartholin. Hist. Anatom. Cent. ii. Hist. xxxvi.)

Ver. 5. And whosoever toucheth his bed.] Upon which he hath lain.

Shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water; and be unclean until the even.] Which was the law in other cases, when men had touched an unclean thing, (xi. 23.)

Ver. 6. And he that sitteth on any thing whereon he sat that hath the issue.] Though he did but just sit down, and did it ignorantly; presently rising up again as soon as he knew his error; he became defiled, and might not go to the sanctuary till he was purified, by washing his clothes and himself in water.

Ver. 7. And he that toucheth the flesh of him that hath the issue.] That is, any part of his body.

Ver. 8. And if he that hath the issue spit upon him that is clean, &c.] By the same reason, if he blowed his nose upon him it defiled him.

Then he shall wash his clothes.] i. e. The man upon whom the spittle fell.

Ver. 9. And what saddle soever he rideth upon, &c.] By the same reason that the seat he sat upon was defiled, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 10. And whosoever toucheth any thing that was under him, &c.] Either the saddle, or any thing else that was under him when he rode.

And he that beareth any of those things, &c.] Removeth them from one place to another; though it be to carry them out of the way, that others may not be defiled by them unawares.

Ver. 11. And whomsoever he toucheth that hath the issue (and hath not rinsed his hands in water) he shall wash, &c.] It is somewhat doubtful, whether these words (hath not washed his hands in water) belong to him that had the issue, or to him that his hands touched. Most understand it of the former, that if the man who had an issue touched any other man, and had not first washed his hands, that man whom he touched should be defiled. But the Syriac takes it to refer to the man that was touched by him, who, if he did not immediately wash his hands with water, was to be cleansed after a more laborious manner, by washing his clothes, and bathing himself in water. But I do not see how washing of his hands could cleanse him; when the man that had the issue touched, perhaps, some other part of his body.

Ver. 12. And the vessel of earth that he toucheth, which hath the issue, shall be broken, &c.] That it might not be employed hereafter to any use. (See xi. 33. vi. 18.)

And every vessel of wood shall be rinsed in water.] Such vessels were not broken, but only well washed, because they were not so easily made as the other, and were of more value. There are so many washings prescribed here, and on other occasions, that it is reasonable to believe there were not only at Jerusalem, and in all other cities, but in every village, several bathing-places contrived for these legal purifications, that men might, without much labour, be capable to fulfil these precepts. And one cannot but think that such frequent washings were enjoined, to admonish them how carefully they ought to preserve purity of heart and life.

Ver. 13. And when he that hath an issue is cleansed of his issue.] It having ceased for some time.

Then he shall number to himself seven days for his cleansing.] That there might be sufficient proof made whether the issue was stopped; that is, he was really cured.

And wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh.] In the conclusion of the seventh day.

In running water.] i. e. Spring-water (as we speak), which was most pure. River-water was the same, which comes from springs.

And shall be clean.] So that he might keep company with his neighbours, but not have communion with God at the sanctuary, till after the following sacrifices were offered: for, if in the end of the seventh day, after his washing, the flux returned again, all this labour was lost, and he was to stay seven days more, as Maimonides observes in his treatise on this subject, cap. 3.

Ver. 14. And on the eighth day.] If he continued free from the flux, after his washing on the seventh day, in the evening.

He shall take to him two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.] These were the sacrifices appointed for the meaner sort of people, who were not able to be at the charge of a lamb, or other sacrifices of the flock or herd, (v. 7. xii. 8.) And perhaps the great trouble the man had endured, and given others, while he laboured under this disease, might be considered so far as to put him to as little charge as might be for his purification.

And come before the Lord, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] But not into the court of the Israelites, till his sacrifices were offered.

Ver. 15. And the priest shall offer them, the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering.] As in the case of a poor leper, (xiv. 31.) who was bound also to offer a trespass-offering of greater value.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord, for his issue.] Perfectly restore him to partake of holy things, of which he was debarred while he had his issue. And here it may be fit to observe, that the greater part of all the legal defilements depended upon the seat or place of the Divine Majesty, (as the author of Sepher Cosri speaks, par. iii. sect. 49.) whose presence there made their country be called the holy land, and was the ground of all these injunctions about cleanliness: to which, he thinks, they have no obligations at this day, now that they live in an unclean land (i. e. among us gentiles), and want the presence of the Divine Majesty among them.

Ver. 16. And if any man's seed of copulation.] Though the holy writers speak very plainly of some things, that we think it not so modest to name in that manner; yet it is observable, on the other hand, that in things of the same nature, they use circumlocutions to express them, which we stick not to speak of in blunter words. As when they say, the water of the feet, meaning urine; and call going to stool, uncovering of the feet; which shews that it is nothing but the vast difference of times and places, which makes that language seem uncivil to us, that was not so to them; and, on the contrary, made them very cautious in their expressions, where we think it unnecessary.

Go out from him.] Involuntarily; in his sleep, or otherwise, which the Hebrews call keri, i. e. accidental.

Then he shall wash all his flesh with water, and be unclean until the even.] This was one of the smallest legal pollutions, from which they were soon cleansed without any sacrifice; and which some of them think did not oblige them to wash, unless they intended to go to the sanctuary. But though that opinion be not true, yet this rite had such a respect to the sanctuary, that now they have none, they do not think themselves bound to use it on such occasions.

Ver. 17. And every garment, and every skin, &c.] These things were made so unclean by such accidents, that they might not be used the next day, nor till they were washed.

Ver. 18. The woman also with whom man shall lie with seed of copulation.] It is no wonder the holy writers speak so plainly of these matters, being men of great simplicity, free from all wantonness, commonly far advanced in years; among whom marriage and a numerous issue were accounted the greatest blessings, and therefore coveted by all, and renounced by none.

They shall both bathe themselves in water, &c.] There is no sort of pollution in the act of marriage, which is of God's own institution, but what this law made: and the law made it, as Theodoret thinks, that the trouble of such constant purification after it, might preserve them from the immoderate use of it. So those words of his signify, Κελεύει καθαίρεσθαι, ἵνα κωλύῃ τῆς συνουσίας τὸ συνεχὲς, ἡ περὶ τὴν κάθαρσιν ἀσχολία, (Quæst. xx. in Levit.)

Ver. 19. And if a woman have an issue, and her issue in her flesh be blood.] In the Hebrew the words run much clearer; and a woman when she shall have an issue of blood, and her issue be in her flesh. The latter part of which are added, to distinguish this from bleeding at the nose, or from the hemorrhoids (which did not pollute any body); for the word flesh here signifies, as it doth ver. 2.

She shall be put apart seven days.] From her husband, and from the sanctuary: to which these sorts of uncleanness have a peculiar respect, as I before noted. And Maimonides here, not unfitly, observes, that whereas the Zabii accounted a man polluted if he did but speak with a menstruous woman, or if the wind, which came from the quarter where she was, blew upon him; God only required her not to meddle with holy things, nor to approach to the sanctuary. Otherwise she might eat all manner of common meat, and perform all domestic offices for her husband, as formerly; only not lie with him while she remained in this condition. So he explains this, More Nev. par. iii. cap. 47.

And whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean until the even.] If they were grown persons, as Menochius well observes; for infants were excepted from this pollution, by their age and the necessities of nature. The same is observed by Maimonides, in the chapter forenamed; that the more frequent any of these uncleannesses were, the greater and longer purifications were required. As touching of a dead body, especially of friends and neighbours, being the most usual, it could not be cleansed but by the ashes of the red heifer (which were not easily had), and not till seven days were passed. In like manner, fluxes and menstruous pollutions, because they oftener happened, and were more grievous than touching the unclean, those therefore that laboured under them, had need of seven days' purification; but they that touched them, of one day only, before they became clean.

Ver. 20. And every thing that she lieth upon in her separation shall be unclean, &c.] The very same sort of uncleanness was contracted in this case, as in the foregoing, ver. 4, &c. For if we believe some authors, it might not only be properly called her sickness; but such an one as had some infection in it (at least something offensive) in those hot countries. (See Pliny, lib. vii. 5. and lib. xxviii. 2.)

Ver. 21. And whatsoever toucheth her bed, &c.] This and the two following verses contain the very same prohibition in this case, which were given in the other. (See ver. 5, 6, &c.)

Ver. 24. If a man lie with her at all.] i. e. Unwittingly, not knowing in what condition she was: for if he did it knowingly, both of them were liable to be cut off, (xx. 18.)

He shall be unclean seven days.] As having contracted one of the greatest sorts of uncleanness, (ver. 19.) For though this flux was natural and beneficial, and therefore could have no sort of uncleanness in it but what was made by this law: yet there was a great reason for the keeping men from the company of women in this condition, if leprosies, and such-like diseases, were thereby propagated, as Theodoret says some think; Φάσι γάρ τινες, ἐκ τῆς τοιαύτης συναφείας, καὶ λώβην καὶ λέπραν ἀπογεννᾶσθαι, &c. Especially since they were so libidinous a people (as he describes them, in words of a very bad signification), that it was highly necessary to lay such restraints upon them; and to make even involuntary pollutions very penal, that they might learn ὅτι πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἐναγῆ ἑκούσια, that all wilful uncleannesses were far more detestable.

Ver. 25. And if a woman have an issue of blood many days out of the time of her separation, &c.] As before he spoke of the natural course of the blood, so here of a disease; which Procopius Gazæus calls malum immedicabile, an incurable evil. So it sometimes proved, as appears by the story of the woman in the gospel, whose case this was, (Matt. ix. 20.)

All the days of the issue of her uncleanness shall be as the days of her separation.] She was to be in the same condition with the woman mentioned ver. 19. who was put apart seven days; i. e. as long as her uncleanness lasted. Which made the case of those that laboured under this infirmity very lamentable, because it continued in some many years.

Ver. 26. Every bed whereon she lieth all the days of her issue shall be unto her as the bed of her separation, &c.] Like the bed and the seat of her mentioned ver. 20.

Ver. 27. And whosoever toucheth these things shall be unclean, &c.] As in the case forementioned ver. 21.

Ver. 28. But if she be cleansed of her issue.] Cured of her disease.

Then shall she number to herself seven days.] For a trial whether it was a perfect cure or not.

After that.] If there were no return of the flux.

She shall be clean.] So as to be restored to common conversation: but not to the sanctuary, till the following oblations were made.

Ver. 29. And on the eighth day she shall take unto her two turtles, or two young pigeons, &c.] The same sacrifices which were prescribed in the case of a man who was cured of an issue, (ver. 14.) And this relates only to the extraordinary flux, out of or beyond the usual course of nature, (ver. 25.) for it would have been too burdensome unto some persons, if they had been bound to offer thus once a month.

Ver. 30. And the priest shall make an atonement for her before the Lord, &c.] See ver. 15.

Ver. 31. Thus shall ye separate the children of Israel from their uncleanness.] Take care that they separate themselves; by instructing them, when they are under any of the forenamed impurities, to observe the directions now given. Thus the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin understand these words.

That they die not in their uncleanness.] Lest I punish them with death, if they approach unto my sanctuary, having any of the forementioned uncleannesses upon them.

When they defile my tabernacle that is among them.] This shews what is meant by separation and putting apart in the foregoing verses: which was principally from the tabernacle where God dwelt. Out of respect to which, and to preserve their due regard to it (that is, to God himself), all these cautions were given, as I observed before, ver. 15. of this chapter. And see chap. xii. ver. 4. what I noted out of Maimonides, who discourses excellently on this subject, in his More Nevoch. (par. iii. cap. 47.) where he observes, that there could not well be a more notable means contrived, to maintain a holy fear and reverence to the Divine Majesty upon their minds, than to forbid every person that was any way polluted to come unto his sanctuary. For there were so many sorts of pollutions, made by the law, that it was very hard to avoid falling under some of them: and, consequently, a business of great care, circumspection, and labour, to approach, as they ought, into the Divine presence. For if a man escaped defilement by a dead body, yet he could not easily avoid being defiled by some of the eight creeping things, which he might chance to tread upon; or might fall on his meat, or his drink: and if he escaped these, yet he might be defiled involuntarily by the means mentioned here, (ver. 16.) or by touching a menstruous woman, or one that had a flux of blood; or, at least, by touching their beds, their seats, or something belonging to them, &c. All which kept a man from the sanctuary; which he could not enter therefore when he pleased, but was to stay a certain time before he could be admitted to worship God there; and not then neither, till he had washed himself. "By all which actions, reverence, affection, and devotion, were preserved to the sanctuary; and men were excited to great humility, which in this was principally regarded."

Ver. 32. This is the law of him that hath an issue, &c.] In this and the next verse, he recapitulates the matter of this chapter: as he did in the latter end of the foregoing sum up the contents of that.

Ver. 33. And of him that hath an issue, of the man and of the woman.] Even of the person that hath an issue, whether it be man or woman, &c.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, after the death of the two sons of Aaron.] This chapter would have naturally followed the tenth chapter, where the death of those two persons is related, if that had not occasioned the inserting some other laws about uncleanness, (see preface to chapter xi.) which being delivered, Moses now goes on to give direction about the great sacrifice, in which the whole nation was concerned: as he treated of lesser and common sacrifices in the beginning of the book.

When they offered before the Lord, and died.] See x. 1. This is mentioned again, to make the priests careful, not only to sacrifice unto the Lord alone, but after such a manner as he ordered.

Ver. 2. Speak unto thy brother Aaron, that he come not at all times into the holy place, within the veil.] Into the holy place without the veil, he, or some of the other priests, were bound to go every day, morning and evening, when they offered incense: but into this, as none of them might go at all, so he not at all times, when he went into the other; but only upon one particular occasion, which is mentioned here in this chapter.

Before the mercy-seat, which is upon the ark.] This being the place of God's special presence, none might enter into it but his principal minister; and he no oftener than the Divine Majesty allowed; which was only once a year, (it appears from ver. 29.) when he offered the great sacrifice here prescribed. And so much was intimated to Moses before, (Exod. xxx. 10.) And the Jews add, that on this day of the year he might go in but four times; once to burn incense; a second time to sprinkle the blood of the bullock; then to sprinkle the blood of the goat; and lastly, to fetch out the censer, wherein he burnt incense. If he went in a fifth time, he died for his presumption, as they say; particularly R. Levi Barzel. (Præcept. cclxxxvi.) Such sacred places the gentiles had in some countries, which, according to this pattern, were opened only once a year. Particularly Pausanias mentions, in his Bœotica, the temple of Dindymene: which they thought it was not lawful to open more than one day in the year: Μιᾷ δ' ἐφ' ἑκάστων ἐτων ἡμέρᾳ, καὶ οὐ πέρα τὸ ἱερὸν ἀνοίγειν νομίζουσι. And the same he saith of another, in the same book; and in his Eliaca, of the temple of Orcus, Ἀνοίγνυται μὲν ἅπαξ καθ' ἔτος ἕκαστον, &c. It is opened once every year. (See Dr. Outram's excellent book De Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 3.)

Lest he die.] As his sons had done for their presumption, in offering with other fire than God allowed. In the like danger Aaron himself had been, if he had come into the Divine presence without his leave, and without such caution as is given ver. 13. which is the reason of this order here delivered to Moses, and by him to Aaron, for the prevention of any such dangerous mistake.

For I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat.] That was God's own dwelling-place, where his glory appeared; into which, therefore, none might enter, but when he appointed, and as he directed. The only difficulty is, what is meant by the cloud, wherein he saith he will appear on the mercy-seat. One would think he meant, as usually, the cloud wherein the Divine Glory resided, (Exod. xl. 34, 35.

1 Kings viii. 10, 11.) But the cloud seems to have been on the outside of the tabernacle; and within a glory, or great splendour, only unclouded. And therefore most, I think, understand this of the smoke of the incense, that the high-priest burnt when he entered into the most holy place; which was the cloud wherewith the mercy-seat was then covered, (ver. 13.) And there is great reason for this opinion: for if there had been a cloud in the most holy place, over the mercy-seat, before the high-priest entered, what need had there been to make a new cloud of smoke, (as he is ordered ver. 13.) when the Divine Glory was sufficiently obscured already? Besides, in the place before-mentioned, (Exod. xl.) the cloud, as I now observed, is said to be without the tabernacle, and to cover it; the glory only being within: and in the other place of the book of Kings, (and 2 Chron. v. 13, 14.) it is said only to fill the house of the Lord, i. e. the body of the temple: but not to be settled upon the mercy-seat. Where we may very well doubt whether there was any cloud or not; but only the Divine Glory. The only ground that I can see for it is, that God is said there to dwell in thick darkness: which seems to import, that the Divine Glory was wrapped up in a cloud. But, however that be expounded, these words, which we here translate, I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat, may very well be rendered, I will be approached in a cloud, (i. e. of incense.) For so this word we translate appear is used Exod. xxiii. 15. not for God's appearing to to them, but for the people's appearing before him: and this sense the thirteenth verse seems to enforce, as Campegius Vitringa hath observed, lib. i. Observ. Sacr. cap. 11.

Ver. 3. Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place.] As he might come into it only once a year; so then with such preparation, and in such a manner, as is here prescribed. And the Jews say, that he was separated from his own house and family seven days before, and dwelt apart from them in a chamber of the temple; that he might the better prepare himself for the offices of this day, by sprinkling the blood of the daily sacrifice, burning incense, and such-like things. And lest he should be either ignorant of his duty (as some proved, in the latter end of their state, when the high-priesthood was bought for money), or forgetful, the Sanhedrin sent some to read before him the rites of this day; who adjured him also to perform every thing according to God's command. The night before also they let him eat but little, that no accident in the night might make him unfit to officiate the next day; and that he might awake the sooner, and begin the service of the day betimes, as they did upon all great solemnities. All this, and a great deal more, is related in Codex Joma, cap. 1. And Mr. Selden, likewise, hath observed, out of Sepher Schebat Jehuda, with what a magnificent pomp the high-priest was conducted from his own house when he went to the temple, seven days before this day of atonement, accompanied by the king and the whole Sanhedrin, the royal family, and the whole choir of priests, &c. (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 7.) Something like this was the triumph wherein our blessed high-priest, Christ Jesus, was conducted to Jerusalem, five days before he offered himself there, for the sins of the whole world, (John xii. 1. 12, 13.)

With a young bullock for a sin-offering.] To be offered for himself and for his family, as appears from ver. 6. For no other sacrifice was allowed for the sin of the high-priest (though it were dubious), but only a young bullock, (iv. 2, 3.)

And a ram for a burnt-offering.] Which accompanied the sin-offering at his consecration, (viii. 18.) But first of all the morning sacrifice was offered, with the additionals usual on this day (as the Jews say), viz. a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs, all for burnt-offerings.

Ver. 4. He shall put on the holy linen coat, &c.] There were eight garments belonging to the attire of the high-priest: four of which are here mentioned, which the Jews call his white garments; and four more mentioned Exod. xxviii. 4. which they call the golden garments; because there was a mixture of gold in them; whereas these were all made of fine linen. Upon other days, when the high-priest officiated, he was bound to put them on all (not one of the eight being wanting); but on this day, when he went into the most holy place, he put on only those four, which were the habit of the ordinary priests as well as his. This, some conceive, was in token of humility, because this day was appointed for confession of sins, and repentance, &c. Upon which account they imagine, also, these linen garments were coarser than those which he wore every day with his golden garments. But all the Jews agree, that these garments, which he wore on the day of expiation, were made of the purest and most precious linen of all other: which they call (in Massechet Joma, cap. 3.) fine linen of Pelusium, which was a city in Egypt, famous for the richest and whitest linen, as our Sheringham shews (in his notes on that treatise) out of Pliny and Silius Italicus. And if we may believe the Talmudists, as the high-priest put on fine linen of Pelusium in the morning of this day, so he put on fine linen of India (i. e. in their language, of Ethiopia or Arabia, as Braunius observes, lib. i. de Vest. Sacerd. cap. 7. n. 9.) in the evening of it; which was not of much less value than the other. And this is not disagreeable to Moses, who saith God commanded the priest's garments to be made for glory and beauty, (Exod. xxviii. 2.) And therefore the high-priest appeared, even upon this day, in a splendid and noble habit; which was not inconsistent with inward humility and lowliness of mind; whereby the comely and beautiful performance of God's service was not to be obstructed. For whereas, upon other days, the high-priest washed his hands and his feet in the brazen laver; on this day, if we may believe the Jews, he washed them in a vessel of gold, as the same Braunius observes out of Massechet Joma, cap. 4. There are those who fancy the high-priest went into the most holy place with the ephod and breast-plate, whereon were the names of the children of Israel: but that is quite contrary to what Moses here delivers, who mentions no other garments but these of fine linen which he wore upon this day; no, not when he went into the holy place, (ver. 23.) And the Hebrew doctors all thus understand it, as Mr. Selden shews out of them and Josephus, (lib. ii. de Succession. in Pontific. Hebræor. cap. 7. p. 250.)

Yet the Roman church hath grounded a solemn practice upon the forementioned fancy; the priests, and bishops too, being wont on Good Friday to minister only in the habit of deacons, while they are reading or singing the office of the passion; but when they come to the sacrifice of the mass (as they call it), then they put on richer vestments, proper to their order. Which is a mistaken imitation of the ceremonies under the law, upon this great day of atonement; when the high-priest never put on any of his golden garments for the service of it.

And he shall have the linen breeches upon his flesh.] To cover his secret parts. For the word flesh is to be understood here as in xv. 2.

And shall be girded with the linen girdle, and with the linen mitre, &c.] These two, with the two foregoing, make up the four white garments: which might possibly, as the Jews say, be made of the finest and richest linen that could be got, that the high-priest might appear splendid in the simplest habit wherein he ministered. But it is evident he was not allowed to appear in those garments which were wrought with gold, and scarlet, and blue, and purple, (Exod. xxviii. 6. 8, &c.) because such very sumptuous apparel, it must be acknowledged, was not so suitable to the service of the day. On which the high-priest (as the Hebrew gloss notes upon this place) did not so much put on the person of a patron, as of an accuser; confessing their sins before God, and begging pardon for them.

These are holy garments.] To be used only when he ministered in the sanctuary, (Exod. xxviii. 2.)

Therefore he shall wash his flesh in water, and so put them on.] There was no need, upon other days, to wash more than once, in the beginning of Divine service; but on this great day he washed five times, as oft as he shifted his garments, and went from one ministry to another; as appears in part from ver. 23, 24. where see what I have observed. Here he seems to speak of his washing after he had offered the morning sacrifice, &c. in his golden garments: and then began the service of the day in these white garments alone.

Ver. 5. And he shall take of the congregation of the children of Israel.] The former sacrifices (ver. 3.) were for himself: these for all the people.

Two kids of the goat for a sin-offering.] These two goats made but one sin-offering; which is described more largely and particularly, ver. 8—10. The former, perhaps, which was sacrificed to the Lord, was to procure those good things which they had forfeited by their sins: and the other (the scape-goat, as we translate it) to avert those evils which they had deserved: for the name that is commonly given it by the Greeks, signifies its power to turn away punishments. Or the simple reason of it might be, that the Israelites, by this double sacrifice (for both were presented before the Lord), might be the more fully satisfied of the expiation of their sins. There is the like example before of two birds appointed for the cleansing of a leper's house; one of which only was killed, the other let fly away; but both of them are said to cleanse the house, and to be for atonement, (xiv. 49. 52, 53.) In which some of the ancient fathers thought they saw a notable type of our Lord Christ. Whose sacrifice, as it was prefigured by all the legal sacrifices, (for the paschal lamb itself was a type of him sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. v. 7.) so by this more especially on the day of expiation. Which was of greater and more universal efficacy than all the rest, and therefore represented him more fully than the other did. Insomuch, that these two goats joined in one sacrifice, may be thought to represent one Christ, consisting of two natures. For since it was not possible, as Theodoret expresses it, to adumbrate both the "τὸ θνητὸν, καὶ τὸ ἀθάνατον, that which was mortal, and that which was immortal in Christ; he commanded two to be brought, ἵνα ὁ μὲν θυόμενος, τῆς σαρκὸς τὸ παθητὸν προτυπώσῃ. ὁ δὲ ἀπολυόμενος δηλώσῃ τὸ ἀπαθὲς τῆς θεότητος· that the goat which was offered in sacrifice, might prefigure the passable nature of his flesh: and that which was let go, might shew the impassable nature of his Divinity," Quæst. xxxii. in Levit. And St. Cyril discourses to the same purpose, in his ninth book against Julian.

And one ram for a burnt-offering.] Which was no more than was appointed for Aaron himself, (ver. 3.) who herein is equalled with all the princes of the people; in whose name this ram seems to have been offered.

Ver. 6. And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin-offering, which is for himself.] Not by killing it, which was done afterwards, (ver. 11.) but only by presenting it before God to be sacrificed; which was done with a solemn prayer, wherein he beseeched God to be propitious unto him and his. The form of it is set down in Massechet Joma, cap. 3. sect. 8. He laid his hand upon the head of the bullock, and said, "I have done amiss, and been rebellious, and sinned before thee, I and my house. I beseech thee now, O Lord, remit my rebellion, and my sin which I have committed, and my house," &c.

And make an atonement for himself, and for his house.] For his family, as I said, (ver. 3.) and for all the priests; who are called the house of Aaron, (Psal. cxv. 10. 12. cxxxv. 9.) And I do not see why all the house of Levi should not also be understood; for they are not comprehended under the name of the congregation of the children of Israel (mentioned in the verse before), and therefore must be contained here under the name of the house of Aaron. (See Numb. i. 49.)

Ver. 7. And he shall take the two goats.] Mentioned ver. 5. which were to be of equal stature, of the same colour, and the same price, (as the Hebrew doctors say in Joma, cap. 6.) both designed to the same end, the expiation of their sins.

And present them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, &c.] All the sin-offerings which were made for the congregation, were presented either by the high-priest, or by the elders, (iv. 15.) and by them devoted to God, to be sacrificed on his altar. For this presenting of the goat is the same with his offering of the bullock in the verse foregoing; which was nothing else but his solemn consecration of them, as I said, to be sacrificed. According to which pattern, our blessed Lord and Saviour, a little before he suffered upon the cross, and made himself a sacrifice for us, voluntarily offered himself to die for our sins. Which is the meaning of those words of his, John xvii. 19. where, praying for his apostles, he saith, For their sakes I sanctify myself: that is, offer myself to die as an expiatory sacrifice for them. For that ἁγιάζειν sometimes signifies as much as προσφέρειν, Dr. Outram hath demonstrated, lib. ii. De Sacrificiis, cap. 3. And so St. Chrysostom here expounds these words, I sanctify myself, by προσφέρω σοὶ θυσίαν, I offer thee a sacrifice; or consecrate and devote myself to be sacrificed. And it is not an improbable conjecture of another very learned friend of mine, now also with God (Dr. Spencer), that the appointing of two goats to be both presented to God at the same time, and with the same rites, was to preserve the Jews in a belief that there is but one Principle of all things: who both bestows good things, and inflicts evil. Contrary to the opinion of the gentiles, who made two principles, one good and the other bad; which was the ancient belief of the Chaldeans, and other eastern people, and from them propagated to the Greeks and Romans. Most of whose sacrifices (as another very learned man of our own country hath observed) had respect to these two principles; to one of which they offered in the morning, and to the other at night. See Dr. Windet de Vita Functorum statu, sect. 3. where he observes, that there are plain footsteps of this old error at this day, through all the east, as far as China: for there was an endeavour to infect Christianity with it, by Manes the Persian, in the reign of the Emperor Aurelian; nor was there any heresy that spread so far as this dotage did.

Ver. 8. And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats.] The manner of it is described in the same treatise, Massechet Joma, (cap. 3. sect. 9.) The high-priest went to the east part of the court, on the north side of the altar, having the sagan (his vicar) on his right hand, and the head of the house of the fathers on his left. There stood two goats with an urn or box, which they call calpi, (the very same name which Lucian, and the scholiast upon Aristophanes, give to the same thing, as our learned Sheringham upon that book, and Bochart in his Hierozoicon, have observed.) Into this urn the two lots were cast, which were made of box-wood (as the Misna here says), and in after-times came to be of gold. But Maimonides, in his treatise on this subject, saith, they might be made either of wood or stone, or any metal, provided one of them was not bigger than the other, (nor one of gold, the other of silver, &c.) but both every way equal, as the goats were to be. Upon one of these lots was written the name of the goat which was for the Lord; and on the other that which was for Azazel. And then the priest, shaking the urn, and putting in both his hands, (as it there follows in Joma, cap. 4.) took up a lot in each. And if he brought up God's lot in his right hand, the sagan, who stood there, said, "My lord, lift up thy right hand:" if in his left hand, the head of the fathers said, "Lift up thy left hand." And so the priest let the right hand lot fall upon the goat that stood on the right hand; and his left hand lot upon the other.

One lot for the Lord.] To be offered unto the Lord at the altar.

The other lot for the scape-goat.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, for Azazel; as some have anciently translated it. Now why a goat was offered in sacrifice, and another goat let go free, laden with their sins, rather than any other creature, may be understood, perhaps, from the inclination of the heathen world in those days, when they worshipped demons in the form of a goat. The Egyptians were famous for this, and the Israelites themselves (it appears from the seventeenth chapter of this book, ver. 7.) were prone to offer sacrifices le seirim; which signifies demons in that form. And therefore, to take them off from such idolatrous practices, God ordained these creatures themselves to be sacrificed and slain, to whom they had offered sacrifice. And the young ones he appointed for this purpose (for so seirim signifies), which the Egyptians most of all honoured, and abhorred to offer or kill. So Juvenal:

—— "Nefas illic fœtum jugulare Capellæ."
Sat. xv. ver. 11.

Now from hence, perhaps, it was, that some fancied Azazel signified the devil; as R. Menachem and R. Eliezer among the Jews; Julian among the heathen; and some great men lately among us. Who conceive, that as the other goat was offered to God at the altar, so this was sent among the demons, which delight to frequent desert places, and there appeared often in the shape of this creature. But this will not agree with the Hebrew text, which says this goat was for Azazel, as the other was for the Lord. Now none sure will be so profane, as to imagine, that both these goats being set before the Lord, and presented to him, as equally consecrated to him, he would then order one of them to be for himself, and the other for the devil. We must therefore be content with our own translation, which derives the word Azazel from ez, a goat; and azal, to go away; and fitly calls it the scape-goat: so Paulus Fagius, and a great many others: against which I see nothing objected, but that ez signifies a she-goat, not a he. Which made Bochartus fetch this word from the Arabic; in which language azala signifies to remove, or to separate. And this agrees well enough with the name of this goat, according as the ancient translators understood it; some of which, as Symmachus, render it ἀπερχόμενον, the goat going away: others, as Aquila, ἀπολελυμένον, the goat let loose: and the LXX. ἀποπομπαῖον. In which they had no thought of the notion of this word among the Greeks, who called those demons by this name, who were esteemed ἀλεξίκακοι and ἀποτρόπαιοι (as J. Pollux speaks), averters of evil things from them: but simply meant, as Theodoret interprets it, ἀποπεμπόμενος εἰς τὴν ἔρημον, the goat sent away into the wilderness. And so St. Jerome expounds it, Hircus emissarius, which agrees with the notion which Bochartus puts upon the word out of the Arabic tongue. This goat being sent away into remote places, there to remain separate from the flock to which he belonged; and that upon a mountain (as the Jews fancy) in the wilderness of Sinai, which from this goat was called Azazel: but I see no ground for this.

Ver. 9. And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell.] In the Hebrew the word is, went up; for he first took it up out of the urn, and then let it fall upon the goat.

And offer him for a sin-offering.] Devote him to God to be a sacrifice for their sins: beseech him to accept of this sacrifice for that end. So the word offer, I observe, signifies, ver. 6. order being given afterward for the killing of the goat, (ver. 15.)

Ver. 10. But the goat, on which the lot fell to be the scape-goat, shall be presented alive before the Lord.] This shews that the scape-goat was equally consecrated and devoted to God, as the other was; though not to be killed, but sent away alive; after the other had been offered in sacrifice.

To make an atonement with him.] For this was a sin-offering, though not slain, no less than the other: as appears from ver. 5. which shews these two goats made but one sin-offering; which was partly slain at the altar, and partly let go (as it here follows) to run whither he would; the more perfectly to represent the taking away of their sins, and removing their iniquity, (as the prophet speaks, Zech. iii. 9.) by virtue of this offering for them.

Some, indeed, have thought that this goat was not sacrificed, but only presented alive before God, and so let go; lest it should be thought God could not forgive their sins, unless he was appeased by some slain beast: which imagination was destroyed by letting this sin-offering be left alive, at full liberty to run quite away. But I can see no ground for such a construction; because these were not two but one sin-offering, as I said before: which being slain in part, established that opinion in them, of the impossibility of obtaining reconciliation without a bloody sacrifice. Certain it is, that the whole law supposes this, that without shedding of blood there is no remission, as the apostle observes, (Heb. ix. 22.) And therefore it will be more agreeable to the Holy Scriptures, if we think, as some do, that the first goat represented our Lord in his sufferings, and this other in his resurrection; whereby he was freed from the bands of death: both his death and his resurrection being for our deliverance, as the apostle shews, Rom. iv. ult.

And let him go free.] Whither he pleased. For so the Hebrew word schalac (send him away, or dismiss him), signifies, in Scripture, entire liberty, such as God demanded for the Israelites from Pharaoh, (Exod. iv. 23. v. 1.)

For a scape-goat.] Into remote places.

Into the wilderness.] In token their sins were quite carried away, to be found no more; for the goat was not merely sent into the wilderness, but into the most desert places of it, as appears from ver. 22.

Ver. 11. And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin-offering which is for himself, &c.] This former part of the verse is word for word the same with ver. 6. which shews that offering there (as we translate it) was nothing else but bringing it to be offered; or presenting it before the Lord, to be a sacrifice for himself, and for his family. But now his bringing it was, that it might be killed immediately, as it follows in the latter part of this verse.

And shall make an atonement for himself, and his house.] By killing it, as the next words tell us.

And shall kill the bullock of the sin-offering which is for himself.] He was first to offer for himself, before he could acceptably offer for the people, as the apostle observes, Heb. v. 3. ix. 7. And as the Jews tell us, (in Massechet Joma, cap. 4. sect. 2.) he again put his hand upon the head of the bullock, and made the confession and supplication beforementioned upon ver. 6. And when he had done, then he killed the bullock with his own hands. For though all other sacrifices might be killed by any person, yet the high-priest himself was bound to kill this; as they say in the same place of the Misna, (sect. 3.) And having received the blood of the bullock in a bason, he delivered it to another priest, to keep it in continual agitation, till he had offered incense in the holy place, that so it might not grow thick and be clotted; but be kept liquid and thin, fit to be sprinkled before the mercy-seat.

Ver. 12. And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire.] Which he held in his right hand.

From the altar before the Lord.] From the brazen altar where the bullock was slain: for coals were burning before God no where else but there.

And his hands full of sweet incense beaten small.] With his left hand he took as much of the incense, mentioned Exod. xxx. 34. 36. as his hand would hold (besides the incense which he burnt every morning and evening, which was a whole pound), and put it into a cup.

And bring it within the veil.] With both these, the censer of coals, and the cup of incense (the former in his right hand, the other in his left), he went within the veil, which divided the holy place from the most holy, and set down the censer; and then (as it follows in the next verse, see there) threw the incense upon the burning coals. This the Hebrew doctors take to have been so difficult a work, that, in the Gemara upon Joma, (cap. 1.) they say some of the elder priests were sent to him beforehand, to shew him how he should fill his hand with the incense. And the Misna there says, that they adjured him in these words: "We are the legates of the great Sanhedrin, and thou art our legate and theirs; we adjure thee, we adjure thee by Him whose name dwells in this house, that thou change not any one thing of all that we have said unto thee." And so they parted with tears on both sides. The reason of which solemn adjuration, they say, was, that the Sadducees affirmed, he might burn the incense without the veil, and so enter into the most holy place; directly contrary to this text, which required him to do it within; where nobody could see what the high-priest did, and consequently could not tell whether he performed the service there aright. Therefore they took this oath of him, in the latter ages of their state, when some of the faction of the Sadducees were thrust into the priesthood, as Mr. Selden probably conjectures, (lib. iii. de Synedriis, cap. 11. n. 2.) This was the first time of the high-priest's going into the holy of holies on this great day.

Ver. 13. And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord.] He entered (as the Misna saith in Joma, cap. 5.) with his face towards the south; and so went sideways (for he might not look upon the ark, where the Divine Glory was) till he came to the staves of the ark; where he set down the censer, and put on the incense. And having filled the house with a cloud of smoke, he went out backward (out of reverence to the Divine Majesty), into the holy place without the veil. Where, when he was come, he made this short prayer, "May it please thee, O Lord God, that this year may be hot and also wet; that the sceptre may not depart from the family of Judah, nor thy people Israel want food; and that the prayer of the wicked may not be heard." And then he presently went out of the sanctuary, and shewed himself to the people; that they might not suspect he had done amiss, and miscarried in his office. For so they say it sometimes happened, that the high-priest, having violated these holy rites appointed by God, was struck dead in the holy place.

The incense which was burnt every day in the holy place, at the golden altar, representing the prayers of the saints, as St. John teaches us, (Rev. viii. 3, 4.) this incense, which was burnt in the holy of holies, may well be thought to represent the prayers of the high-priest himself, which he made upon this occasion; as our blessed Saviour did before he offered the great sacrifice of himself (John xvii. of which more hereafter), with the blood of which he now appears in the heavens before God for us.

That the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy-seat that is upon the testimony.] So that nothing of it might be seen: it being the place of the residence of the Divine Majesty, (Exod. xxv. 21, 22.) whose glory was inaccessible.

That he die not.] By gazing on the Divine Glory. (See ver. 2. and Exod. xxxiii. 20.)

Ver. 14. And he shall take of the blood of the bullock.]

Having done what is commanded in the foregoing verses, he came out of the sanctuary, and went to the priest whom he left at the altar of burnt-offering, stirring the blood in the bason, which he delivered to him, (as I observed ver. 11.) and taking it from him, went with it (the second time) within the veil; and standing where he did before, when he burnt the incense, sprinkled it as is directed in the words following.

And sprinkle it with his finger.] The very root or essence of a sacrifice (as the maxim of the Jews is) lies in the sprinkling of the blood.

Upon the mercy-seat.] One would think, by this translation, that he sprinkled the mercy-seat itself, with some of the blood. But all the Jews understand it quite otherwise: and indeed the Hebrew words are al pene, over against the face, i. e. as they interpret it, (in the Misna beforementioned, cap. 5.) towards the mercy-seat. And so it follows in the next words, and before the mercy-seat shall he sprinkle. Only this difference there was in the sprinkling: that this particle al, they think, imported that he was to make the first sprinkling, here mentioned, towards the top of the mercy-seat. The Vulgar Latin wholly omits this part of the verse, and only mentions the latter sprinkling, seven times contra propitiatorium, over against the mercy-seat eastward.

Eastward.] I should have thought the observation of our learned countryman (Mr. J. Gregory) very remarkable, if he had been commanded only to sprinkle the blood eastward. For then there might have been room for his conjecture, that though Aaron at all other times turned his face towards the west (where the most holy place was) and at the very killing of the goat and the bullock, not only looked that way himself, but turned their faces towards the west (as the Jews say in Joma), yet, when he came to perform the chief part of this mystery, he turned his back upon the beggarly elements of the world, and sprinkled this blood eastward, to represent the man, whose name is the East, i. e. Christ. But I do not see how this agrees with this sprinkling the blood before the mercy-seat; which could not be done without looking towards the west. And therefore it must be confessed that he did not sprinkle it eastward: but standing eastward of the mercy-seat, with his face towards it, he performed this office, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 16. p. 426.) Or it may be said to be done eastward, because that part of the ark before which he sprinkled looked eastward.

And before the mercy-seat shall he sprinkle of the blood with his finger seven times.] This is a distinct sprinkling from the foregoing, which was done but once, and towards the upper part of the mercy-seat; but this was done seven times, towards the lower part of it, as the Jews understand it: who say he sprinkled eight times in all, but none of the blood touched the mercy-seat. So the Gemara on that place, and Maimonides in his Jom hakippurim, and Obadiah Bartenoca, whose words are these; "The drops of blood did not come upon the mercy-seat, but fell upon the ground;" as two of our very learned countrymen have observed, Mr. Sheringham upon Joma, and Dr. Outram, lib i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 16. n. 4.

Seven times.] Concerning this number seven, see before, iv. 6. This was the second time of going into the holy of holies upon this day.

Ver. 15. Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering that is for the people.] The blood of which was received in a bason, as that of the bullock was, (see ver. 11.) and he carried it within the veil (as here follows), and did just as he had done before, (ver. 14.) But whether he first burnt incense, as he had done before he brought in the blood of the bullock, is uncertain: it is likely the fume that had been then made still remained; so that there was no need to renew it.

And do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle, &c.] For he stood in the same place (as the Misna observes), and there sprinkled once towards the top of the mercy-seat; and then seven times before the bottom of it. Which is not here expressly said, but is to be understood from what goes before; which orders him to do with this blood as he had done with the other.

This now was the third time of his going into the most holy place upon this day. (See ver. 2.)

Ver. 16. And he shall make an atonement for the holy place.] By the sprinkling beforementioned (both of the blood of the bullock and of the goat, as I gather from ver. 18.) God's own dwelling-place was purified: the blood (which was sprinkled seven or eight times before the mercy-seat) being thrown, it is probable, towards both sides of it.

Because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins.] The many sins whereby they had transgressed God's holy laws, the whole year before, had made them so unclean, that it provoked God to leave them, and made this most holy place unfit for his habitation; unless he were reconciled to them: for it was seated among an unclean people, as the rest of the sanctuary was; and on that score might need an atonement. (See Exod. xxix. 36, 37.)

And so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation.] When he had done all this within the veil, he was to do the same without in the sanctuary: where he sprinkled first the blood of the bullock, and then the blood of the goat, against the veil which parted the sanctuary from the holy of holies. So the Misna in the place forementioned; and R. Solomon Jarchi upon these words; "As he sprinkled part of the blood of both sacrifices, once above, and seven times beneath, in the inward sanctuary; so he sprinkled towards the veil without, once above, and seven times below." For they all agree the blood was not sprinkled upon the veil, but before it: by which sprinkling the sanctuary was purified, as the apostle observes, when he saith, almost all things were by the law purged with blood, &c. (Heb. ix. 21—23.)

That remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness.] Surrounded by a sinful people, who are full of legal, as well as other impurities: and had been likewise defiled by many, who had ignorantly come into it, in their uncleanness. So Maimonides judiciously observes. It could scarce be avoided, but some or other would ignorantly, and some presumptuously offend, by going into the sanctuary, or eating holy things when they ought not: and therefore God commanded this expiation to be made for the pollutions of the sanctuary and its utensils by such means, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.)

Ver. 17. And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place.] During this action none of the priests, who used to attend in the tabernacle, were to come into it, till the high-priest had expiated its uncleanness; which it was supposed to have contracted by their coming into it all the year before.

Until he came out.] Of the holy place.

And have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel.] Finished all that he had to do there, for the expiation of his own sins, and his family's, and all the people's. That is, from the time of his going to offer incense, till he came out to purify the tabernacle. Some of which time he spent in prayer to God, (as I observed ver. 13.) for all the people; as he had done before when he presented the sin-offerings to him; with solemn supplication for himself and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel; the forms of which are extant in their books. In conformity to which, when our blessed Saviour consecrated himself to be a sacrifice for us, (as I noted upon ver. 7.) he first commended himself to God, in that solemn prayer before his death, John xvii. ver. 1, 2, &c. and then his apostles, who were his household, ver. 9, 10. and so forward to the twentieth verse; and then prayed for all that should believe on him; i. e. the whole congregation of Christian people, from ver. 20. to the end. Immediately after which, he went to the place where he was apprehended, and led to be condemned and crucified, John xviii. 1. (See Dr. Outram De Sacrificiis, lib. ii. cap. 3. n. 3.)

Ver. 18. And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord.] These words, before the Lord, seem to restrain this to the golden altar, where incense was offered in the sanctuary: and so I find it is generally interpreted, even by the Jews themselves, (in Joma, cap. 5. sect. 5.) as well as Christians. But the words, he shall go out, plainly signify his coming from the sanctuary, where the golden altar was (and had been cleansed, we may well suppose, together with it, ver. 16.) in the outward court, to the altar of burnt-offering, which was also before the Lord, (Exod. xxix. 11.) though at a greater distance from him: and which, one would think, stood in need to be cleansed, as much as the altar of incense. Now, unless it was ordered to be cleansed in these words, I can see no care taken about it at all. In Exod. xxx. 10. there is express mention, indeed, made of making an atonement upon the altar of incense once a year; and nothing said of the other: and if we will so understand it here, then the words, he shall go out, must have respect to his going into the holy place, mentioned in the verse before.

And make an atonement for it.] This is generally understood, as I said, of the golden altar, because such express mention is made of its purification yearly, in the place now mentioned, (Exod. xxx. 10.) And, no doubt, that which is here commanded was done there, when he made atonement for the table, where it stood: but there being the same need, as I said, to expiate the other altar (where no fewer errors had been committed than here, and which stood nearer to an unclean people, who encompassed it), I cannot but think that it is here included.

And shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the goat.] He put the blood of the bullock and of the goat together; and then poured them into another vessel, that they might be well mingled. For here is no command in this place, that he should go round the altar twice; and tip the horns of it, first with the blood of the bullock, and then of the goat, separate one from the other; as the Misna in Joma observes, cap. 5. sect. 4.

And put it upon the horns of the altar round about.] He began at the north-east corner, and so went to the north-west; and from thence to the south-west, and lastly to the south-east: and as he came near to each corner, he put the blood upon it. So the Jews describe this matter in the same place, sect. 5.

Ver. 19. And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times.] Not upon the middle of the altar, but nigh the corners; viz. in the place where he ended, when he put the blood upon the horns of the altar. So the Jews say in the place abovementioned, (sect. 6.) And I do not see why the particle upon should not be expounded here, as in ver. 15. (if their interpretation be true), to signify, that he sprinkled the blood before the altar; which he did not touch.

And shall cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel.] The Jews refer this cleansing to his taking the coals and the ashes from the altar, that he might sprinkle the blood in a clean place. And then the words are to be translated, He shall sprinkle the blood, &c. having cleansed and hallowed it. But the conclusion of the verse determines us to another sense, which is, that by sprinkling the blood he cleansed and sanctified it, from the uncleanness of the children of Israel, whereby it had been defiled: the priests having either come in their uncleanness thither, or not performed their service as they ought there; and the people thereby remaining in their impurities.

Now, when the high-priest had done all this, the Jews say (in the Misna beforenamed) he poured the rest of the blood of the bullock and goat at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offerings (where, I conceive, he concluded this atonement), for there was a conveyance to carry it away, as I observed upon iv. 17. And they make account, also, that if every thing was not done in this order it was ineffectual, and was to be done over again. For example; if the blood of the goat was sprinkled before the blood of the bullock, (contrary to the directions, ver. 14, 15.) he returned, and sprinkled the blood of the goat after that of the bullock, &c.

Ver. 20. And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place.] Making it fit to continue God's dwelling-place, (ver. 16.)

And the tabernacle of the congregation.] By this, I think, is meant the sanctuary, and every thing in it; particularly the golden altar.

And the altar.] Of burnt-offerings, where he ended his atonement for the whole house of God.

He shall bring the live goat.] Two had been presented to the Lord, (ver. 7. 10.) that is, solemnly consecrated and devoted to be expiatory sacrifices; one of which having been slain, the other was now brought to be made an expiation for sin, after another manner. And he was brought, no doubt, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, where they were wont to lay their hands upon other sacrifices, (i. 3, 4.)

Ver. 21. And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat.] Laying of the hand upon the head of the beast, was a rite used in all sorts of sacrifices, whether burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, or sin-offerings. See i. 4. iii. 2. iv. 4. 33. In which places, mention is made only of laying on his hand: but here the high-priest is commanded to lay on both hands, as he and his sons did in the sacrifice of the bullock and the ram at their consecration, (viii. 14. 18.) The meaning of which was, the more solemnly and entirely to devote the sacrifice to the use for which it was designed; which, in this sacrifice, was to bear all their sins. For they were all laid upon this sacrifice, unto which the punishment of them was transferred: this rite signifies as much as if they had said, Whatsoever we have done amiss, let not us, but this sacrifice be charged with it: that is, let it bear the punishment which we deserve. Such phrases there are, 2 Sam. i. 16. Esther ix. 25. Psal. vii. 16. and other places.

And confess over him.] This must have been understood, if it had not been expressed; for imposition of hands was always accompanied with prayer, of one sort or other, according to the occasion of it. Insomuch, that the Jews say, "where there is no confession of sin, there is no imposition of hands; for imposition of hands belongs to confession." (See Dr. Outram De Sacrif. lib. i. cap. 15. n. 8.) And it is observable, that the high-priest made confession three times on this day. First for himself, and then for his brethren the priests, and now for the whole congregation; saying this prayer, (as they tell us in Joma, cap. 6. sect. 2.) "I beseech thee, O Lord, this people, the house of Israel, have done wickedly, and been rebellious, and sinned before thee. I beseech thee now, O Lord, expiate the iniquities, the rebellions, and the sins which thy people the house of Israel have done wickedly, transgressed, and sinned before thee. According as it is written in the law of Moses thy servant (viz. in the thirtieth verse of this chapter), 'on that day he shall make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.'" Which last word (Lord) as soon as all the priests and the people, that were in the court heard pronounced by the high-priest, they bowed and fell down flat upon their faces, and worshipped, saying, "Blessed be the Lord; let the glory of his kingdom be for ever."

All the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins.] These three words, iniquities, transgressions, and sins, are the very words used by the high-priest in his confession beforementioned; which comprehend all manner of offences, whether committed deliberately or not against negative or affirmative precepts (as they call them). Grotius, in his notes on this place, hath thus distinguished them, but whether exactly or not cannot be determined. But it is probable that sins signify offences committed by error, not deliberately; iniquities, such as were deliberately committed against the prohibiting precepts; and transgressions, those that were deliberately committed against commanding precepts. All, except those to which cutting off was threatened, which were not expiated by any sacrifice.

Putting them upon the head of the goat.] By putting his hand on the head of the goat, and confessing their sins over him (with prayer to God to remit them), they were all charged upon the goat, and the punishment of them transferred from the Israelites unto it. Just as the sins of all mankind were afterwards laid upon our Saviour Christ, (as the prophet speaks, Isa. liii. 6.) "Who his ownself bare our sins in his own body," (saith St. Peter, 1 Ep. ii. 24.) the punishment passing from us to him, "Who was made sin for us," (2 Cor. v. 21.) Which expressions are manifest allusions unto this sacrifice on the great day of expiation: which was the most illustrious figure of the sacrifice of Christ; and shews, beyond all reasonable contradiction, that Christ suffered in our stead, and not merely for our benefit. For it is very evident, the sacrifice offered on this day was put in the place of the people; and all their sins, that is, the punishment of them, laid upon its head. And it appears by the form of all other sin-offerings, which were occasionally offered at other times, that he who brought them put off the guilt, which he had contracted, from himself, and laid it on the sacrifice which was to die for him. Which he did by laying his hand on the head of it at the door of the tabernacle while it was yet alive. Then with his hand so placed, he made a confession of his sins, for which he desired forgiveness by the offering of this sacrifice: that is, he prayed by these rites, that, the beast being offered and slain, he might be spared from punishment; which was a plain transferring the guilt from himself unto his sacrifice. Which being yet alive, and thus laden with his guilt, was then brought to the altar, and there slain for the guilty person: that is, it died in his stead; for there was no other reason of its being put to death there in that manner.

I have insisted the longer on this, because nothing can better explain the true meaning of Christ's dying for us: which was by transferring the suffering due to our sins upon him; as the manner was in the legal sacrifices. Which was a thing, let me add, so notorious in the world, that other nations from hence derived the like custom to that here mentioned by Moses. Particularly the Egyptians, as David Chytræus hath long ago observed, and since him many others out of Herodotus: who tells us, (lib. ii. cap. 39.) that they made this execration over the head of the beast which they sacrificed; Εἴτε μέλλοι ἢ σφισι τοῖς θύουσι, ἢ Αἰγύπτῳ τῇ συμπάσῃ κακὸν γενέσθαι, εἰς κεφαλὴν ταύτην τραπέσθαι· that if any evil was to fall, either on themselves who sacrificed, or upon the whole country of Egypt, it might be turned upon the head of that beast. And this, he saith, was the custom over all the land of Egypt; and the reason why no Egyptian would taste of the head of any animal. Nor was this the notion of the Egyptians only, but of other countries also; who called those sacrifices which were offered for them Ἀντίψυχα, being sacrificed in their stead; and the life of the beast given for theirs. Thus the Greeks sometimes sacrificed men, when some very heavy calamity was fallen upon them, whom they called Καθάρματα, expiations to purge them from their sins, by suffering in their room. For they prayed thus over him, who was devoted every year for the averting evils from them, Περίψημα ἡμῶν γενοῦ, ἤτοι σωτηρία καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις· be thou our cleansing; that is, our preservative and redemption, or ransom. And with these words they threw him into the sea as a sacrifice to Neptune. And thus the Massilienses did, as Servius tells us, (upon the third Æneid.) in time of a plague, praying, "ut in ipsum reciderent mala totius civitatis," that on him might fall the evils of the whole city.

And shall send him away.] As soon as the confession was over, the goat was sent away.

By the hand of a fit man.] By a man prepared beforehand (as the ancients interpret it), or that stood ready for this purpose. Jonathan saith, he was designed for it the year before; others say only the day before; and that the high-priest appointed him: who might appoint any body whom he thought fit; but did not usually appoint an Israelite, as they say in Joma, cap. 6. n. 3.

Into the wilderness.] It is not certainly known what wilderness this was; but the Hebrews call it the wilderness of Tzuk, which, they say, was ten miles from Jerusalem. And they say, that at the end of each mile there was a tabernacle erected, where men stood ready with meat and drink, which they offered to him that went with the goat, lest he should faint by the way. And the nobles of Jerusalem, they add, accompanied him the first mile; further than which they might not go, because this day was a sabbath. After which, they that were in the first tabernacle accompanied him to the next; and they that were there to the third; and so forward to the last; that they might be sure to have this great work done of carrying their sins quite away from them. So we read in the treatise on this subject, called Joma, cap. 6. sect. 4, 5. which Maimonides hath explained, as I have now done.

Ver. 22. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities.] This shews more fully still the nature of this sacrifice, in which all their iniquities, i. e. the punishment of them was laid, that he might carry them away. For this goat was not capable to bear their sins, but only their punishment; as Christ also did, who knew no sin, and yet was made sin; by having the punishment of our sins laid on him. For, that this scape-goat, which was loaded with their sins, was a sin-offering, is plainly said before in this chapter; and consequently represented Christ (who is our sin-offering), as well as the other part of this sin-offering did, whose blood was carried into the holy place. And in some regard this scape-goat was a very notable representation of him; if it be true, that our Saviour entered upon his office, of being the Mediator of our reconciliation with God, upon this great day of atonement, which was the day on which he was baptized, as our Dr. Jackson, together with some good chronologers think. For though the tradition of the western church be, that his baptism was on the sixth of January, yet, as Jansenius, and some others of the Roman communion, do not think fit to follow it, so he judges it more probable to have been on the tenth of September. In the beginning of which month, when the feast of blowing of trumpets was celebrated, (as we read xxiii. of this book, 24.) John Baptist began to lift up his voice like a trumpet, and call the Jews to repentance. Who accordingly flocked to him, and, confessing their sins, were baptized by him in Jordan; where our Saviour also being baptized on the tenth day, which was the day of atonement, and being declared the Son of God by a voice from heaven, was "immediately driven by the Spirit into the wilderness," as St. Mark tells us, i. 12. Which was a manifest indication (he thinks) to John Baptist, that this was the Redeemer of the world prefigured by the scape-goat; who, going into the wilderness on the day of atonement, immediately after the people had made confession of their sins, gave him to understand (who was well acquainted with the meaning of the legal rites) that he was sent by God to take upon himself the sins of the world, and carry them away, by being, in due season, offered to God, and slain as a sacrifice to God for them. And this he did at that very time, when the paschal lamb was killed, (as I have shewn upon Exod. xii. 6.) to the end that they might take notice he was the Lamb of God, whose sacrifice that lamb prefigured: as by being led into the wilderness on the same day as the scape-goat was carried thither, he shewed that the mystery represented by that ceremony was exactly fulfilled in him.

This notion of his I thought good to mention (though, as far as I know, he is singular in it), because it carries some probability in it, if what the apostle saith (Coloss. ii. 17.) be well considered, that the law contained "shadows of things to come, the body of which was Christ." Who was a body consisting of so many different parts, and so complete (as he observes), that no one, nor a few legal ceremonies, could perfectly foreshadow it: but as the ceremonies were many, and almost infinite, so every one did foreshadow some part or piece of this complete body: that is, no remarkable part of it, no special event or action, which concerned our Saviour Christ, but was foreshadowed by some or other legal ceremony: see Christ's Answer to John's Question, numb. 62—64. and his ninth book upon the Creed, concerning the Consecration of the Son of God (which was printed several years after), sect. 4. chap. 24. n. 5—8. where he resumes this argument, and endeavours to answer this question; Why, since Christ was to accomplish the legal priesthood and sacrifice, by his bloody sacrifice upon the cross, he did not offer himself, and die upon this very day of atonement. To which he gives full satisfaction: but it is too long here to be inserted.

Unto a land not inhabited.] So the LXX. translate the Hebrew word gezera, γῆν ἄβατον, a land into which nobody came, or desolate country. The Hebrew word properly imports a land cut off, (as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Hierozoic. cap. 54. par. i.) that is, from habitable countries: not which cuts off what is sent into it, by its rugged and sharp stones, as the Jews expound it. This still sets out the design of this sacrifice, which was to free men so perfectly from the punishment of their sins, that they should not fear the return of them any more. For this goat was not merely sent into the wilderness, but into the most uninhabitable and inaccessible part of it (as the Greek word properly signifies), where none were likely ever to see it again.

And he shall let go the goat in the wilderness.] When he came to the last stage, nobody accompanied him that led the goat any further; but he went the tenth mile alone, by himself; and the men in the tabernacle only stood looking to see what he did with it. And the Misna saith (in the place beforenamed), that he threw it headlong down the rock Tzuk; where, they say, it was broke in pieces before it came to the middle of it; or, as Jonathan said, God raised a storm which blew the goat down with a mighty force. But this is contrary to the very words of Moses, who saith, he was to let the goat go, or dismiss him, in the wilderness, to run whither he would. And it seems contrary also to the intention of this law, which was, that only one of the goats should be killed, the other let go alive. Whereby was represented, that their sins, which were expiated by the blood of the sacrifice, should not return again to be charged upon them. Or, that they were as free from their sins as the leprous person was from his confinement, when the bird was let fly into the fields. Which perfect freedom from the punishment of their sins, was further signified by the burning of the flesh, the skin, and the dung of the sin-offering, without the camp: which denoted that all memory of the sins, for which this expiation was appointed, was clean removed and abolished.

The Jews will have it, that a piece of scarlet cloth being tied upon the horns of this scape-goat (as another was about the neck of the goat which was sacrificed), when the man had brought it to the top of the rock Tzuk, he divided the cloth into two pieces, and let the goat go away with one, but tied the other to the rock, that he might see when it changed colour and became white, as they say it did when the goat was thrown down headlong. Anciently, indeed, they say this scarlet cloth was tied to the gate of the temple, and if it turned white when the goat was sent away (as they pretend it usually did), there was great joy among the people; because it was a sign their sins were forgiven, according to that of the prophet, Isa. i. 18. "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow," &c. But if it did not change its colour into white, they hung down their heads, and were full of sorrow; they looking upon it as a token of God's anger. Which I relate only for this purpose, that I may take notice how the same authors, who tell this story, confess, that for forty years before the destruction of the second temple, that is, from the time of our Saviour's death, this shred of cloth never changed its colour at all. Which, if it be true, was a notable token of the wrath of God coming upon them, for their crucifying the Lord Christ.

Ver. 23. And Aaron shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation.] All that the high-priest did about the scape-goat was performed at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; where he laid his hands upon him, and confessed over him all their sins, (see ver. 20, 21.) which being done, and he having sent the goat away, he is now ordered to come into the sanctuary itself.

And shall put off the linen garments which he put on when he went into the holy place.] See ver. 4. The Jews say there were two sorts of white garments which he wore on this day: one in the morning, which was made of fine linen of Pelusium, which was a third part of greater value than those he wore in the evening, which were of Indian linen. Now here he speaks only of the garments that he wore in the morning, wherein he had hitherto officiated; but is ordered, after he had done all this, to put them off; there being many other things to be still performed upon this day; yea, he was to go once more into the holy place, in order to which he put on other garments; as will appear in what follows.

And shall leave them there.] Never to be used more, either by him, or by any body else. But they were laid up where they were left; and new ones made against the next year, as the Gemara upon the third chapter of Joma relates. And the same is affirmed by Maimonides, R. S. Jarchi, and others, mentioned by Braunius, lib. ii. de Vest. Sacerd. cap. 25. n. 9. R. Levi Barzelonita also gives the same exposition of it, Præcept. 99. and see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. xi. p. 143.

Ver. 24. And he shall wash his flesh with water in the holy place.] Either in the laver which stood in the outward court, or in a room in the tabernacle, which in after-time was called happarvah; where the priest, they say, washed himself upon this day every time he changed his garments. And this agrees well enough with the words of Moses, which here follow, that when he had put on his garments, he should come forth; that is, from this chamber, to perform such offices as are aftermentioned. The end of this washing, in this place, seems to have been, that he might purify himself after he had touched the goat, which bare all their iniquities, (ver. 21.) as the man that carried him into the wilderness was to wash after he had done that business, (ver. 26.) Though others will have it, that it was in token he had now finished the expiation. Certain it is, here is another washing, distinct from that mentioned ver. 4. when he put on the white garments. Which in part justifies what the Misna saith in Joma, cap. iii. sect. 3. that the high-priest washed five times upon this day; all in the house happarvah, except the first; which could not be in the court of the tabernacle, because he was to wash before he entered into it. For there were five ministries to be performed upon this day, at each of which he changed his garments; and between every ministry, when he changed his garments, he washed himself. There is a long discourse about this, and about washing his hands and his feet, in Torah Cohanim, quoted by our learned countryman, Mr. Sheringham, in his annotations upon Codex Joma, p. 57, &c. which they endeavoured to ground upon the very words of this verse.

Now as the leading of Christ into the wilderness, upon the day of atonement, was foreshadowed by the ceremony of the scape-goat; so his baptism on the same day was as expressly foreshadowed, or prefigured, as any event concerning him, either was, or could be, by the legal ceremony here mentioned, of Aaron's washing his body in the holy place. They are the words of Dr. Jackson, in Christ's Answer to John's Question, sect. 64. where he endeavours to make out this.

And put on his garments.] viz. His other garments, wherein he officiated upon other days; which the Jews call his golden garments, to distinguish them from the white garments; which alone he wore when he went into the most holy place. And the Jews call by this name of golden garments, all the eight garments of the high-priest: four of which were common to him with the lower priests, and were made only of linen (yet they never call them by the name of white garments, which they appropriate to those in which he went to the most holy place); the other four, which gave the name to all the rest, were proper only to the high-priest himself; viz. the robe (which had bells of gold at the bottom), the ephod, the breast-plate, and the golden-plate upon his forehead: which being put over the other four common garments, made him appear as if he were all clothed in gold. For they either consisted of solid gold, as the plate on his forehead; or had solid gold appendant, as the robe had; or had gold interwoven, as the ephod and the breast-plate. Now he put on these, after he had put off the linen garments, mentioned ver. 4. 23. which were never used but when he ministered in the holy of holies; where he did not appear with the breast-plate of urim and thummim, and the rest of the golden garments, as some learned men have imagined; particularly Corn. Bertram, in his book de Republ. Hebr. cap. vii. where he saith, "Hujus sacerdotis erat semel in anno adytum sanctuarii adire, indutus ipso ephode." It belonged to the high-priest to go once in the year into the most secret place of the sanctuary, clothed with the ephod. Which is directly contrary to ver. 4. of this chapter. But many other great men have fallen into the same mistake: (see J. Braunius de Vestitu Sacerdot. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 20. n. 29. and cap. 25. n. 9, 10.)

And come forth.] From the place where he put on his golden garments unto the altar of burnt-offerings.

And offer his burnt-offering, and the burnt-offering of the people.] I take this for the daily evening sacrifice, which usually was one lamb; but on this day was two rams, one for himself, and another for the people; unto which there was an additional offering of seven lambs of the first year; as they tell us in Joma, cap. 7. sect. 3. But before this, they there say, he went and read to the people out of the book of the law, which was with great ceremony delivered to him. And he might read either in his pontifical habit, or in his own robes (which he pleased), for reading was no ministry, as the Gemara there observes. This reading began at Numb. xxix. 7, &c. where the sacrifice of seven lambs is ordered upon this day.

And make an atonement for himself, and the people.] Rather, having made an atonement; which was already done by other sacrifices, not by these.

Ver. 25. And the fat of the sin-offering shall be burnt upon the altar.] This also, I think, should be translated in the same manner, having burnt the fat of the sin-offering: which was done, I suppose, in the morning, when both the bullock and the goat were offered for sin, (ver. 11. 14.) but was not mentioned till now, to shew that their sacrifices were not perfected till both Aaron and the people were reconciled to God; after which their burnt-sacrifices were acceptable to him. This burning of the fat was ordered in all sin-offerings, (iv. 8. 10. 26.) and therefore, was not now to be omitted. And, perhaps, it was reserved to be burnt, when the flesh of the bullock and the goat was burnt without the camp, (ver. 27.) which was in the conclusion of all the services of this day.

Ver. 26. And he that let go the goat for the scape-goat.] After the man had dismissed the goat, it was not lawful for him to return farther back than one mile to the last tabernacle, where he was permitted to rest himself after his labour, and not remain all night in the wilderness. So they tell us in Joma, cap. 6. sect. 6.

Shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water.] This goat being a public Κάθαρμα, or purgation, (upon whom all their sins were thrown, was extremely impure; and therefore could not be touched, without rendering the person who led him away unclean in the highest degree: which was the reason that he was bound to wash both his clothes and also his whole body in water, before he could so much as come into the camp. Porphyry observes the same custom among the heathen, who ἐν θυσίαις ὑποτροπαίοις (as his words are), in such kind of sacrifices as those for the averting evils, permitted no man who had meddled with them to come into the city, or to go to his own house, μὴ πρότερον ἐσθῆτα καὶ σῶμα ποταμοῖς ἢ πηγῇ ὑποκαθῆρας, who had not first washed his clothes and his body in some river, or in spring-water, (lib. ii. περὶ Ἀποχῆς, sect. 44.) For nothing is more known than that such a kind of purification for washing themselves, was a custom all the world over; and continues to this day in the eastern, or other hot countries, not only among the Mahometans, but the pagans, who plunge themselves three times, one after another, into their rivers, rising up with their faces to the east, as all travellers into those parts tell us.

And afterward come into the camp.] Have free conversation with his brethren, and, I suppose, without any farther ceremony, be admitted to the sanctuary.

Ver. 27. And the bullock for the sin-offering, and the goat for the sin-offering.] Mentioned ver. 11. 15.

Whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place.] Of which we read in the same place, ver. 14, 15.

Shall one carry forth.] But first they were ripped up, and the imurim, as they call them, (mentioned in iv. 8, 9.) taken out, to be burnt upon the altar. And then the priest dissected them, (as the Misna saith in Joma, cap. 6. sect. 7.) not to pieces, as was wont to be done in burnt-offerings, but made only deep incisions, letting the parts hang still together; which being done, four men, saith R. Solomon, carried them forth upon two staves or bars, one being not able to do it: and accordingly the LXX. translate these words ἐξοίσουσι, they shall carry forth. But one person, it is likely, had the principal care to see them burnt; which is the reason he only is mentioned.

Without the camp.] Into a clean place, where the ashes were wont to be poured out, (iv. 12.) There were three camps; (as I noted before, xiii. 46.) the camp of the people, unto which Jerusalem answered in aftertimes; the camp of the Levites, unto which answered the mountain of the house (as they called it), the whole circuit about the temple; and the camp of God, or the sanctuary with all its courts, unto which answered the temple and its courts. So Maimonides, in his treatise called Beth Habbechira, cap. vii. Now, as these sacrifices were carried to be burnt without the camp of the people, when they were in the wilderness, so they were burnt without the city of Jerusalem, after the temple was built there.

Which illustrates the words of the apostle, Heb. xiii. 10, 11, &c. where he takes it for granted, as a thing they all knew, that Jerusalem answered to the camp of Israel: and from thence shews, that the mystery prefigured by this goat, whose blood was brought into the holy place to make atonement (as he speaks in this verse), was accomplished in our blessed Lord and Saviour, who, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate, as the apostle there observes: that is, without the city, yet near the suburbs of Jerusalem; whose type or figure was the camp of the Israelites in the wilderness.

And the intent of the apostle in this, and other such-like observations, was to shew, that our Saviour's sufferings on the cross were a most true and proper sacrifice; a sacrifice fully satisfactory for the sins of the world: or rather, more satisfactory for all the sins of men against the moral law of God, than the sacrifices on the day of atonement, the Passover, or other anniversary solemnities, were for sins merely against the law of ceremonies: as the apostle shews in the foregoing part of that epistle, (Heb. ix. 13, 14.)

And they shall burn in the fire their skins, and their flesh, and their dung.] Here, it is plain, there was more than one who carried the bodies of these beasts without the camp; they being too heavy for any single person to bear. And they burnt them entirely: (see iv. 11, 12.) except what was offered upon the altar. Yet Josephus is pleased to except τὰς ἐξοχὰς, by which he seems to mean their rumps, (lib. iii. cap. 30.) In which he forgot himself: for though these were comprehended under the imurim of some sacrifices, (see viii. 3.) yet neither here, nor in the fourth chapter, ver. 8, 9. is there any mention of this fat; nor is it comprehended under the fat mentioned above, (ver. 25.) which the Misna in Joma says, was the fat of the inwards only.

Ver. 28. And he that burneth them.] The Vulgar Latin, I think, rightly translates it, Quicunque combusserit, whosoever burneth them: for there was more than one, as I said before, employed in this business.

Shall wash his clothes, &c.] Being defiled by touching the sacrifices, which were charged with so many sins; as he that carried away the scape-goat was, ver. 26. where there is the very same order in the same words. Now, when all this was done, the Misna saith, (cap. vii. Joma, sect. 4.) the high-priest washed himself again, and put on his white robes, which were proper to this day; and went into the most holy place, to fetch out the censer, with the dish, or cup, which he carried in when he went to burn incense, (ver. 12, 13.) And when he came out from thence, he washed, and put on his golden garments, and offered incense upon the golden altar, and trimmed the lamps. Which being done, they brought him his own garments, which he wore constantly; and when he had put them on, they accompanied him to his house, where he entertained his friends with a feast, being come out of the sanctuary in peace; that is, safe and in health. For by shifting his garments, and washing so often, he was in danger to catch cold (as we speak), and they did sometimes fall into various diseases upon this occasion, as P. Cunæus observes out of Maimonides, lib. ii. de Repub. Heb. cap. 14. and some died in the holy place, not having performed the service duly. Which made it very reasonable, that he and his friends should rejoice, when he returned in health and safety.

Ver. 29. And this shall be a statute for ever unto you.] Till the coming of Christ, in whom all that these sacrifices signified was accomplished: who put an end therefore to this legal dispensation, (see Exod. xii. 14.)

And in the seventh month.] When they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth, and thereby had the more liberty to attend such a solemn service. Which was the reason, perhaps, why there were more solemnities appointed in this month, than in any other month in the year; as appears from the twenty-third chapter of this book. It had been anciently also the first month in the year, being the month, it is likely, wherein the world was created: but upon the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, the month Abib, by God's special command, was ordered to be the first. Yet not absolutely, but only in respect of that which was most eminent, viz. for the ecclesiastical account: for as to their civil or temporal affairs, the seventh month (Tisri) still retained the precedence.

On the tenth day of the month.] The Arabians imitated this; calling the fast of the tenth day of the month Moharram, by the name of Ashura; which is exactly the Ashor (tenth day) here mentioned by Moses; from whom these people derived it, before the appearance of Mahomet: who, finding the Jews, when he came to Medina, fasting upon this day Ashura, asked them the reason of it: who told him (as the Mahometan writers report) it was in remembrance of Pharaoh's being then drowned in the Red Sea: whereupon he said, I have more to do with Moses than you, and thereupon commanded his followers to fast on this day; (see Dr. Pocock upon Abal-Farajius concerning the Manners of the Arabians, p. 309, 310.) But this is plainly an idle tale, invented by him or his followers; for the Jews would rather have feasted, than fasted upon the day of such a deliverance. But it shews that this day was remarkable among the Jews, and solemnly observed by them, wheresoever they were; and was chosen by God, rather than any other day of the month, (if we may believe Maimonides, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43.) because it was the day on which Moses came down from the mount, with the second tables in his hand, and proclaimed to the people the remission of their great sin, in worshipping the golden calf; in memory of which it was ordered to be entirely a day of repentance and of Divine worship.

Ye shall afflict your souls.] By fasting and abstinence, not only from all meat and drink, but from all other pleasure whatsoever: insomuch, that they might not wash their faces, much less anoint their heads, nor wear their shoes, nor use the marriage bed, nor read (if their doctors say true) any portion of the law, which would give them delight: for example, the story of their coming out of Egypt, and leading them through the Red Sea, &c. so far is the Mahometan story from having any colour of truth. It is likely, also, that to increase their grief they rent their clothes (as they did in other fasts in aftertimes), put on sackcloth, girded it close to their flesh, sprinkled ashes on their heads, &c. which were all intended, no doubt, to work in them an inward sorrow for all their sins, with a hearty abhorrence of them, and resolution to mortify and abstain from them. For though the word soul be generally expounded the sensitive part of us, which is afflicted by fasting, (as the prophet Isaiah expounds this phrase, lviii. 3. 5.) yet it is absurd to think that God was pleased with this alone, without that inward compunction of mind, which made them break off their sins by righteousness; which the prophet there declares was the only acceptable fast to the Lord.

The Hebrew doctors here observe, that they did not afflict little children on this day, by making them fast from all food, till they were of the age of eleven years; but only taught them what they were to do when they came of age, that they might be accustomed to the precept. (See Joma, cap. 8. sect. 4.)

And do no work at all.] Not only abstain from all pleasure, but from all labour whatsoever: nothing being to be done upon this day but confession of sins and repentance, as Maimonides expresses it in the place beforementioned.

Whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you.] The Hebrew word ezrach is extant only here and xxiii. 42. which signifies as much as one that had his original among them, being born an Israelite, as it is there expressed. The opposite to which is gher (a stranger, we translate it), one that was of another nation, but had embraced the Jewish religion, and lived among them; who in the New Testament is called a proselyte.

Ver. 30. For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you.] If upon this day they afflicted and humbled their souls (as Conr. Pellicanus glosses), with fasting and prayer and anguish for their sins, with alms also, beseeching God's mercy with tears and signs in sackcloth and ashes; resting from all servile works, and devoted wholly to the Lord.

To cleanse you.] From all the transgressions and sins mentioned ver. 16. from which both the high-priest, and his family, and all the people were to be purged on this day. For which reason the greatest care was to be used to see it rightly observed, because all their happiness depended upon it. For the land of Canaan was promised them, upon condition that they kept the law; offering all the sacrifices therein prescribed; especially this great sacrifice, which was to cleanse them from the guilt of all their neglects or breaches of this law. Which should teach us Christians to conclude, that as the inheritance of that good land was assigned the Jews in consideration of their sacrifices, as the condition of that covenant, by which they were prescribed; so the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven is made over to us by the covenant of grace, in consideration of the obedience and sufferings of Christ Jesus, of which they were a figure. For it is his blood that cleanseth us from all unrighteousness (as St. John speaks), and secures our claim to the heavenly inheritance.

That ye may be clean from all your sins.] If a man was bound to offer sacrifice for any sin that was certain, he was not excused from it by this sacrifice on the day of expiation; but was bound to make that other sacrifice also. But the day of expiation freed those who were bound to offer sacrifices for dubious offences. So Maimonides saith, (in his treatise of Offences committed through Error, chap. 3. sect. 9.) that those sins which were known to none but God, were taken away by this solemn day of expiation, without any other sacrifice. But the Misna, in the last section of Joma, acknowledges very honestly, that the day of expiation did not purge men from the guilt of the offences they had committed against their neighbour, unless they first gave him satisfaction.

Before the Lord.] Who dwelt among them, and would continue to do so, if they observed his laws, and took care to be thus cleansed from all their sins. But, lest any man should mistake this matter, it may be here fit to observe, that there were no sacrifices at all appointed by the law of Moses for capital offences; and therefore when he speaks here of making them clean from all their sins upon this day, such as these (for instance, murder, adultery, idolatry, &c.) are not included: for this great sacrifice could not obtain a pardon for them, but only for offences committed against the ritual laws contained in this book; and that also when they were committed through error or ignorance: for if they were done presumptuously, cutting off was threatened to them: (see Numb. xv. from ver. 22. to 32.) And this appears plainly from the sacrifices themselves that are here appointed; which had no virtue in them from their own worth and value, but only from God's institution, to make expiation for any sin. For the death of a bullock or a goat was not of such account with God, that it could prevail for the taking away of guilt, unless he had given it such a power. And that power which he was pleased to allow unto them, was neither infinite, nor could it be so. For the guilt that they were principally designed to abolish, was not of such a nature as to require such an expiation: it arising from things which were neither good nor evil in themselves; and therefore could not create such a guilt. Such were all the uncleannesses from certain natural fluxes, from touching a dead body, and innumerable other such-like impurities: which depending wholly upon the will of God, who by a positive law made such things to bring men under a guilt; by the same will he appointed a proportionable expiation of it by these sacrifices, whose power to cleanse depended also purely upon his pleasure. And if they had any virtue to purge men from the real guilt of sins committed against the eternal laws of God; this they had not of themselves, but from the most gracious will of God, who was pleased to apply to this purpose the future satisfaction of the immaculate Lamb of God, of which these sacrifices were a shadow and type. For a body being prepared for the Son of God, and he offering himself for us, that was a sacrifice of such infinite value in its own nature, that it expiated all manner of sins of all men. To this effect, that excellent person Joh. Wagenseil discourses, in his confutation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 488.

Ver. 31. It shall be a sabbath of rest unto you.] In the Hebrew the words are a sabbath of sabbaths, i. e. a great or perfect sabbath, like that of the seventh day in every week; on which they might do no manner of work. And so the seventh day is called just as this is, a sabbath of rest, or sabbath of sabbaths: (see Exod. xxxi. 15. xxxv. 2.) which gave occasion to those jeers we meet withal in Martial and others, at the Jews' fasting on their sabbath-days: for reading Moses's books carelessly, they fancied the Jews observed as strict a fast upon every sabbath-day, as they did on this, which was but once a year.

And ye shall afflict your souls by a statute for ever.] See ver. 29.

Ver. 32. And the priest whom ye shall anoint, &c.] The high-priest, who should be anointed and consecrated in his father's stead (when he was dead), is here ordered to make this atonement yearly. That is, what was now done by Aaron, was to be done by every high-priest successively, when he was legally put into his office; by vesting him with the priestly garments, anointing him, and offering the sacrifices of consecration, (viii. 7. 10. 22.)

This statute confined the sacred work of this day to the high-priest, who alone could perform it: but it shews withal, as the apostle observes, the great imperfection of this legal priesthood, which could not, by reason of death, continue always in one person: but there were many priests, succeeding one another in the office, which became often vacant. Whereas our great High-priest, because he continued for ever, i. e. never dies, hath an unchangeable priesthood: and therefore is able to save to the uttermost, or evermore, those that come to God by him, (Heb. vii. 23—25.)

And shall put on the linen clothes, even the holy garment.] He was to take a special care not to officiate on this day in any other garments but those mentioned ver. 4. which were peculiarly appropriated to this service, and called the white garments; which were a figure, perhaps, of the perfect purity of our great High-priest, who, as it there immediately follows, (Heb. vii. 26.) is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners.

Ver. 33. And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, &c.] In this verse he only sums up the whole duty of the day; in which a general atonement was made, for all things, and for all persons. The only thing to be observed is, that the expiation of the sanctuary, the tabernacle, and the altar, preceded the expiation of the priests and of the people, who were to be expiated by the sacrifices offered there. But the expiation of the high-priest himself, who was to make the expiation of the sanctuary, preceded all the rest; as is apparent from ver. 11.

Ver. 34. And this shall be an everlasting statute.] The repetition of this the third time, (see ver. 29. 31.) shews of how great importance it was, that this annual solemnity should be observed.

Unto you.] The high-priests (beforementioned), of whom he speaks in the plural number, because none of them could continue always, (as I have observed ver. 32.) but enjoyed the office successively, upon the death of their predecessors.

To make an atonement for the children of Israel, for all their sins, once a year.] This is only a repetition of what was said ver 30. that it should be incumbent on the high-priest, by a perpetual obligation, to make an atonement for the people's sins on this day; as it was incumbent on the people (ver. 29.) to afflict their souls upon this day.

And he did as the Lord commanded Moses.] The service of this day was immediately performed by Aaron, according to the forenamed order.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After he had ordered the great anniversary sacrifice, in the foregoing chapter, he gives some directions about other sacrifices, for which there would be occasion every day.

Ver. 2. Speak unto Aaron and his sons, and all the children of Israel.] Who were all concerned in what follows; and therefore this command is directed to the whole house of Israel, (ver. 3.) to whom this was delivered, it is likely, by their elders: or else Moses himself went from tribe to tribe, and spake to their several families.

And say unto them, This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.] Enjoined by a special law.

Ver. 3. Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat.] viz. For a sacrifice or offering, (as it follows ver. 4.) these being the only creatures of the herd and the flock that were permitted to be brought to God's altar. There are those, indeed, who think Moses speaks of killing these creatures for common use; which it was lawful for them to do any where, after they came to the land of Canaan, (Deut. xii. 15.) but now they were not to kill them for their food, unless they brought them to the door of the tabernacle, and there first sacrificed some part of them to the Lord, before they tasted of them themselves. By which their sacrificing to demons was prevented, (to which they were prone, ver. 7.) and they also constantly feasted with God while they dwelt in the wilderness. But this is better founded upon Deut. xii. 20, 21. where it is supposed that they had thus done, while they remained in the wilderness; and were so near to the house of God, that they might easily bring thither every beast they killed for ordinary use. But they were dispensed withal as to this, when they came into Canaan, and could not possibly, when they had a mind to eat flesh, go so far as to the tabernacle or temple, which was many miles from some of them. Instead whereof, they were bound to come at the three great festivals, and appear before God at his house, wheresoever they dwelt.

In the camp, or that killeth it out of the camp.] This seems to shew that he doth not speak of killing these beasts, ad usum vescendi, as St. Austin's words are, for the use of eating (for that they did not do out of the camp, but in their tents), but de sacrificiis, he speaks concerning sacrifices. For he prohibits (as he goes on) private sacrifices, lest every man should take upon him to be a priest, &c.

Ver 4. And he bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer an offering unto the Lord.] In ancient time every man had performed the office of a priest in his own family: but now that liberty is taken away, because they had abused it to idolatry: and every man was bound to bring his sacrifice to the house of God, where none but the sons of Aaron could officiate, and had the most sacred obligations on them to offer only to the Lord. The very heathens themselves, in future times, found it necessary to enact the very same; as appears by Plato in the latter end of his tenth book of Laws, where he hath these memorable words: Ἔστω νόμος ὅδε τοῖς ξυμπᾶσι κείμενος ἁπλῶς, ἱερὰ μηδὲ εἷς ἐν ἰδίαις οἰκίαις ἐκτήσθω. Let this be a law imposed absolutely upon all, that no man whatsoever have a sacred place in private houses; but when he hath a mind to offer sacrifice, let him go to the public temples, and deliver his sacrifice to the priests, whether men or women, οἷς ἁγνεία τούτων ἐπιμελής, whose business it is to take care that these things be performed in a holy manner. By which it appears, that these were two established principles of religion in wise men's minds, to sacrifice publicly, and to bring their sacrifices to the priests, who were to take care to offer them purely. Unto which Moses adds one thing more, that their public sacrifices should be offered only at one place: which was a most efficacious preservative from all strange worship; nothing being done but under the eye of the ministers of religion, and the governors of the people. Insomuch that St. Chrysostom (as our learned Dr. Spencer observes, lib. i. de Rit. et Leg. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 4. sect. 1.) calls Jerusalem, which was afterwards established to be this place, καθάπερ τινὰ σύνδεσμον λατρείας, a kind of bond or knot, whereby the whole nation was tied to the Judaical religion.

Before the tabernacle of the Lord.] Before the Divine Majesty, which dwelt in the tabernacle; round about which they all inhabited, and were so near it while they travelled in the wilderness, that, as there was no trouble in bringing all their sacrifices thither, so they knew certainly whither to go. And thus the Hebrew doctors observe it was when they came into Canaan; where, while the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh, none might sacrifice any where else: but when it wandered uncertainly (after Shiloh was destroyed), being sometimes in Mispeh, sometimes at Gilgal, and at Nob, and Gibeon, and the house of Obed Edom, they fancy it was lawful to sacrifice in other places. For so we find Samuel did, 1 Sam. vii. 9. ix. 13. (where he sacrificed in a high place), xi. 15. xvi. 2. and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. and Elias, 1 Kings xviii. 23. But these may be thought extraordinary acts, done by an immediate warrant from God; for none of these persons were priests, but prophets guided by Divine inspirations. (See Dr. Outram lib. i. De Sacrific. cap. 2.)

Blood shall be imputed unto that man; he hath shed blood.] He was to be punished as a murderer; that is, die for it. For to have blood imputed to a man, in the Hebrew phrase, or to be guilty of blood, is to be liable to have his blood shed, or to lose his life. Which, as of old it was the punishment of every one who killed another man, (Gen. ix. 6.) so here he is condemned to die who sacrificed any where but at the tabernacle.

And that man shall be cut off from among his people.] This, not another punishment (unless we suppose it relates to his posterity), and therefore the first word should be translated, not and, but for. And the meaning either is, that the magistrate should pass the sentence of death upon him, or God would destroy him himself. The latter sense is most probable, because he threatens (ver. 10.) to execute vengeance with his own hand, upon him that was guilty of eating blood. It is thought, indeed, by some, that cutting off doth not signify death; but, as in other places of this book, cutting off is so evidently joined with death, that so little cannot be meant by it, as depriving such persons of the privileges of God's people, (for instance, when any offered his children to Moloch, xx. 2—5. or did not afflict his soul on the day of atonement, xxiii. 29, 30.) so here in this place it most certainly signifies the putting him that was guilty of this crime to death; because he was to be punished as a murderer. Which severe penalty was enacted in this case, to preserve the Israelites from idolatry. For if they had been permitted to offer sacrifice where they pleased, they might easily have forsaken God by altering the rites which he had ordained; nay, by offering to strange gods: particularly to the demons, which, in those days, frequented the fields, and endeavoured to persuade the ignorant that they were gods, as seems to be intimated in the next verse and ver. 7.

Ver. 5. To the end.] Or, for this cause; i. e. to avoid that heavy punishment beforementioned.

That the children of Israel may bring their sacrifices.] Or, shall bring: as the Vulgar Latin translates it (regarding the sense more than the words), "Ideo sacerdoti offerre debent," &c. Therefore they ought to bring to the priest their sacrifices, &c.

Which they offer in the open field.] Where the pagans erected their altars, to procure fruitfulness to their fields. Insomuch that Libanius saith (in his oration ὑπὲρ ἱερῶν), that the temples, or holy places, were the very soul or life of the fields: Ψυχὴ γὰρ, ὦ βασιλεῦ, τοις ἀγροῖς τὰ ἱερά. And that in them lay the hope of the husbandmen: καὶ τοῖς γεωργοῦσι ἐν αὐτοῖς αἱ ἐλπίδες. How old this idolatry was, we cannot certainly tell; but it continued a long time among the Israelites, as we learn from the prophet Jeremiah, xiii. 27. and Hosea xv. 11. where he saith, "Their altars were as heaps in the furrows of the field:" that is, there were abundance of them, notwithstanding this early prohibition given by Moses. And among the gentiles, Festus tells us they offered sacrifices to the terrestrial gods, in terra, upon the very ground (according to the Hebrew phrase here, on the face of the field), but to the infernal gods, in terra effossa, in holes or pits digged in the earth; and to the celestial, in ædificiis a terra exaltatis, in buildings exalted above the earth; i. e. upon altars: which had their name from hence, ab altitudine, from their height, as both he and Servius also tell us. And every one knows that they delighted to set them in high places, on the tops of mountains and hills; especially where there were groves and shady trees, under which they set them, even in valleys, and in the highways, fields, and meadows. For they were so fond of them, that those who were against erecting of temples to their gods (as Zeno was), yet never sacrificed without altars, which they set in the open air, to signify they believed he whom they worshipped could not be circumscribed.

Even that they may bring them unto the Lord.] Or, they shall bring them even unto the Lord: who had settled his habitation at the tabernacle, and would be worshipped no where else with sacrifices.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation unto the priests.] Here seems to be another reason why they were not permitted to offer in the field; because God would have none but the priests (men appointed by himself to attend for this purpose at his house) to offer sacrifices to him, according to the rites he had prescribed.

And offer them for peace-offerings unto the Lord.] Upon these words Nachmanides grounds the forenamed opinion, that whilst the Jews continued in the wilderness, they ate no meat at their own private tables, but what had been first offered to God at the tabernacle. Behold, saith he, God commanded that all which the Israelites did eat should be peace-offerings. Which was afterwards altered when they came to Canaan, and lived remote from the house of God. And such a custom prevailed among the gentiles, who would not sit down to eat at their tables till they had offered bread and wine unto their gods. Thus it was among the Chaldees, as appears from Dan. i. 8. But then they had many altars every where, even in their own private houses. Whereas here in the wilderness there was but one altar, which could not contain all the fat that was to be burnt on it every day, if we suppose the Israelites to have commonly killed beasts for their own eating. It seems to be the truer opinion, that they seldom or never did that while they were in the wilderness; but all the beasts they killed were for sacrifice, of which Moses here speaks. So R. Levi Barzelonita, (Præcept. clxxxvii.) and other Jewish doctors; they are here forbidden to offer a sacrifice to God any where without the tabernacle. He mentions indeed only peace-offerings; but the reason is, because they were most common; being offered not only for all the mercies they had received, but for all they desired to obtain from God; as Abarbinel observes upon the seventh chapter of this book, where the several sorts of them are mentioned. Men were more forward also to bring these offerings than any other, because they were to have their share of them, and feast upon them.

Ver. 6. And the priest shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the Lord at the door of the tabernacle.] This depends upon the foregoing command of offering all their sacrifices at the tabernacle; that so the blood might be sprinkled upon the altar (and poured out at the bottom of it, as it is required in other places of this book), and not kept together in a vessel, or a hole in the ground, as the manner of the ancient idolatry was, when they offered their sacrifices in the field, and sat about this blood, and feasted upon the flesh of their sacrifice. So Maimonides saith the custom of the Zabii was, (More Nevochim. par. iii. cap. 46.)

And burn the fat.] So the manner was in all sacrifices: which is said also to be for a sweet savour unto the Lord, (see i. 8, 9. iii. 3. 5. iv. 35, &c.)

Ver. 7. And they shall no more.] It seems by this they had been guilty of other idolatrous practices, besides that of worshipping the golden calf, (Exod. xxxii.) And so much is expressed Deut. xxxii. 17. And it was a sin of which their fathers had been long guilty, especially in Egypt, (Josh. xxiv. 14. Ezek. xx. 7. xxiii. 2, 3.) which they had not left, but continued in the wilderness, (Amos v. 25.)

Offer their sacrifices unto devils.] These words shew the reason why God commands them, under such a heavy penalty, to offer only in one place at the tabernacle; because, while they sacrificed in the open fields, they had been in danger to be seduced by demons, who were wont to frequent those places (especially in deserts), and present themselves to ignorant people as if they were gods, and entice their devotion towards them. Which demons, or evil spirits, appeared, it is likely, in the form of goats; and therefore are here called seirim, which properly signifies goats. And hath made some imagine, that they really sacrificed to these creatures, as some of the Egyptians did, who held goats be be sacred animals. So Diodorus tells us, (lib. ii.) Τὸν δὲ τράγον ἀπεθέωσαν, &c. they deified a goat; upon the same account that the Greeks worshipped Priapus. Herodotus, in his Euterpe, cap. 46. saith the same of the Mendesii, who, he saith, worshipped the males more than the females. And many other authors mentioned by Bochartus (in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 53.) report the same. But I question whether the Egyptians were guilty of such idolatry in the days of Moses. Nor is there more truth in their opinion, who think the Israelites now worshipped images in this form of goats. Which the LXX. seem to have thought, when they translated it τοῖς ματαίοις, to vain things, as idols are called in Scripture. And yet this very word, seirim, is by the Greek translators rendered Δαιμόνια, Isa. xiii. 21. which we here follow; only instead of demons translating it devils: whom the ancient Zabii worshipped, they appearing to them in the form of goats; and this custom was universally spread (as Maimonides thinks) in Moses's time, which was the cause of this precept, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.)

And, indeed, nothing is more common in the writings of the ancient heathen, than the mention of fauns and satyrs, and ægipanes, whose shape below was that of a goat. And to this day, in the solemn conventions of witches, the chief devil that presides in their assemblies, is said, by all that have examined such matters, to have the form of a goat. And our famous countryman, Alexander Hales, in his discourse upon the scape-goat, (which is in his Summa, par. iii. q. 55.) derives the reason of it from the frequent appearance of demons in this shape in the wilderness; as Mr. Selden observes in his Prolegomena to his book De Diis Syris. They that would see more of these seirim, may consult I. G. Vossius, lib. i. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 8. and Bochartus's Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 7.

There is one, indeed, (Anton. Van Dale) who hath lately endeavoured to explode all these fancies, as he esteems them, of demons: which he would have to be the mere invention of the ancient Chaldeans; and from them derived to other nations. But he will never be able to make any wise man believe, that the world was so sottish as to worship the images of goats (which he takes to be meant by seirim), if there had not been an appearance of something in that shape which they accounted Divine.

After whom they have gone a whoring.] i. e. With whom they have committed idolatry. For this sin was justly called by the name of whoredom, ever after they were solemnly contracted and espoused to God, to be his peculiar people. (Exod. xix. 5.) Which is the reason that he is said so often to be a jealous God, (particularly Exod. xx. 5.) highly incensed, that is, at their worshipping other gods besides him. For this and such-like words are never used but concerning idolatry; which Ezekiel describes as the foulest whoredom, (xvi. 22.) and particularly mentions this whoredom with the Egyptians, ver. 26. and the Assyrians, ver. 28, &c.

This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout all generations.] These words seem to me to determine the sense of the foregoing precept, to which they relate, (from ver. 2, &c.) not to be, that all the meat they killed for their own tables should be peace-offerings; for that, all confess, was not a statute for ever (if it were one at all) throughout all generations; but only while they were in the wilderness.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt say unto them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you.] These words also shew he speaks in the foregoing of bringing all sacrifices whatsoever to the tabernacle; the same law which was given before to the Israelites, being now extended to all strangers that sojourned among them. By whom he means all such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion. So the LXX. here translate it; and they add the very same words to ver. 3. where the house of Israel is only mentioned in the original Hebrew. The only question is, what sort of proselytes are here intended? And I take it he speaks of the proselytes of righteousness (as the Jews call them), who were circumcised, and thereby embraced the whole religion of Moses. And this, I find, is the general opinion: though some few learned men contend, that any stranger, who had renounced idolatry (whom they called a proselyte of the gate), might bring his sacrifices to the altar. Which one can hardly allow, (though asserted by so great a man as Grotius, lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 16.) because he speaks of the same strangers here, which are mentioned ver. 10. where all such strangers are forbidden to eat blood. Which plainly belongs to such strangers as were become Jews by circumcision: for other strangers might eat it, as appears from Deut. xiv. 21. where the Israelites are allowed to sell what died of itself to a stranger, that he might eat it if he pleased: and such creatures had their blood in them.

That offereth a burnt-offering or sacrifice.] i. e. Any other sacrifice besides burnt-offerings, viz. sin-offerings, or trespass-offerings, or peace-offerings. None of which were accepted, but from such as were admitted into the Jewish religion: though the pious gentiles, the Jews say, might bring burnt-offerings.

Ver. 9. And bringeth it not to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the Lord.] As he ordered their peace-offerings to be, ver. 4, 5.

Shall be cut off from among his people.] This demonstrates, that the foregoing precept and this belong to the same matter; being enforced with the same penalty, (ver. 4.) And it also shews, that the strangers beforementioned, signify such gentiles as were circumcised: for otherwise they were not of the body of the people of Israel, from which they are threatened to be cut off, if they did not observe this law.

Ver. 10. And what man soever he be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you.] See ver. 8.

That eateth any manner of blood.] This is forbidden before, iii. 17. and repeated again, vii. 26. (see both those places), where it is explained what blood he means; either of birds or beasts. Nothing is said of fishes, because they were not offered at the altar, and have little blood in them: nor is there any direction given any where how they should be killed. It is said, indeed, in this place, that they should not eat any manner of blood; but the meaning seems to be, neither of blood offered at the altar, nor of beasts killed for their own use: or else it is to be limited as before, to the blood of beasts and birds, (ver. 13.) for fishes were not at all considered. And here the reason is added why they should not eat blood (which was not mentioned in the forenamed places), because it was the life of the beast, and was therefore reserved to make atonement for their souls.

I will even set my face against that soul, &c.] That is, be extremely angry with him, and severely punish him, by cutting him off (as it here follows) from the body of the nation. Maimonides observes in the forenamed place, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.) that this is the same expression which is used against him that offered his children to Moloch, xx. 3. and that this phrase is never used in Scripture concerning any other sin, but only these two, idolatry and eating blood. For the eating of blood gave occasion (he shews) to one kind of idolatry, in the worshipping of demons: whose food the ancient idolaters imagined the blood was; by eating of which their worshippers had communion with them. (See Psal. xvi. 4. and Grotius there.)

Ver. 11. For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls, &c.] Some think here are two distinct reasons against eating of blood: but the words, as they lie in the Hebrew, may well be translated, Because the life of the flesh (of any beast, that is) is in the blood, therefore I have given it to you (or, appointed it for you) upon the altar, to make an atonement, &c. Which is as much as to say, the life of the beast lying in the blood, I have ordained it to expiate your sins, that by its death, in your stead, your life may be preserved: and, therefore, I require you not to eat that which is appointed for so holy an end. For it would have been very unseemly if they had vulgarly used that to which they owed the favour of God and their very lives.

Nothing could be more rational than this precept, viz. that a thing so sacred, as to be peculiarly appointed for them upon the altar, should not lose that honour and esteem that was due to it. As the blood would have done, if it had been allowed to be commonly eaten; for that is very contemptible which goes into the draught (as our Saviour speaks), and at last becomes ordure.

For it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul.] The blood, that is, of the sacrifices, which by God's appointment are offered to expiate your sins; that is, to preserve you from perishing. For to make an atonement, and to be a ransom, are the very same thing; as appears from Exod. xxx. 12. compared with ver. 15, 16. And to be a ransom, is to deliver from death, as appears from the words in that place—they shall every man give a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, that there be no plague among them. For the sins of the sacrificer being laid upon the beast which he offered, by imposition of his hand on its head, and confessing them there, they were taken away by the blood of that beast, unto which they were translated. And that not merely by the obedience of him that offered the sacrifice (which the followers of Socinus say God accepted), but by the blood of the sacrifice itself, as these words expressly declare, which was offered in his stead. Thus Theodoret upon these words; God commanded the soul of the irrational creature, with its blood, ἀντὶ τῆς σῆς, &c. to be offered, instead of thy rational and immortal soul. And thus the Jews themselves understand it; particularly Aben Ezra, upon these words, saith, the soul, instead of the soul; i. e. the soul of the beast was offered instead of the soul of the man. And R. Solomon Jarchi to the same purpose; one soul comes, and makes expiation for another soul. And Maimonides more largely; I have spared the soul of the man, and given this blood upon the altar; that the soul of the beast may make expiation for the soul of the man. And so Abarbinel, and many more, which may be seen in Dr. Outram's most learned book De Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 22. n. 11.

Ver. 12. Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood.] What other reason soever there was before for not eating blood, (see Gen. ix. 4.) this is the reason why God forbade it to the children of Israel; and to all that joined themselves unto their religion.

Ver. 13. And whatsoever man there be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, which hunteth and catcheth any beast or fowl that may be eaten.] Though no other beasts or fowls be mentioned but those that were taken in hunting (that being a very common thing in those days), yet the precept extends to all those that were bred at home, and were allowed by the law for their food. So a MS. author, mentioned by J. Wagenseil, in his annotations upon Sota, cap. 2. excerpt. Gemara, n. 6. where he puts abundance of cases upon this subject.

He shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust.] Though it was not the blood of a sacrifice offered at the altar, but of a beast or bird killed for their own use, they might not eat it, but bury it in the ground; lest any beast should lick it up, as it is commonly interpreted. Maimonides hath found a deeper reason for this, which is, that nobody might meet and feast about it. By which means Moses broke their society and fellowship with demons; who, in those times, were thought to feed upon the blood, in a bowl or hole, whilst their worshippers sat about it eating of the flesh. So he writes in the place often beforementioned, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.) And this was the more necessary while they remained in the wilderness, because demons were wont to haunt such places, and there appear; but not in cities or habitable places. (See Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. p. 201.) If a man, therefore, saw his neighbour kill a beast, and neglect to cover its blood with dust, he was bound to go and do it himself; because God speaks here unto the children of Israel, i. e. to all of them, (ver. 12.) as R. Levi Barzelonita glosses, Præcept. clxxxv. And the forenamed MS., mentioned by Wagenseil, saith, they covered the blood with this form of benediction; "Blessed be the Lord our God, the King of the world, who hath sanctified us with his precepts, and commanded us to cover blood." Which shews they thought this a precept of great weight.

Ver. 14. For it is the life of all flesh, &c.] Whether of beasts or fowl beforementioned: and therefore prohibited to be eaten by them (as was before observed), because it was offered to God, and accepted by him for their life, when they had forfeited it by their sins.

Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh.] See ver. 12. where the same thing is said, but not so fully as here: for he only saith in that verse, No soul of you shall eat blood: but in this, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh.

For the life of all flesh is the blood thereof.] This is so often repeated (no less than three times in this verse), the more to deter them from eating blood: which was the life of the beast, and therefore offered to God, as the Lord and Giver of life; and consequently belonged to nobody else.

Ver. 15. And every soul that eateth that which dieth of itself.] And consequently had the blood remaining in it; as all things, also, which were not rightly killed had (the Hebrews think), and therefore here forbidden.

Or that which was torn with beasts.] Which was nothing else (as Maimonides speaks) but the beginning to be a dead carcass, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 48.)

Whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger.] By a stranger, is meant one that had embraced the Jewish religion: for other gentiles might eat such things. Nay, the Israelites themselves (as Maimonides observes), when they went to war, and entered the countries of the gentiles, and subdued them, might eat that which died of itself, or was torn of beasts; nay, swine's flesh, and such-like food, when they were hungry, and could find no other meat. (See Schickardi Mishpat Hamelek, cap. 5. Theor. 18.)

He shall both wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, &c.] When he had eaten these things unwittingly, and came to know it, he was thus to purify himself. If he did it knowingly, it was a high crime against an express law, repeated more fully Deut. xiv. 21. and punished, as some think, with death. But I suppose they mean he was obnoxious to the Divine displeasure, and in danger to be cut off by him, if he did not offer a sacrifice to expiate his offence: which seems to be allowed in such cases, as it was for greater offences, (vi. 1, 2, &c.) And the Jewish doctors say, he who violated this law, was only to be beaten: for cutting off, either by the hand of God, or the court of judgment, was not threatened to sins of so light a nature as this. So Maimonides observes in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 16. But if he wash them not, nor bathe his flesh, he shall bear his iniquity.] Be liable to be punished by God, for the neglect of the means of his purification. And if while he continued thus unclean, he adventured to eat of the peace-offerings, he was in danger to be cut off from his people, (vii. 20.)

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It is not said, when the Lord delivered these laws to Moses; but it is likely after the other, and before those that follow.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] They were all concerned in these laws about marriage; and therefore they are directed to the whole body of the people: who received them, I suppose, by their elders and heads of the tribes, to whom Moses delivered them, and charged they should be communicated to every family and household. (See xvii. 2.)

I am the Lord your God.] I have a right to give you laws (being your sovereign, upon more titles than one), to which all human customs must yield, though long practised, and spread every where in the world. This reason is mentioned six times in this chapter; and oftener in the next. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 3. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do.] The manners of these two countries (of Egypt, wherein they had dwelled a long time; and of Canaan, wherein they were going to settle) they were in the greatest danger to imitate: especially in taking the liberty of making such marriages as they saw practised among them, against which they are here severely cautioned. But though these words seem to have a particular respect to those marriages, yet Maimonides extends them to all their other practices, for which they could see no reason: magic being in much use among them, in dressing their trees, and ploughing their ground, and such-like common things: in which they had a respect also to the disposition of the stars of heaven, which led them to the worship of them; as he shews at large in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37. R. Levi Barzelonita also extends these words to the customs of all other nations, (Præcept. cclxii.) which he that observed was to be beaten. But the doings, or customs, which Moses here speaks of, seem to be those that follow, ver. 6, 7, &c. as appears from ver. 24, &c. And the other customs of those nations, about their clothes, and cutting their hair (which the forenamed author mentions), are forbidden in other places.

Neither shall ye walk in their ordinances.] The Hebrew word chukkoth, which we commonly translate statutes, and here ordinances, seems to import that the incestuous marriages here mentioned were allowed by the laws and constitutions of those countries; which made their wickedness the more intolerable, (ver. 24.)

Ver. 4. Ye shall do my judgments, and keep my ordinances, to walk therein.] Frame your lives according to the laws and rules which I give you to observe; and not according to their wicked practices, which were grown into customs and precedents. The Gemara Babylonica, mentioning these words, saith, it is a tradition of their doctors, that by mishpatim (which we translate judgments), are to be understood such natural laws as all mankind are bound to observe, though there were no written commands for them: such as those against idolatry, and those about uncovering the nakedness of such near relations, as are here mentioned, and murder, &c. And by chukkim (ordinances, or statutes), such laws are meant as depended only on the pleasure of God; and obliged none but those to whom they were given: such as those about meats, and garments, and leprosy, &c. Against which, lest any one should object, it is here added, I am the Lord your God.

I am the Lord your God.] I, who am your sovereign Lord; and, by redeeming you from the Egyptian bondage, am become, in a special manner your God, have ordained these things. Therefore let no man dispute them, or make a question of them, as the forenamed Gemara expounds these words. See Selden, lib. i. de Jure N. et G. cap. 10. p. 122. where he observes, that the laws called statutes are, in their language, such as depend only on the royal authority.

Ver. 5. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments.] Observe the laws beforementioned. For the word we here translate statutes, is the same with that translated ordinances in the foregoing verse.

Which if a man do, he shall live in them.] Not be cut off; but live long and happily, in the enjoyment of all the blessings which God promised in his covenant with them.

I am the Lord.] Who will faithfully keep my covenant, and fulfil my promises, (Exod. vi. 3.)

Ver. 6. None of you.] In the Hebrew the words being isch, isch (as much as to say, man, man), that is, no man; the Talmudists take it as if he had said, neither Jew nor gentile. For all mankind, they say, are comprehended under these laws about incest. Nay, the very Karaites (or those who adhere only to the Scripture, and reject a Talmudical exposition) are of this mind, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. i. de Uxore Heb. cap. 5. But the Talmudists themselves do not all understand this matter alike. For some of them think all the gentiles (at least those who were under the dominion of the Israelites) were bound to refrain from all incestuous marriages; to which death is threatened by the law. But others of them think they were concerned only in those six things which were unlawful before the law of Moses was given. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1. and cap. 11. p. 596, &c.) But the ancient Hebrews give a good reason for all these laws, as Grotius observes, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5. sect. 13. n. 2.

Shall approach.] Some of the Jews have been so rigorous, as to expound this word, as if it bound them not to have any familiarity with the persons afternamed, (R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. clxxxviii.) which is against all reason and natural affection. The plain sense is, they should not approach, or come near to them, for the end afterward mentioned, viz. to uncover their nakedness. Nay, this very phrase is used for the same thing, Gen. xx. 4. without the addition of uncovering their nakedness.

Any that is near of kin to him.] It must be confessed, that these words near of kin do not sufficiently express the full sense of the Hebrew phrase; nor are they of a determinate signification: for a man may be near of kin to a woman, who is not the remainder of his flesh, as the Hebrew phrase is: that is, so near of kin to him, that nothing comes between them. This is properly the nearness of flesh here spoken of; she that is immediately born of the same flesh that a man is, or she out of whose flesh he is born; or she that is born out of his flesh; that is, in plainer words, a man's sister, mother, or daughter. These are a man's own immediate relations; which the Karaites call the foundation and root of all that is here forbidden, as Selden notes, lib. i. Ux. Hebr. cap. 2. For the sake of whom the rest here mentioned are prohibited, having a nearness of flesh to them, viz. his father or mother's sister; his granddaughter, and his niece. For the best explication of this phrase, is the express particulars mentioned by God himself in this place.

To uncover their nakedness.] To have carnal knowledge of her, as the Scripture modestly speaks in other places. For nakedness in the holy language signifies the secret parts, which natural modesty teaches all civilized people to cover; and not to reveal them to any but those whom they marry. Therefore not to uncover the nakedness of the persons here named, is properly, not to take them in marriage; and much less to have knowledge of them without marriage. Answerable to this is the name of a virgin whom the Hebrews call alma, which is as much as covered, clothed, or veiled: because those parts were never exposed to any one, but those to whom they were espoused and joined in marriage.

I am the Lord.] By my authority, who am your sovereign, and the sovereign of the world, these laws are enacted: and I will punish those that break them.

Ver. 7. The nakedness of thy father, or the nakedness of thy mother, thou shalt not uncover.] It is commonly thought by interpreters, that the particle we translate or, is here as much as that is, (for so it signifies in some places, particularly 1 Sam. xxviii. 3.) So that the latter part of the verse is only an explication of the former, and makes them but one prohibition, against a man's marrying his mother. And this, indeed, the next words seem to imply, she is thy mother; who bare thee, and therefore not to be taken to be thy wife, much less to be otherwise known by thee. But we may as well think, that the nakedness of the father and of the mother are both here mentioned, to shew neither the daughter might marry her father, nor the son his mother; and consequently, that in all the following particulars, women were concerned just as men were; though the men be only mentioned. And under the name of father and mother are comprehended grandfather or grandmother, or other progenitors before them.

She is thy mother, thou shalt not uncover her nakedness.] This is the very first prohibition; it being a going back in nature for a man to marry his mother. Which, though it was practised in those days by the Canaanites, and Egyptians, and by the Persians also, in aftertimes, and some other eastern countries, yet in the western part of the world (as Mr. Selden observes) such marriages were nunquam non execranda, execrable in all ages, (lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11. p. 601, &c.) Such were the marriages of Œdipus with Jocasta, of Nero with Agrippina, Pelopeia and Thyestis her father, of whom Ægistus was born; which every body detested. (See Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 5. sect. 2.) For the law of nature was against such marriages, notwithstanding the practice of persons, nay whole nations, whom God gave up to πάθη ἀτιμίας (as St. Paul shews), dishonourable affections, for their other sins; especially for their forsaking him, and falling to idolatry.

Maimonides gives this as the general reason of prohibiting this, and all the following marriages: because the persons here forbidden to be so joined together, are all, in a manner, such as are wont to live together in the same house (for so fathers, mothers, children, brothers, and sisters do), who might easily be tempted to lewdness one with another, if even marrying together were not severely forbidden. And thus the LXX. translate the words of the foregoing verse; none of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, πρὸς οἰκεῖα σαρκὸς, or, as other copies, πρὸς οἰκεῖον σαρκὸς, to those that are so near of kin, that they usually dwell in the same house; as parents and children; brothers and sisters; and the brothers and sisters of our parents. Mahomet, as lewd and impudent as he was, had not the boldness to control these laws; but, in the fourth chapter of his Alcoran, expressly forbids his followers to marry their mothers, their mothers-in-law, &c. and a great many of the rest which here follow.

Ver. 8. The nakedness of thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover.] That is, of a step-mother. Such was the incest of Reuben with Bilhah, (Gen. xxxv. 22.) and of Absalom with the wives of his father David, (2 Sam. xvi. 21, 22.) and of Antiochus Soter with Stratonice; who, abhorring from such a conjunction, was taught that all things were honest that pleased the king. But the thing itself is so hateful, that the very naming it is a condemnation; and therefore it is all one with the prime natural law, which prohibits the conjunction of parents and children. "For she that is one flesh with my father (as a great man speaks), is as near to me as my father, and that is as near as my own mother. As near, I mean, in the estimation of law, though not in the accounts of nature; and, therefore, though it be a crime of a less turpitude, yet it is equally forbidden, and is against the law of nature, not directly, but by interpretation," (book. ii. chap. 2. Ductor. Dubitantium, rule iii. n. 29.)

It is thy father's nakedness.] He having known her, it was not permitted the son to have her also. Nay, the Jews say, if the father had only espoused her, it was not lawful for the son to have her to wife; or if he had divorced her, it was not lawful for the son to have her, even after he was dead. (See R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cxci. Buxtorf. de Sponsal. p. 16, 17.)

Ver. 9. The nakedness of thy sister.] As the nearness of flesh (mentioned ver. 6.) above a man, is his mother; and below him, is his daughter: so, on the side of him, is his sister.

The daughter of thy father.] Though she were begotten by his father of another wife, not of his mother; yet he might not marry her.

Or the daughter of thy mother.] Born of her by another husband, not by his father.

Whether she be born at home, or born abroad.] Be legitimately born in wedlock; or illegitimately, out of wedlock; as the Talmudists expound it: see Selden, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 10. p. 591. where he observes, that though the Egyptians (as Philo and others report), with such-like nations, thought the marriage of brothers and sisters to be lawful, and it was practised also in Greece; yet the greatest men in the western countries condemned such marriages; which some of the Greek philosophers also disallowed: and Euripides himself called barbarous, even when it was practised. Insomuch, that in after-ages this wicked custom was quite abolished; and that before Christianity was well settled among them. For Sextus Empiricus saith, that in his time it was utterly unlawful: see there, cap. xi. p. 603. 605, &c. where he shews the Romans always abhorred such marriages; nay, it was late before the Persians took up this abominable custom, after the example of Cambyses: who being in love with his own sister, as Herodotus relates, (in his Thalia, cap. xxxi.) and having a mind to marry her, which was never practised before in that country; he commanded the royal judges (as he calls them), who were the interpreters of the laws, to advise whether he might lawfully do it, or not: who, to please him, and yet not seem to give an illegal opinion, answered, νόμον οὐδένα ἐξευρίσκειν ὃς κελεύει ἀδελφεῇ συνοικέειν ἀδελφεὸν, &c. That they could find no law which permitted a brother to marry a sister: but there was a law, that the Persian king might do even what he would. (See Grotius, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5. sect. 13.)

Even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover.] It shall be unlawful to thee to marry any of the forenamed sisters. For though the marriage of brother and sister was necessary in the beginning, when God created but one man and one woman, by whose children the world was peopled; yet, when it was so, there was great reason that it should be made utterly unlawful, as many have demonstrated; particularly Bishop Taylor, in his Ductor. Dubitantium, book ii. chap. 2. rule iii. n. 24, 25, &c. "For now it is next to an unnatural mixture (as he speaks), it hath something of confusion in it, and blending the very first partings of nature, which makes it intolerably scandalous and universally forbidden; for if it were not, the mischief would be horrible and infinite."

Ver. 10. The nakedness of thy son's daughter, or of thy daughter's daughter, even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover.] This law concerns a man's grand-daughter, by his son or his daughter, whether legitimately or spuriously begotten, as R. Levi Barzelonita expounds it, (Præcept. cxciii.) Who adds, in the next precept but one, this is another prohibition, thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy daughter; which (saith he) is not expressly mentioned in this law, because it was not necessary. For a man's grandchildren, either by sons or daughters, which are more remote, being forbidden, there was no need to say it was unlawful for him to marry his own daughter.

For theirs is thy own nakedness.] They have their original from thy nakedness. For which reason some of the Jews extended this to those descendants which were still farther off, as a hedge to this law. So R. Levi calls it, in the place forenamed. The ancient Romans also (as our Mr. Selden shews) were very strict in restraining the marriage of men with their nieces, either by their brothers or sisters, and with others mentioned in the following laws of Moses, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, &c. cap. 11. p. 605, &c.

Ver. 11. The nakedness of thy father's wife's daughter, begotten of thy father (she is thy sister), thou shalt not uncover her nakedness.] This prohibition, seeming to be the same with that, ver. 9. some of the Hebrews have expounded this concerning the daughter of a mother-in-law begotten by another father. For the words may be thus translated, as Mr. Selden observes the order of them will bear, (lib. i. de Uxore Heb. cap. 4.) The nakedness of the daughter of thy father's wife (for she that is born of thy father is thy sister) thou shalt not uncover. And with this the Greek and several other versions of the Bible agree, who make the prohibition of the wife's daughter to end before he speaks of his own sister. And it is the sense of the principal men among the Karaites, as he shews, cap. 6. But this is against the constant sense of the Hebrew doctors, who say it is lawful to marry the daughter of a mother-in-law which she had by another husband; for there is no nearness of flesh at all between these two. And therefore, as in the ninth verse, the marriages of all brothers and sisters, in general, are forbidden; so here, more particularly, the marriage with a sister by the same father, though not by the same mother: which was necessary to be expressly forbidden; because, before the law, the sons of Noah thought it lawful to marry a half-sister (as we speak) by the father's side, though not by the mother's. (See Buxtorf. de Spons. et Divort. p. 15, 16.) And this was the ancient law of Solon among the Athenians, that they might marry ὁμοπατρίους, their sisters by the same father, but not ὁμομητρίους, their sisters by the same mother; as Joh. Meursius shews in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 18. And if the one of these had not been in so many words prohibited, as well as the other, the Jews might still have continued in that practice, which was usual before the law. (See Sam. Petitus in Leges Atticas, p. 440.)

Some are of the opinion, that, in the ninth verse, the son of a second venter is forbidden to marry the daughter of the first: and here, the son of the first venter, to marry the daughter of the second. And others fancy, that the sister here meant is one that was adopted by his father.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy father's sister.] And it made no difference whether she was his father's sister legitimately or illegitimately begotten by his grandfather; as R. Levi Barzelonita represents the opinion of the Hebrew doctors, (Præcept. cxcvii.) Such marriages also were prohibited by the ancient Romans, as Mr. Selden observes in the place forenamed, (lib. v. cap. 11. p. 605.) though before the law of Moses they are supposed to be lawful; for it is commonly thought that his father Amram married his aunt Jochobed, (Exod. vi. 20.) and therefore no wonder it was practised in other countries, who were not acquainted with this prohibition: particularly at Sparta, where Herodotus saith (in his Erato, cap. lxxi.) Archidamus their king married Lampito, who was sister to his father Zeuxidamus, δόντος αὐτῷ Λευτυχίδεω; Leutichydes (who was father both to her and to Zeuxidamus) giving her to him in marriage.

She is thy father's near kinswoman.] So near, that as he could not be permitted to marry her, so his son also, who was not but a little farther removed from her, was forbidden to touch her. And by the same reason that a man might not marry his aunt, an uncle might not marry his niece. Which, though practised among the Romans after Claudius married Agrippina, till the time of Constantine; yet it was a new thing, as Claudius himself acknowledges in Tacitus, ("Nova nobis in fratrum filios conjugia," lib. xii. Annal. marriages with our brother's daughters are new things with us.) And all he could say for it was, that it was common in other nations, "nec lege ulla prohibita," and not forbidden by any law. And indeed the newness of it so frightened Domitian, that he would not venture upon it; nor did many use it. Which shews that this law had some foundation in nature; which made those men cautious about such marriages, who had nothing else to guide them. Or, at least, there had been such a long custom against them, in the western part of the world, that men, who were otherwise very bad, would not help to alter it.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister: for she is thy mother's near kinswoman.] There is the same reason for this, as for the former prohibition: the aunt, by the mother's side, being as near to a man, as his aunt by the father's.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy father's brother.] This is explained in the next words, thou shalt not approach to his wife: that is, not marry thy uncle's wife. And therefore much less might an uncle marry his brother's daughter: as Herodotus tells us Darius married Phrataguna, the daughter of his brother Atarnes, who gave him all his estate with her; and Leonides, king of Sparta, married Gorgo, the daughter of his brother Cleomenes. See lib. vii. (called Polymnia) cap. 224. and 239.

She is thy aunt.] By such near affinity, that marriage is forbidden with her, as well as with an aunt by consanguinity, (v. 12, 13.) In which the ancient Romans also were very strict, as our Selden observes in the place abovenamed. And it made no difference, whether he were only espoused to her, or had after marriage divorced her, or was separated by death: or whether he was his father's brother legitimately, or spuriously, as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. cxcix. and cc. Where he notes, that though the father's brother's wife be only mentioned, yet the mother's brother's wife is also prohibited. This is repeated xx. 20.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy daughter-in-law: she is thy son's wife, &c.] Though only espoused to him; and therefore much more when solemnly married; as the same R. Levi explains it, Præcept. cci. where he hath the same observation as before; that if she was afterward divorced, he might not marry her: and that it is probable the wife of a bastard son is prohibited; for he is his son; though a child by a slave, or a stranger, is never called a man's son.

Ver. 16. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife, &c.] Unless he died childless; for in that case the next brother was bound to marry her, (Deut. xxv. 5. see Buxtorf. de Spons. p. 25. and Grotius in Matt. xiv. 4.) Much less might a man marry his brother's daughter (as was before noted), who was nearer to him, and of his own flesh. Which was so much abhorred by the ancient Romans, that Claudius Cæsar durst not celebrate his marriage with Agrippina, till he had got a decree of the senate for it, "Quo justæ inter patruos, fratrumque filias, nuptiæ etiam in posterum statuerentur:" which made the marriage of uncles with their brother's daughters to be lawful for the future: which hitherto had been without example. So Tacitus relates in the forenamed book of his Annals, (cap. 5.) where he saith, notwithstanding this decree, there were none found, but only one man, who desired such matrimony; and most thought he did it to gain Agrippina's favour: "Neque tamen repertus est, nisi unus, talis matrimonii cupitor," &c.

man and her daughter.] If a man married a widow that had a daughter, it was a wicked thing to marry that daughter, either while her mother lived, or after she was dead.

Neither shalt thou take her son's daughter, nor her daughter's daughter, to uncover her nakedness.] To preserve them from this, the Jews added, as a hedge to this law, a prohibition to marry the grand-daughters of such daughters, as R. Levi Barzelonita tells us, (Præcept. ccv.)

For they are her near kinswomen.] Of such consanguinity with her (from whom they directly come), as makes it very criminal in him that is one with her to marry them.

It is wickedness.] The Hebrew word zimmah imports more than wickedness. The LXX. translate it ἀσέβημα, impiety; the Vulgar Latin, incest; others, nefarious wickedness, which is the word in the civil law for those marriages that are contrary to nature. Such were these in some measure, though not in the highest degree.

Ver. 18. Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister.] There are a great many eminent writers, who, following our marginal translation [one wife to another], imagine that here plurality of wives is expressly forbidden by God. And they think there is an example to justify this translation in Exod. xxvi. 3. where Moses is commanded to take care the five curtains of the tabernacle were coupled together, one to its sister (as the Hebrew phrase is), i. e. one to another. And so the Karaites interpret this place; that a man, having a wife, should not take another while she lived. Which, if it were true, would solve several difficulties: but there are such strong reasons against it, that I cannot think it to be the meaning. For as more wives than one were indulged before the law, so they were after. And Moses himself supposes as much, when he provides a man should not prefer a child he had by a beloved wife, before one by her whom he hated, if he was the eldest son. Which plainly intimates an allowance in his law, of more wives than one. And so we find expressly their kings might have, though not a multitude, (Deut. xvii. 17.) And their best king, who read God's law day and night, and could not but understand it, took many wives, without any reproof: nay, God gave him more than he had before, by delivering his master's wives to him, (2 Sam. xii. 8.) And, besides all this, Moses speaking all along in this chapter of consanguinity, it is reasonable (as Schindlerus observes) to conclude he doth so here: not of one woman to another; but of one sister to another. There being also the like reason to understand the word sister properly in this place, as the words daughter and mother in others, (ver. 17. and xx. 14.) where he forbids a man to take a woman and her daughter, or a woman and her mother, as Theodoric Hackspan judiciously notes, Disput. i. de Locutionibus Sacris, n. 29. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. and Buxtorf. de Sponsal, p. 28, 29.)

The meaning therefore is, that though two wives at a time, or more, were permitted in those days, no man should take two sisters (as Jacob had formerly done) begotten of the same father, or born of the same mother, whether legitimately or illegitimately, as the forenamed R. Levi expresses it, (Præcept. ccvi.) Which, though it may seem to be prohibited before, by consequence and analogy (because the marriage of a brother's wife is forbidden, ver. 16.) yet it is here directly prohibited, as other marriages are; which were implicitly forbidden before. For, ver. 7. the marriage of a son with his mother is forbidden: and ver. 10. the marriage of a father with his daughter.

To vex her.] There were wont to be great emulations, and jealousies, and contentions, between wives (some of them being more beloved than others, and also superior to them), which between two sisters would have been more intolerable, than between two other women: who not being "a consanguinitate, æquiore animo sub eodem marito, ætatem una agant," (as Petrus Cunæus speaks, lib. ii. de Repub. Heb. cap. 23.) of the same consanguinity (as two sisters are), might live with more equal and quiet minds under the same husband. The Vulgar Latin understands this, as if Moses forbade them to make one sister their wife, and the other their concubine; which could not but beget the greatest discords between them.

In her life-time.] From hence some infer, that a man was permitted to marry the sister of his former wife, when she was dead. So the Talmudists; but the Karaites thought it absolutely unlawful, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. i. de Uxore Heb. cap. 4.) For it is directly against the scope of all these laws, which prohibit men to marry at all with such persons as are here mentioned, either in their wives' life-time, or after. And there being a prohibition (ver. 16.) to marry a brother's wife, it is unreasonable to think Moses gave them leave to marry their wife's sister. These words, therefore, in her life-time, are to be referred, not to the first words, neither shalt thou take her, but to the next, to vex her, as long as she lives. Chaskuni refers it to both the sisters, according to the Targum, and makes this the sense; lest they should both be afflicted widows as long as they live: for nobody would marry either of them, being defiled by such an incestuous conjunction, for which God cut off their husband.

In this the ancient Christians were so strict, that if a man, after his wife died, married her sister, he was by the tenth canon of the council of Eliberis, to be kept from the communion five years.

Ver. 19. Also thou shalt not approach to a woman.] No, not to his own wife, as the forenamed R. Levi expounds it, (Præcept. ccvii.) though all other women also are comprehended, even their Canaanitish slaves, as he observes.

As long as she is put apart for her uncleanness.] Which was seven days, (xv. 19.) All the laws about marriages unto this place, seem to have a special regard to the wicked customs among the Egyptians; who, above all other people, were then polluted with such incestuous mixtures. And now he proceeds to direct them to abhor the customs of the Canaanites; who were polluted more than other nations with adulteries, and offering their children to Moloch, and the rest of the foul crimes which follow. For against the practices of these two nations, the Egyptians and the Canaanites, Moses cautions them, (ver. 3.) and accordingly first mentions the doings of the Egyptians unto this place; and then those of the Canaanites in the following verses.

Ver. 20. Moreover, thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbour's wife.] While he lived with her: for this was to commit adultery.

To defile thyself with her.] This signifies the foulest impurity, as appears from ver. 23. and was punished with death, (xx. 10.)

Ver. 21. And thou shalt not let any of thy seed.] i. e. Of their children, as it is explained Deut. xviii. 10. This was a spiritual adultery, and therefore here mentioned.

Pass through the fire to Molech.] It is certain that Moloch was particularly worshipped by the children of Ammon, (at least in future ages, 1 Kings xi. 7.) but seems to have been the name of many of the heathen gods, and the same with Baal: both of them signifying dominion. This appears by comparing Jer. xix. 5. with xxxii. 35. But more especially it signifies the sun, the prince of the heavenly bodies, (see Vossius de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 5.) as the queen of heaven was the moon, (Jer. vii. 18.) Now it is evident, by several passages in Scripture, that the ancient pagans (whom the Israelites were prone to imitate) not only made their children pass through the fire, but also offered them in sacrifice unto Moloch. The former I take to be forbidden in this law; the latter in xx. 3. where giving their children to Moloch is prohibited under a severe penalty, of being put to death for that crime: whereas there is no penalty annexed here to their making them pass through the fire. Which I take therefore to have been a less crime than the other; though an idolatrous rite, practised by those who abhorred the cruelty of offering the very life of their dear children to Moloch. Instead of which, this rite was devised, of making them pass through the fire (for though the word fire be not here in the Hebrew text, yet it is understood by all, and expressed Deut. xviii. 10.) by way of purification, and lustration, as they called it; and by this means to dedicate them to the worship and service of Moloch. And therefore, being a rite of initiation, whereby parents consecrated their sons and daughters to their deities; we never find it mentioned in Scripture, but only concerning children (not concerning men and women), whom the Israelites are forbidden to dedicate in this manner; which was, in truth, to alienate them from the Lord God of Israel.

Now, that this was practised among the ancient pagans as a rite of initiation, appears particularly in the mysteries of Mithra (see Suidas upon that word); and continued long among the Persians, if we may believe Benjamin Tudelensis, in his Itinerarium, p. 214. (See G. Schickardi Tarich, p. 126, &c.) And this very phrase, make to pass unto (for the word fire, as I said, is not here mentioned), signifies as much as ad partes ejus transire, to be addicted to any one; like that phrase προσέρχεσθαι τῷ Θεῷ, to come unto God, (Heb. xi. 6.) And so this Hebrew phrase is used Exod. xiii. 12. and may very well be thus understood here, for devoting, or making over their children unto Moloch. For the heathen thought their children unclean, and obnoxious to the anger of their gods, and consequently in danger to be taken away from them, if they were not thus expiated, as Maimonides tells us, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37.) And, on the contrary, they fancied, (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. ccviii.) that if only one of their children were thus consecrated to Moloch, all the rest were blessed, and should be prosperous. For he very nicely takes notice that the Israelites are forbidden to make any of their seed to pass through the fire: it not being the manner, he saith, to make them all pass. But the idolatrous priests (to make the people more willing to this service) cunningly persuaded them, that if any one child was offered to Moloch, it procured a blessing upon all; and if there was only one child in a family, they laid no obligation on the parents to do this.

The manner of doing it, at this distance of time, cannot certainly be known. Some say their parents carried them through two fires upon their shoulders. Others, that they were led between them by their priests: and so R. Levi in the place beforenamed; "The father delivered the child to the priest, in the name of the idol; just as it is said concerning legal sacrifices, (xv. 14.) 'he shall give them to the priest.'" Others think that the priest, or somebody else, waved the child about in the very flame, while men and women danced round the fire; nay, leaped through the flame. And Joh. Coch. observes, upon the title Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 7. that some are of opinion, the children thus dedicated did not walk, but dance through the fire: which being an emblem and representative of the sun, plainly signified such children were consecrated to that deity. And this comes nearer to the Hebrew phrase, as we translate it, that they did not pass between fires, but through the fire. But which way soever it was done, whether they waved the child through the very fire, and presented it to Moloch, before whom the fire was kindled, or led it between two fires; when they had so done, the priest restored the child to the father again. And in some such way Ahaz made his son "to pass through the fire, according to the abomination of the heathen," (2 Kings xvi. 3.) which cannot be meant of his burning him: for Hezekiah his son outlived him, and succeeded in his throne. (See Theodoret in Kings iv. quæst. 47. Maimon. de Idol. cap. 6. sect. 14. n. 4—7. and Vossius's notes; with Simeon de Muis in Psal. cvi. 37.)

Neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God.] By offering their children to Moloch, they in effect rejected and disowned (as I before observed) the Lord God of Israel: which was to pollute his name, by giving that honour, which was due to him alone, unto another God: for he gave them children; who were therefore to be devoted to none but him.

I am the Lord.] The only sovereign of the world; who will severely punish the transgressors of this law.

Ver. 22. Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind: it is an abomination.] A detestable wickedness; condemned by all nations, though practised by some lewd persons among them. Insomuch that the apostles of Christ make mention of it with the greatest abhorrence, (Rom. i. 27. 1 Cor. vi. 9. 1 Tim. i. 10.) For not only several of the Roman emperors were infamous upon this account, but some also of the Greek philosophers.

This prohibition is repeated, according to Maimonides, in Deut. xxiii. 17. whom our translation follows; there shall not be a Sodomite of the sons of Israel. But Onkelos interprets that place otherwise.

Ver. 23. Neither shalt thou lie with any beast, &c.] i. e. Of any kind whatsoever. Some are apt to say, what need was there of such prohibitions? when it is so monstrously unnatural, to mix with creatures of a different species from us, as all beasts are. But such persons do not understand, that this was not only practised in Egypt, (against whose doings he cautions them, ver. 3.) but was also made a piece of religion: women devoted to the worship there used, most filthily submitting to the lust of their sacred goats. So Strabo tells us, lib. vii. p. 802. that at Mendes, where they worshipped Pan, Τράγοι ἐνταῦθα γυναιξὶ μίγνννται, goats (which were there also worshipped) lay with women. For which he quotes Pindar; as do also Priscianus and Ælian, lib. vii. de Animal. cap. 19. as Casaubon there notes. And Herodotus vouches this upon his own knowledge, and saith they did it openly (so ἀναφανδὸν signifies) when he was in Egypt. His words are these, in his second book called Euterpe, cap. 46. Ἐγένετο δ' ἐν τῷ νόμῳ τούτῳ ἐπ' ἐμεῦ τοῦτο τέρας· γυναικὶ τράγος ἐμίσγετο ἀναφανδόν. This prodigy happened in this part of Egypt (i. e. among the Mendesians) when I was there, a goat had to do with a woman in the view of all. Τοῦτο ἐς ἐπίδειξιν ἀνθρώπων ἀπίκετο. How long this beastly custom had been among them, none can tell, but these words import that then it was notorious; and so far from being kept secret, that they rather made an ostentation of it. Which I look upon as an argument that this had been a very old practice; otherwise they would have blushed at it.

Ver. 24. Defile not yourselves in any of these things.] This seems to relate particularly to the sins beforementioned, ver. 20—23. (See ver. 26.)

For in all these the nations are defiled, which I cast out before you.] The seven nations that inhabited the land of Canaan, (mentioned in many places, particularly Deut. vii. 1.) were so overrun with these filthy vices, that God could not bear with them, but ordered them to be destroyed for this very reason. Which was a sufficient caution to the Israelites, who came in their room, to keep themselves from such impurities.

Ver. 25. And the land is defiled.] To make the Israelites the more abominate such doings, he represents the very land, in which they dwelt, as sensible of the foul wickedness of the inhabitants; who were a loathsome burden to it, which it could not digest.

Therefore do I visit the iniquity thereof upon it.] I am about to punish them upon that account.

And the land itself vomiteth out its inhabitants.] A most eloquent figure, expressing the excessive loathsomeness of their wickedness: which made their own country nauseate them, and throw them out, as our stomach doth meat that offends it. The same expression is used, ver. 28. xx. 22. Rev. iii. 16. Theodoret expounds this word by βδελύσσειν, which signifies their expulsion, as an execrable people. And, indeed, the word vomit in Scripture is used for that which is most detestable and abominable, (Isa. xxviii. 8. Jer. xlviii. 26. Habak. ii. 10.)

Ver. 26. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments.] These laws I have given you. (See ver. 4, 5.)

And shall not commit any of these abominations.] From this word abominations, which the nations God cast out to make room for them, are said to have committed, ver. 27. some conclude, that every one of the foregoing marriages, mentioned in this chapter, are in their own nature sinful; the nations who had no positive law to forbid them, being cast out for such pollutions. But the mere force of this word will not warrant such a conclusion; because several things are called in this book an abomination, which have no moral turpitude in them; but were made so by God's positive laws, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11. p. 598.) from Lev. xi. 10. 20. 41, 42. where several sorts of creatures are forbidden to be eaten, as abominable: and the sacrifice of a bullock or a sheep that had a blemish, is said to be an abomination, (Deut. xvii. 1.) not from the very nature of the thing; but from the prohibition which God had made against such offerings.

It is most reasonable, therefore, to refer the abominations here spoken of to those foul things mentioned in the latter end of this list, (ver. 20—23.) and to those in the beginning, (ver. 7—9, &c.) For lying with one's mother, or mother-in-law, or sister, was always an abomination. But we cannot say the same of every one of the rest (the law itself following, or rather requiring, in one case, the marriage of a brother's wife), which were made an abomination by the law now given to the Israelites.

Neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you.] That is, any proselyte who had embraced their religion. (See xvii. 8.)

Ver. 27. For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, &c.] He admonishes them to beware of these abominations, by the example of those who were utterly undone by them. For God is no respecter of persons; but would punish them in the same manner, if they did the same things.

Ver. 28. That the land spew not you out also, &c.] As it did at last, (Jer. ix. 19. Ezek. xxxvi. 17.)

Ver. 29. For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them, shall be cut off from among their people.] The multitude of the offenders shall not keep off the punishment; but they shall suffer by the hand of the judges, or by the hand of God, if they neglect their duty. (See Gen. xvii. 14.)

Ver. 30. Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinances.] Live by all these rules which I have now given you.

That ye commit not any of these abominable customs, which were committed before you.] By observing every one of these laws, they were kept at a distance from those greater abominations, mentioned in the beginning, and in the latter end of these prohibitions. The positive laws (or ordinances) now added, being in the nature of an antemurale, or an outwork; to stop their proceeding to the higher crimes, which were against the law of nature.

I am the Lord your God.] As their Lord, he had authority to make these laws: and as their God, they had particular obligations to observe them. Nay, it was a singular token of his love to them, that he prescribed these laws of chastity and modesty: that thereby he might preserve them a holy people to him, pure and free from those abominable filthinesses, and those indecent conjunctions, that were practised in the world. For, as the ancient rule was, "semper in omnibus conjunctionibus, non solum quod liceat considerandum est, sed et quod honestum est:" in all marriages it is always to be considered, not merely what is lawful, but what is honest and seemly. Which is more true in the Christian religion, than in any other: for thereby marriage is advanced, to represent the unity that is between Christ and his church. And besides, in contracting marriage, we are not only to have regard to our own conscience (as Joh. Brentius wisely observes, upon the forenamed rule of the ancient law), but to succession also, and to inheritances. And therefore, "id agendum, quod et boni viri honestum judicant; et a legitimo magistratu permittitur:" that is to be done, both which good men judge to be honest, and is allowed by lawful governors.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The following precepts, which contain in a manner all their duty, seem to have been delivered to Moses immediately after the former; being in a great part a repetition of some principal things which had been already commanded.

Ver. 2. Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel.] It is uncertain whether he delivered these precepts only to their elders and heads of their tribes, to be communicated by them to the people; or at several times he called every family of every tribe, and spake these words to them himself.

And say unto them, Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy.] This very thing was said to them before, with respect to several meats which are forbidden them, xi. 44. (See there.) And now is repeated with a peculiar respect (as Maimonides thinks, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.) to the filthy marriages and abominable idolatries mentioned in the foregoing chapter; as it is repeated again in the next chapter, (xx. 7. 26.) with respect to some other things. It being a general reason, why they should be separated from all other people, by the observation of peculiar laws (which is the meaning of being holy), because they were the worshippers of Him, whose most excellent nature transcended all other beings, not only in purity, but in all other perfections.

Ver. 3. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father.] This duty is called honour in the fifth commandment, (Exod. xx. 12.) and the father there put before the mother; which being here called fear, and the mother put before the father, it shews, saith Maimonides, that honour and fear are equally due to both, without any difference. And the proper expressions of fear and reverence are (according to those doctors), not to sit in their seat, nor to contradict them in any thing they say; much less to cavil against them; nor to call them by their proper names, but to add the title of Sir, &c. (as we speak) or the like. And the expressions of honour, are not to sit down in their presence; and to provide them with necessaries, if they fall into poverty, &c. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 13. p. 557, &c. and R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. xxvii.)

And keep my sabbaths.] Obedience, as well as reverence, is included in the word fear: but if parents commanded them to break the sabbath-day, or to profane any other day consecrated to God's service, they were not to be obeyed.

I am the Lord your God.] I rested on the sabbath-day; who am your sovereign, and therefore have power to require you to rest on any other days. Particularly on the great day of atonement, (xvi. 31.) when I am so gracious as to accept of an expiation for all your sins. This is repeated ver. 30. and xxiii. 3.

Ver. 4. Turn ye not unto idols.] Not so much as to look upon them; no, nor to think of them, (as R. Levi Barzelonita expounds it, Præcept. ccxxv.) much less to inquire after what manner the gentiles worshipped them, (which is expressly forbidden Deut. xii. 30.) for by this means they might be allured to idolatry. The word we here translate idols, is a word of contempt, signifying a thing of nought. Or, as some of the Jews will have it, this word elilim, is compounded of the particle al, signifying not; and El, i. e. God. As much as to say, which are not gods; and therefore called in Scripture vanities, which can do neither good nor hurt.

Nor make to yourself molten gods.] This seems to have respect to the golden calf, which they made to worship, and is called a molten calf, (Exod. xxxii. 4.) But all graven images are no less forbidden: for if to look towards an idol was a sin, much more was it to make an image of any sort to worship it. The Jews are something curious in their observations upon this precept. For, in the book Siphra, they say that they might not make molten gods for others, much less for themselves. Whence that saying, "He that makes to himself an idol, violates a double precept; first in making it, and then in making it to himself." (See R. Levi beforementioned, Præcept. ccxxvi.)

I am the Lord your God.] The same reason is given in the foregoing verse for the observation of their sabbaths: and that of the seventh day every week, was ordained in memory of the creation of the world; and consequently intended as a preservative from idolatry, (as I observed upon Exod. xx. 8.) which, perhaps, makes these two precepts be here put together. But it is evident Moses doth not observe the order wherein these precepts were first delivered; but rather inverts it, beginning with the fifth commandment, and so going back to the fourth; and here to the two first.

Ver. 5. And if ye offer a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the Lord.] As they were to avoid all idolatry, so they were to be careful to perform the service due to the true God in a right manner. Peace-offerings are only mentioned, because they were the most common sacrifices, being of three sorts, (see chap. vii. 11, &c. and xvii. 5.)

Ye shall offer it at your own will.] Either of the herd, or of the flock; male or female, (chap. iii. 1. 6.) Or rather, (as the Vulgar Latin and the LXX. understand it) they were to offer it so, that it might be acceptable to the Lord; according to the rules prescribed in the seventh chapter.

Ver. 6. It shall be eaten the same day ye offer it, and on the morrow.] This shews he speaks particularly of those peace-offerings which were a vow, or a voluntary offering, (chap. vii. 16.) for sacrifices of thanksgiving might not be kept till the morrow, but were to be eaten on the same day, ver. 15. of that chapter: (see the reason of this, Exod. xxiii. 18. the latter end.)

And if aught remain till the third day, it shall be burnt with fire.] See chap. vii. 17.

Ver. 7. And if it be eaten at all on the third day, it is abominable.] See chap. vii. 18.

It shall not be accepted.] See there. This seems to justify the sense which the Vulgar puts upon those words, ver. 5. which we translate, according to thy will.

Ver. 8. Therefore every one that eateth it shall bear his iniquity.] See chap. vii. 18.

Because he hath profaned the hallowed things of the Lord.] By keeping them till they were in danger to stink, or to be corrupted.

That soul shall be cut off from his people.] By the judges, if the thing was known: otherwise by the hand of God.

Ver. 9. And when ye reap the harvest of your land.] Which was a time of great joy, when they offered, it is likely, many peace-offerings of that sort beforementioned.

Thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field.] But leave a sixtieth part (as their wise men have determined it), and that in the extreme part of the field, rather than any other place, that the poor might know where to come for it; as R. Levi Barzelonita explains it, Præcept. ccxiii. And this, whether they were in the land of Israel, or out of it; as Mr. Selden observes out of the Talmudists, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. p. 692. where he shews it was the custom to add something to the sixtieth part, proportionable to the largeness of the field, or the multitude of the poor, or the greatness of the crop.

Neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest.] That is, if an ear or two of corn fell (as they cut it, or bound it up) out of the sheaves, or from under their sickle, they were not to gather them up from the ground, but leave them for the poor, as oft as they fell: but not if there fell three ears at a time, as the Talmudists determine: (see Mr. Selden in the place abovenamed; and the same R. Levi, Præcept. ccxiv.)

Ver. 10. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard.] When they had cut off the great bunches, they were not to examine the vine over again for the scattered grapes, or small clusters.

Neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard.] If any fell to the ground as they gathered them, they were not to take them up. That is, if one or two clusters fell; but not if three, much less if more: for they construe this as they do the precept about ears of corn, (ver. 9.) They also say, they were bound to leave the corners of the vineyard uncut, as well as the corners of the field. (R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. ccxxx. and ccxxxi. and Mr. Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. in the place beforenamed.) And these precepts obliged such strangers as sojourned among them, (mentioned chap. xvii. 8. and xviii. 26.) who, before they were admitted to embrace the Jewish religion, were examined whether they understood that they must observe such and such precepts, particularly these here mentioned, which were propounded to them plainly and distinctly: and after they had promised to keep them, they were circumcised, &c. As G. Schickard observes out of the Talmud, the custom was, after the destruction of Jerusalem, in Mishpat Hamelek, cap. 5. Theorem xvii.

Thou shalt leave them for the poor and the stranger.] Though by stranger the Jews think is understood a proselyte of righteousness (as they call him who had embraced their religion, by receiving circumcision), yet they did not hinder any poor gentile from partaking of this charity; as the same R. Levi says. And if any one transgressed any of the precepts contained in these two verses, he was beaten; as Mr. Selden shews, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 8.

I am the Lord your God.] I give you the country to which you go, with these reserves for the poor: and have been so bountiful to you, that I require you to be so to them.

Ver. 11. Ye shall not steal.] Here are several moral precepts put briefly together, for the maintaining justice and truth; without which societies cannot be preserved. And, first, he forbids theft; the coveting of other men's goods being the source of the other sins that follow. And whether they were the goods of an Israelite, or of a gentile idolater, that any man stole, he was bound to make restitution, as R. Levi observes, Præcept. ccxxxii. (See Exod. xxii. 1.)

Neither deal falsely.] This is a Divine caution (as the Hebrew doctors observe) against denying a thing that was deposited with them; or which they had found, &c. which they would never pretend they had not, if they were disposed to be sincere and upright in their dealing.

Neither lie one to another.] Words being intended to declare the mind, and for no other end; he that hears us speak hath a right in justice to be done him, that what we speak be true. For otherwise he doth not know our mind by our words; and then we had better be dumb. But though all kind of lying be contrary to the intention of God, in giving us speech; yet this relates particularly to such lies whereby a man's neighbour was injured; defrauded, for instance, of his goods which he had deposited with another; or of the just debts which were owing him, &c. But though the simple denying of such things was not punished with beating, as Mr. Selden represents the opinion of the Talmudists, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11.) yet he that denied a thing deposited with him was not admitted to be a witness in any case, though he had not forsworn himself, unto which this lying disposed him. So R. Levi, Præcept. ccxxxiii.

Ver. 12. And ye shall not swear by my name falsely.] Much less was it lawful for them to confirm the lies forementioned with an oath. So the Jewish doctors interpret it, as Mr. Selden observes in the same place. If any man did, and was found guilty, he was adjudged to restore the principal, and a fifth part more, (chap. vi. 5.) And whether he forswore himself knowingly, or ignorantly, he was to expiate his crime with a sacrifice. But if he was ignorant of that command concerning a sacrifice; or if, though he had the thing which he denied in his keeping, yet he had really forgot it, when he swore he had it not; he was freed both from the fifth part and from the sacrifice. (See chap. v. 4.)

Neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God.] By calling God to witness unto a frivolous thing, or to a rash resolution: as if a man swore in his anger he would not speak to such a person, but afterward did; or, he would not eat of such meat, &c. In such cases, the Jews say, when a man's heart was touched with repentance for his rashness and incogitancy, he was to go to some wise man, or to three neighbours, and desire them to absolve him from his oath, of which he truly repented. Which they did, when they found him truly penitent; saying, Be thou loosed, or, It is remitted to thee, or the like. So Mr. Selden observes out of Maimonides, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 9.

Plato hath said some remarkable things concerning forswearing, and also of lying, and deceit: for which I refer the learned reader to his eleventh book of Laws, p. 216, 217. edit. Serrani.

I am the Lord.] And therefore expect the greatest reverence to my name; and that you should deal honestly one with another.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him, &c.] Here are several precepts, almost coincident in their sense, but have some peculiar negations belonging to them. For (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes), "in all things from which God would have them carefully abstain, he multiplies admonitions," (Præcept. cxxxvi.) Accordingly here to defraud is to keep in one's hand that which belongs to another: and such a person, he saith, is called an oppressor in Scripture. The Vulgar Latin refers it to that which men get from others by calumny: as the next words relate to that which is wrested from them by open violence.

Neither rob him.] The same R. Levi expounds this of that which is taken from another by manifest force, and doth not belong to him that takes it, (Præcept. ccxxxvii.) For so the Hebrew word gazilah signifies, that which a man wrests out of the hand of another against his will, (1 Chron. xi. 23.)

The wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night till the morning.] For this was a kind of force and robbery, to detain what was owing to him against his will. In Deut. xxiv. 15. the words are, "Thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it." From whence the Hebrew doctors conclude there were two sorts of people that wrought for hire; one were day-labourers, whom Moses speaks of in this verse; another labourers by night, of whom he speaks in Deuteronomy. Neither of which were to stay for their wages beyond the time appointed; but the one were to have it before sun-set, the other before morning; for it was due as soon as the day or the night was done. So the Misna, The day-labourer requires his wages all night, and the night-labourer all day. See the forenamed R. Levi, (Præcept. ccxxxviii.) who gives this reason for it; that "the merciful God would have his creatures subsist; which poor labourers cannot do if they want their wages to buy them victuals." Upon which account, the detaining of their wages is said to be a crying sin, in that Deut. xxiv. 14. and in St. James, v. 4.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not curse the deaf.] No Israelite, whether man or woman, was to be cursed, though he could not hear the curse, and so was insensible of the injury, as R. Levi explains it, (Præcept. ccxxxix.) For there was the addition of barbarous baseness in it, to curse or revile a person who was not capable to answer for himself, nor do himself right: and the case of the sick, and the infirm, or the absent, was the same with the deaf. As for others, who were not deaf, it was forbidden to curse them, saith Maimonides, because it provoked to anger and rage, which stirred men up to take revenge.

Nor put a stumbling-block before the blind.] This is as inhuman as the former; proceeding from so great malice, that the Hebrew doctors seem to think men incapable of it; and therefore expound it of giving ill counsel to simple people, and advising them to their damage. So R. Levi; (Præcept. ccxl.) which is no less contrary to nature than laying a stumbling-block in the way of those that cannot see to avoid it; and a far greater sin, because it abused their minds, and might tend to the hurt of their souls.

But shalt fear thy God.] Believing he sees and hears, and will avenge the cause of those who cannot right themselves, because they know not who injured them. If any man was convicted of either of these crimes he was beaten.

I am the Lord.] And am therefore to be feared and obeyed.

Ver. 15. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment.] The Jews take this to be an admonition to their judges, that they should have an equal regard to the plaintiff and defendant, and not prefer the one before the other. Whence these words are thus explained in Siphra: "Thou shalt judge thy neighbours justly; not letting one party stand, and bidding the other sit; nor suffering one to speak as much as he pleaseth, and bidding the other be short." (See Selden de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 13. n. 10.) But none hath explained this so largely as Maimonides, in the whole twenty-first chapter of Sanhedrin, where he, in general, defines the just administration of justice to consist in an equal respect to both parties in the suit; so that one of them have not the liberty to say what he will, and the other be cut short: and then descends to many particulars, wherein equal respect to both parties is to be observed; some of which, it will be fit to mention, because they illustrate the words of St. James, in the second chapter of his Epistle, ver. 2—4. "If two parties appear in a cause, one of which is clothed in precious garments, the other is ragged, or in a poor habit, let it be said to him that is the more honourable, Either do you bestow upon your adversary as good apparel as you have on yourself, or else put on such as he wears, that you may be both alike, and then appear before the court of judgment. By no means let the one sit, and the other stand; but let them both be commanded to stand: or, if it please the judges to give them both leave to sit, let not one of them sit in a high place, the other in a low, but both on the same bench, one by the side of the other." See R. Levi Barzelonita, (Præcept. ccxvii.) who observes, that mankind are preserved by a righteous judgment; and therefore, if a judge was found to have given an unjust sentence, he was condemned to make restitution to him, whose cause he had perverted, (Præcept. ccxli.)

Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor.] See Exod. xxiii. 3.

Nor honour the person of the mighty.] This R. Levi explains, (Præcept. ccxlii.) as he did the first clause: "The judge shall not bid the great man sit down while the meaner stands; but both shall stand before the judge, as if they were in the presence of the Divine Majesty, who standeth in the midst of the judges," (Psal. lxxxii. 1.) If, by the favour of the judges, both were permitted to sit, yet, when sentence came to be pronounced, both rose up and stood; according to Exod. xviii. 13.

But in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.] The observation of Maimonides seems to be too nice and curious, who from this place gathers, that though the lowest court of judgment ordinarily consisted of no less than three judges, yet, by the law, one of them might sit alone as judge in matters not capital; because it is said here, in the singular number, in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour: for, at the same time, he acknowledges their wise men require that he should take some assessors to him, when they say, Do not judge by thyself alone, for there is no sole judge, but one only, viz. GOD. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 14. n. 2. and Guil. Schickardi Mishpat Hamelek, cap. 4. Theor. xiv.)

Ver. 16. Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among thy people.] The Vulgar Latin takes the Hebrew word rachil to signify one that goes about with calumnies. But it may simply signify, as we translate it, a tale-bearer: whom Aben Ezra compares to a merchant or pedlar (as the Hebrew word imports), who buys of one what he sells to another, and goes about the country, as a tale-bearer doth from house to house, carrying to one what he hath heard at another; saying, such a one hath said so and so of you; whereby peace and concord are destroyed among men. For commonly such men carry false stories to their neighbours, or add to the true, and secretly backbite others: which hath moved many to think a detractor is meant by this word, who hopes by his tales of others to get some advantage to himself, as every trader doth by his merchandize. Whence the Jews say, "An evil tongue kills three: him that speaks; him that hears; and him of whom he speaks." R. Levi, Præcept. ccxliii.

Neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbour.] Much less be a false witness against him, to the endangering of his life. So it is commonly interpreted, because the accusers and witnesses stood before judges who sat in the courts of judgment. But R. Levi Barzelonita, and the rest of the Hebrew doctors, generally understand it otherwise; that no man should suffer his neighbour to perish in judgment, or other ways, when he could free him by his testimony or assistance: (Præcept. ccxliv.) So it is said in Siphra, in so many words: "Whence do we gather that he who can clear another by his testimony, must not suppress it in silence? Because it is said, Thou shalt not stand against the blood of thy neighbour." Whence it follows, that if a man saw his neighbour any way in danger, he was bound, if he could, to deliver him; not only when his life was in hazard, but that which is as dear as life, one's honour and chastity. Thus, if any one went about to force a woman, espoused to another, &c. he that saw it was bound to rescue such a person, though with the death of him that made the attempt. For this was a piece of justice which they committed to private men, as Mr. Selden shews out of the Jewish authors, (lib. iv. de Jure N. et G. cap. iii. p. 481, &c.) But then, they restrain this charity only to themselves; and from the word neighbour argue, that they are bound to do thus only to an Israelite. Nay (which is strange), some of them are so selfish, and so ill-natured, that they fancy they are forbidden to do such kindness to a gentile. (See there, p. 485.

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart.] When thy brother hath done thee any wrong, do not conceal a secret hatred against him in thy breast, but tell him plainly of his fault; as the next words seem to direct. It appears by this, they were ill interpreters of the law, who thought it forbade only external acts of sin, but not evil affections which were not executed.

Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour.] Time after time (if he will not be sensible of it at first) argue the case with him, and reprove him for his fault. And if he will not amend, do it publicly (as the Vulgar Latin interprets it), and bring him before the judges. So R. Levi, Præcept. ccxviii. But he extends this to all sins, whether against God, or against themselves; which, he thinks, they were bound to reprehend privately, and then publicly, if the offenders did not grow better.

And not suffer sin upon him.] He interprets it, But not put him to confusion. For nothing is more grievous to a man than that: and therefore reprehension ought to be mild and gentle, especially when the offence is against one's self; but in those against God, greater sharpness is allowable. So he discourses, Præcept. ccxlvi. the words in the original being, Thou shalt not bear sin upon him; charge him with his guilt too severely; or, as others take it, Thou shalt not accuse him of any crime whereof he is not guilty Our translation, in the margin of our Bibles, takes it as if, by not reproving their neighbour, they brought the guilt of his sin upon themselves; for so the words there are, That thou bear not sin for him: which is an excellent sense, if the Hebrew word alau did not signify upon him, not for him. And yet some of the Jews have thus understood it; this saying of Rabbi Chanina being famous among them, "Jerusalem had not been destroyed, but because one neighbour did not reprove another:" see Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 9. p. 280. Where he observes, the doctrine of the ancient Jews was (drawn from this text), that when one man offended another in things concerning themselves, relating to their civil affairs, he was to be reproved by his neighbour, once, or twice, or thrice, if the matter required; but without sharpness, and so that he was not exposed to public shame: but if the offence was against God, in matters of religion, they say private reproof was first to be given; and if that did not work amendment, then public before all. And they admitted public reprehension upon no other score: but said, "He that publicly puts his brother to shame, shall have no part in the other world."

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not avenge.] Not deny to do their brethren a kindness, out of a remembrance of any injury received from them; as R. Levi interprets it, (Præcept. ccxlvii.) By which means, as he observes, strife and contention were abolished, and peace and concord established among men. It may be thought, also, that as they are forbidden to take revenge themselves for the wrongs any one did them; so likewise to seek for redress from the public, merely to satisfy their wrath and desire to have the injurious person suffer, and not to prevent the like or greater mischiefs for the time to come.

Nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people.] When thou dost thy neighbour a kindness, do not spoil it by upbraiding him with all his faults. For the Hebrew word natar signifies having something in reserve in one's mind, particularly anger or wrath; which our translation frequently supplies to make out the sense, (Jer. iii. 12. Psal. ciii. 9. Nahum i. 2.) And so the LXX. understand it here, καὶ οὐ μηνιεῖς, &c. and thou shalt not be angry with the children of thy people.

But thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.] In not doing to him what thou wouldst not have done to thyself; and taking such care of him, and what belongs to him, as thou wouldst have him to do of thee and thine. This, saith R. Aquiba, (as R. Levi observes, Præcept. ccxix.) is the great sum of the law; i. e. many precepts depend upon this: for he that thus loves his neighbour, will neither steal any thing from him, nor violate his wife, nor murder so much as his good name, nor remove his land-mark, nor offend him any other way: the same, in a manner, with what St. Paul saith, Rom. xiii. 8, 9, &c.

The only question is, Who is to be understood here by their neighbour? which the Jews would restrain to themselves, and have the meaning to be, that one Israelite should love another; but he is not bound to love a stranger in the same manner: which is directly against Moses's command, ver. 34. And certain it is, the word neighbour comprehends more than Israelites, as appears by the last commandment, which forbids them to covet their neighbour's wife, which did not give them leave, sure, to covet the wife of a gentile, provided they did not covet the wife of an Israelite. A neighbour, therefore, is every other man, as in Deut. xxii. 26. and more plainly in Exod. xi. 2. where the Egyptians are called their neighbour. And therefore D. Kimchi saith very honestly, upon Psal. xv. 3. a neighbour is every one with whom we have any dealing or conversation. Which justifies our blessed Saviour, in making this command, of loving their neighbours as themselves, to reach all men with whom they had to do, (Luke x. 27, 28.)

I am the Lord, &c.] Unto whom you are all equally subject; and upon that account ought to love one another. (See ver. 34.)

Ver. 19. Ye shall keep my statutes.] This may be thought to be premised to what follows; lest such commands as are contained in this verse, seeming small, should be neglected by them.

Thou shalt not let thy cattle (or rather make them) gender with a diverse kind.] As horses with asses, goats with sheep, &c. whose mixture one with another they were by no means to procure. But if they did of themselves come together, it was lawful to use such heterogeneous creatures as were so produced. For they did not abhor the use of mules, which were either begot by accident among them, or brought from other countries to them.

The reason the Jews commonly give for this precept is, because God having made all things perfect in their kind, it was a presumptuous attempt to go about to mend his creation, and add to his works. By this means also men were deterred from unnatural mixtures, which they saw to be abominable in brutes. So R. Levi Barzelonita (Præcept. ccxlix.) and Philo, whose words are very ingenious, (lib. de Creatione Princip.) "Things of the same kind were made for society one with another;" but things heterogeneous (as we call them), were not intended to be mixed and associated; and therefore, he who attempts to mingle them, ἄδικος νόμον φύσεως ἀναιρεῖ, wickedly destroys the law of nature. To the same purpose Josephus: (see Selden, lib. vii. de Jure N. et G. sec. Heb. cap. 3. p. 798.) Maimonides also himself gives this reason of this precept, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 49. where he saith, "No creature hath a desire commonly to mix with a creature of another kind; and therefore men ought not to promote such a desire." But after all, there might possibly be a respect in this precept to some idolatrous customs which Moses intended to prevent or abolish: for there is good ground to think the following precepts in this verse were so intended; and in aftertimes, some gentiles did procure such mixtures of creatures as are here forbidden (mules, for instance), in honour of their gods: see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. de Leg. Heb. Ritualibus, cap. 20. where he endeavours to prove, that by cattle in this place is peculiarly meant oxen and asses, which were used in husbandry; and are of such different natures, that none would ever have thought to procure their conjunction, unless he had been moved to it by the devil.

Thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed.] The reasons of this, according to the Jews, are the same with the former: and R. Levi extends it to trees; which, he saith, they were not to ingraft of different kinds one upon another. But it concerns, they say, only such seeds and plants as are for men's food; not those which are for medicine, (Præcept. ccl.) But Maimonides found a particular reason for this precept, from the idolatrous customs of the old Zabii; who not only sowed different seeds, and grafted trees of a diverse kind one upon another, in such or such aspect of the planets, and with a certain form of words and fumigations; but also with abominable filthiness, at the very moment of the incision. Which he proves out of a book, concerning the incision of an olive into a citron: and doubts not, that God forbade his people to sow with mingled seed, that he might root out that detestable idolatry, and those preternatural lusts, which abounded in those days, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37.)

Neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee.] In the Hebrew the words are, A garment of mixtures of schaatnez shall not come upon thee. But, that they might certainly know what schaatnez was, it is explained in Deut. xxii. 11. to signify (as we translate it) a garment of woollen and linen mixed together. The Jews have taken abundance of pains to find out the original of this word; which Bochartus derives from the Arabic word saat, which signifies to mingle, and nez, which signifies to weave. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45.) But Joh. Braunius, I think, hath demonstrated, that it doth not import the weaving of any different things together, but only of linen and woollen; and that by woollen is to be understood only what is made of the wool of sheep, not of camels or goats, which they called by the same name, (lib. i. de Vestitu Sacerd. Heb. cap. 4. n. 2, 3. 6.) Where he observes out of Maimonides, in his Halach. Kelaim, that if a man saw an Israelite wear such a garment, it was lawful for him to fall upon him openly, and tear his garment in pieces; although he were his master, who taught him wisdom. And the reasons for this abhorrence are commonly such as are given of the former precepts; to preserve them from the horrid confusion which was among the gentiles, by incestuous and unnatural mixtures. But Maimonides takes it to have been principally intended as a preservative against idolatry; the priests of the gentiles in those times wearing such mixed garments, of the product of plants and animals, with a ring on their finger, made of some metal; as, he says, he found in their books, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37.) By which mixture, it is likely, they hoped to have the beneficial influence of some lucky conjunction of the planets or stars, to bring a blessing upon their sheep and their flax.

Ver. 20. Whosoever lieth carnally with a woman that is a bondmaid, betrothed to a husband.] The Jews had some servants that were gentiles; who, if they embraced the Jewish religion, were baptized; sometimes with the reservation of their servitude, and sometimes with the full grant of liberty. But some there were in a middle condition, partly free and partly servile; viz. when part of their redemption-money had been paid, and part was still behind. Now, as, while a woman was a perfect slave, no Israelite might marry her; so, when she was partly free, though he might espouse her, and the espousals were valid, yet they could not be of full force till her liberty was perfected. And of such a maiden the Hebrew doctors understand Moses to speak in this place, that was in part free, but not wholly, as the next words interpret it.

And not at all redeemed, nor freedom given her.] Not entirely, but in part redeemed; and consequently her freedom not absolutely granted to her.

She shall be scourged.] If she had been perfectly free, both he that lay with her, and she herself, should have been put to death, (Deut. xxii. 23, 24.) But being not fully free, and consequently not fully his wife who had espoused her, it was not reckoned adultery; and therefore punished only with scourging, (see Selden, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 12. p. 613.) And Maimonides, I observe, thus expounds it, of a woman that was not a mere servant, and yet not completely free, but between both, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41.) But whereas we mention here in the text the scourging only of the woman; in the margin it is rightly noted, that the Hebrew words are, there shall be scourging; viz. of them both, as the Vulgar Latin, with great reason, understands it. And the Hebrew word bikkoreth properly signifies scourging with thongs made of a bull's or ox's hide; as Bochartus observes in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. and cap. 33. n. 8.)

They shall not be put to death, because she was not free.] Her master not having set her quite at liberty, her marriage was not complete; which freed her from suffering death, though some punishment she deserved, because it was begun.

Ver. 21. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the Lord, unto the door, &c.] Which was not enjoined her, because she had not wherewithal to offer for her expiation; all she had being her master's, and not her own.

A ram for a trespass-offering.] Which was the proper sacrifice in such a case, (chap. v. 17, 18.)

Ver. 22. And the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass-offering.] She needed an atonement as well as he, being equally guilty in consenting to the fact; and being espoused to another, seems to have had a greater guilt upon her; and therefore was left in a lamentable condition, without any public assurance of God's pardon.

For his sin which he hath done.] Which had so much guilt in it, that besides the punishment he suffered in being scourged, this satisfaction was to be made to God.

And the sin which he hath done shall be forgiven him.] By virtue of the sacrifice, which would not have been accepted if she had been perfectly a freewoman: but the sin would have cost his own life and hers also, (Deut. xxii. 23, 24.)

Ver. 23. And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food.] The precept is so general, that the boldness of R. Zerika is unaccountable, who would have it understood only of the vine, which, if it be not cut, its grapes are not so large, nor the wine so good, nor fit to be offered at the altar, &c. as his opinion is represented in Pirke Eliezer, (cap. xxix.) But Moses expressly mentioning all manner of trees for food, there is no colour for this limitation; and a very good account may be given of this prohibition, if we have respect only to natural reason. For young trees grow better, if they be stripped of their fruit; the juice of which is waterish and unconcocted, having neither pleasant smell nor taste, as Nachmanides observes; and therefore not fit for food; and upon that score not fit to be offered as the first-fruits to God.

But, besides all this, Maimonides affirms there was an idolatrous custom among the Zabii, to which this law of Moses may reasonably be thought to be opposed: for they imagined all trees would be blasted, or their fruit fall off, whose first-fruit was not part of it offered in their idol temples, and the other part eaten there: as their children, they thought, would not thrive, unless some of them passed through the fire. And therefore God commanded his people to forbear to eat the fruit of any tree till the fourth year; and not doubt of the fruitfulness of their plantations, though they did not consecrate the fruit of the years foregoing, after the manner that the gentiles did: More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37. where he observes some trees brought forth fruit in one year, some not till the second, and others not till the third, according to the different ways wherein they were planted.

Ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised.] That is, as unclean, and therefore to be cast away as the foreskin was.

Three years it shall be as uncircumcised to you; it shall not be eaten of.] And therefore they plucked off the buds when they put forth, that they might not grow into fruit; or, if any by chance did, they threw it away, as unfit for food. But this is meant only of such fruit-trees as they planted after they came into Canaan; not of such as they found already planted there. And it was the same thing, whether he planted them himself, or bought an orchard, or vineyard, &c. of another Israelite, or had it left him as an inheritance, or bestowed on him as a gift; the three first years the fruit was not to be used.

Ver. 24. But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy, to praise the Lord withal.] It was to be offered as the first-fruit to God, and eaten by the priests; which, as Maimonides saith in the book forenamed, (cap. 49.) was to excite them to liberality, and give a check to their appetites as well as to covetousness. Yet there are those who say this fruit of the fourth year was to be eaten by the owners before the Lord at Jerusalem (when his dwelling was settled there), as they ate the second tithe. So R. Levi Barzelonita (Præcept. ccxx.) shews at large. And they observe many benefits which the Israelites received by this means; not only in exciting their thankfulness to God, but their love to that holy place: unto which some of their family might conceive such an affection, as to settle there, and learn the law.

Ver. 25. In the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof, that it may yield unto you the increase thereof.] He would not have them think that they should lose any thing, by staying till the fifth year for the fruit of their trees; but promises them here, that, by forbearing so long, their trees should be the more exceeding fruitful.

I am the Lord.] Who bestowed this land upon them, to hold of him by what tenure he pleased; by whose blessing they might expect to receive the increase thereof abundantly; without the help of such wicked arts as Maimonides says the Zabii used: who, letting certain things lie till they were purified, and, when the sun was in such or such a degree, sprinkling them about the trees which they had planted, with certain magical ceremonies, they fancied flowers and fruits would be produced sooner than they could have been without these practices.

Ver. 26. Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood.] This is an admonition, as R. Levi Barzelonita fancies, (Præcept. cclii.) against gluttony and drunkenness; such as the rebellious son was guilty of, (Deut. xxi. 18, &c.) which made men prone to shed blood; for so he understands this precept, Thou shalt not eat upon blood; i. e. eat till thou art excited to shed blood: unto which he applies Deut. xxxii. 15. Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked. But this is a very forced interpretation; and our translation is not exact: for he doth not say, Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood; but, Ye shall not eat upon the blood, or at the blood; which Oleaster very sagaciously suspected to be a piece of superstition unknown to him; and so did the LXX. when they translated it, ye shall not eat, ἐπὶ τῶν ὀρέων, upon the mountains, which was an idolatrous custom, mentioned in Hosea iv. 13. and here forbidden, as Procopius and Hesychius imagine: but the Hebrew word haddam no where signifies a mountain, but blood, as the Vulgar here truly translates it. There is a Greek Scholion which renders these words, οὐ φάγεσθε ἐπὶ τοῦ δώματος, ye shall not eat on the house-top; which, in all likelihood, as some have conjectured, was a mistake of the transcriber for ἐπὶ τοῦ αἵματος, upon the blood, which is the literal translation of the Hebrew phrase, and imports something more than is prohibited, chap. xvii. 12. where he simply saith, no soul of you shall eat blood; but here warns them against an idolatrous practice of the Zabii, who, to enter into the society of demons, and obtain their favour, were wont to gather the blood of their sacrifices into a vessel, or a little hole digged in the earth; and then, sitting about it, to eat the flesh of the sacrifices; imagining, that by eating, as it were, of the same food (for they thought the demons fed upon the blood, as their worshippers did upon the flesh), they contracted a friendship and familiarity with them. So Maimonides relates in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46. For the prevention of which idolatrous custom, God ordered their sacrifices to be offered only at one place, where his own house was; and there the priests sprinkling the blood, and they eating the flesh of their peace-offerings, God and they feasted together upon them. Nachmanides is wont to oppose Maimonides in his notions; yet this was so plain, that he confesses, (as Dr. Cudworth hath observed, in his treatise of the Right Notion of the Lord's Supper, chap. ult.) that blood itself was forbidden in the law, upon the account of the heathens' performing their superstitious worship in this manner, by gathering together blood for their demons, "and then coming themselves, and eating of it with them, whereby they were their demon's guest; and by this kind of communion with them, were enabled to prophesy and foretell things to come." And this interpretation is the more probable, that they hoped, by eating of the blood of the sacrifices, or the flesh, or both, to have such familiarity with them, as to receive revelations from them, and be inspired with the knowledge of secret things; if we consider the two other prohibitions in this verse, that are joined with this of not eating upon blood; which shews that it was a rite of divination.

Neither shall ye use enchantment.] In the Hebrew the words are lo tenachashu; which, all agree, signify some superstitious observation or other, whereby they made omens, and guessed what should happen to them; either from men's sneezing, or the breaking of a shoe-latchet; or the name of a man they met withal; or some creature's crossing their way, or passing upon their right hand, or their left. And most, following the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin, take it for divination by the flying, or crying, or pecking of birds. But the word nachash, signifying a serpent, and having no relation at all to birds, the famous Bochartus thinks tenachashu (which seems to be derived from thence) to relate rather to the ancient ὀφιομαντεία, divination by serpents, than to their ὀρνιθομαντεία, divination by birds; for it was very much in use among the gentiles in old time, as appears from Homer, (in his seventh Iliad.) where Chalchas seeing a serpent devour eight sparrows with their dam, divined how long the Trojan war would last: and many such instances he heaps up together in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 3. R. Levi Barzelonita (Præcept. ccliii.) refers this to any kind of divination: by their staff falling out of their hand; by a serpent creeping on their right hand, or a fox going by their left, &c. which made them forbear any work they were about; but he thinks withal, it may signify, as we translate it, enchantment: to cure wounds (for instance) by reading a verse of the law; or laying the book of the law, or a phylactery, upon a child's head to procure sleep; which are such superstitions as are now in use among some Christians, who hang the first verse of St. John's Gospel about people's necks to cure an ague. But such things could not be meant by Moses, who had not yet delivered them a copy of his laws; nor can we certainly fix upon any other in particular which were then in use; see J. Coch upon the title Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 18. and Maimonides de Idololatria, cap. 11. sect. 4—6, &c. where he gives a great number of instances of such superstitious observations as were in use among the heathen: some of which are mentioned by Theophrastus in his characters of Superstition; and by Plutarch, in his book on the same subject; and are derided by Terence in his Phormio, act. iv. scen. 4. with which superstitions the greatest persons were anciently very much infected; and they were so settled in men's minds, that when they became Christians, they could not presently shake them off; as appears by the frequent reprehensions which St. Chrysostom (and others) give to those who continued to be governed by them; particularly in his eighth homily upon the Colossians, he chides his people severely for contemning the cross of Christ, and calling in old drunken women with their salt, their ashes, and soot, to free those that were bewitched. And more especially in his sixth homily against the Jews, he sharply rebukes those that used ἐπῳδαὶ καὶ περίαπτα, charms, and things hung about the neck, to cure agues; whereby they got a worse disease in their souls, and wounded their consciences, &c. And in other places he reprehends their observing of omens, good and bad; some of which were very strange. (See tom. vi. p. 610, 611. edit. Savil.)

Nor observe times.] Take no notice of days, according to the precepts of astrologers, who made some to be lucky, others unlucky. For the Jews generally think something of this nature is here forbidden, the Hebrew word teonenu being derived, they imagine, from onah, which signifies time, (as R. Levi, beforementioned, saith, Præcept. cclv.) such an hour being thought, by superstitious people, to be fit for business; but another very cross to it. Which opinion God seems to have intended to extinguish, by appointing the sabbath as the only day of the week upon which they should rest from their labours, leaving all the other six days to be employed in their business, without any difference of days or hours. But there being no such signification, as many think, of that word in the Hebrew language, they rather derive teonenu from anan, a cloud, imagining Moses to forbid them to mark the flying of the clouds, or to make observations from their motions; which was a thing common among the gentiles. But Maimonides, who, in the eleventh chapter of Avoda Zara interprets it, as we do, of observing times, by esteeming one day fortunate, and another unfortunate, mentions another notion of this word from ain, an eye; and saith, in the same treatise, that jugglers, who delude men's sight, in playing their tricks, are comprehended under the name of meonim. And there are those also, who, deriving this word from anah, to answer, think it intends such as pretended to tell their fortunes.

I shall not determine which of these is most likely; but only observe, that there was no superstition of this sort more ancient than that of astrology, which was in use among the old Chaldeans, who pretended to cast men's nativities (as we speak), and thence to tell their fortunes. But this sort of men were rejected, as Strabo tells us, lib. xv. by the astronomers of that country, and so they were by the best philosophers in other nations, as Tully tells us, who calls their pretences Chaldæorum Monstra, lib. ii. de Divin. And therefore, no wonder God cautions his own people against them, as he doth not only here, but by his prophets, especially Jeremiah x. 2, 3. "Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them," &c. But then this caution was most necessary, when they were going captives into that country, which at that time was undoubtedly infected with this error, but may be thought, perhaps, not to have been so in the days of Moses; and therefore I say no more of it, but this, that all those whom we call jugglers, were sometimes comprehended under the name of Chaldeans; who seemed to perform wonderful things, as vomiting fire, and transforming straws into birds, &c. which relate to the other notion of meononu, derived from עין, which signifies an eye; which they deluded by the sleight of their hand, or other means.

Some of the Jews confess, that their nation is at this day extremely addicted to these things. See Wagenseil's Annot. on Sota, p. 529, &c. where he recites a long passage to this purpose, out of Fredericus Franciscus Offingensis, a converted Jew; whom one of his own nation undertaking to confute, he confirmed the charge.

Ver. 27. Ye shall not round the corners of your head.] Or, The ends of the hair of your head. For the Hebrew word peah, which we translate corners, signifies also the ends or extremities of any thing: and the meaning is, they were not to cut their hair equal, behind and before; as the worshippers of the stars and the planets, particularly the Arabians, did, (as R. Levi Barzelonita interprets it, Præcept. cclv.) For this made their head have the form of a hemisphere.

The LXX. translate it οὐ ποιήσετε σισόην ἐκ τῆς κεφαλῆς ὑμῶν. Where sisoe is the same with the Hebrew sisith, which signifies that lock which was left in the hinder part of the head, the rest of the hair being cut in a circle. And thus the ancient Arabians cut their hair, as Herodotus tells us, in imitation of Bacchus. Whence, as Bochartus notes, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 6.) the Idumeans, Ammonites, Moabites, and the rest of the inhabitants of Arabia Deserta, are called circumcised in the corners, i. e. of the head, (Jer. ix. 26.) And the Greek scholiast on that place saith, that in his time the Saracens were so cut.

But there are those who think this refers to a superstitious custom among the gentiles, in their mourning for the dead. For they cut off their hair, and that round about; and threw it into the sepulchre with the bodies of their relations and friends; and sometimes laid it upon the face, or the breast of the dead, as an offering to the infernal gods, whereby they thought to appease them, and make them kind to the deceased. For that this relates to the dead, is probable from the like law, repeated Deut. xiv. 1. and from the next verse to this. (See Maimonides de Idol. cap. 12. 1, 2. 5.)

Neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard.] There were five corners (as their phrase is) of their beards; one on either cheek, and one on either lip, and one below the chin: none of which, much less all, they might shave off, as the manner of the idolatrous priests was; if we may believe Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevoch. cap. 37. But if the former have respect to their mourning for the dead, I do not see why this should not also be so interpreted; the gentiles being wont (as Theodoret observes) to shave their beards, and smite their cheeks, at the funerals of their friends.

Ver. 28. Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh.] Either with their nails, or with knives, or other sharp instruments; as the manner of the heathen was.

For the dead.] To pacify the infernal spirits, and make them propitious to the dead; which was the end at which the gentiles aimed in slashing themselves. Otherwise, simple tearing their flesh out of great grief and anguish of spirit doth not seem to be prohibited, no more than tearing off their hair; which were in use among the Jews, without any offence against this law, Jer. xvi. 6, 7. xli. 5. and other places. (See Maimon. de Idol. cap. 13. sect. 10—13. I. Gerard. Vossius de Idol. p. 209. edit. 1. and Gierus de luctu Hebræorum, cap. 10. sect. 2, 3.) Huetius thinks that law of Solon's, which was transcribed by the Romans into the twelve tables, that women in mourning should not scratch their cheeks, had its original from this law of Moses. (Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 12. n. 2.)

Nor print any mark upon you.] If this refer to the dead (as the foregoing prohibition doth), then these marks were made by the gentiles in their flesh, at the funeral of their friends; that, by the compunction and pain they felt in their bodies, they might appease the infernal powers. And so Aben Ezra understands it: though there be no footsteps, that I can find, of this, in any other author; but it is probable only from what goes before. There is far greater reason for another exposition, that these prints were made in the flesh, that they who had them might be known to belong to such or such a god. For it was the custom of idolaters, saith the often named R. Levi, (Præcept. cclvii.) to devote themselves to their gods by notes or signs, signifying they were their servants (for every one knows, in future times, slaves had marks set upon them to certify to whom they belonged), redeemed with their price, and stamped with their marks. And these marks were made with a hot iron, in their hands, foreheads, or necks; or they were pricked with a needle dipped in glastum, as he says, which made blue spots in their skin; as the manner was among the Arabians, especially the Scenitæ. And they expressed either the very name of the god, to whose service they were consecrated, or else, by a proper character, denoted whom they honoured: as a thunderbolt signified they were devoted to Jupiter; a spear or helmet to Mars; a trident to Neptune, &c. And these were signs (or sacraments, as we may call them) whereby they were solemnly addicted to their worship.

It is possible there might be some nations then that made some marks in their flesh as an ornament to them: for at this day the women in Greenland do not paint their faces, which are very swarthy, but stigmatize them in several places, by drawing a needle and thread dipped in whales' grease through the skin, in what figure they please. Such Tho. Bartholinus saith he had seen; though he fancied they did not this as an ornament, but in token they were marriageable; for they that were not, had no such marks. (Anatom. Histor. Cent. iv. Hist. 90.) But if any such thing were in use in ancient times, it easily might degenerate into the idolatrous custom beforementioned: for nothing more certain than that they made such marks in honour of Mars, the god of battle; and that he who devoted himself to Hercules, received στίγματα ἱερὰ, ἑαυτὸν διδοὺς τῷ θεῷ, sacred marks, giving up himself to that god; as Herodotus speaks (lib. ii. cap. 13.) of one that fled to his temple in Egypt. And Lucian saith of the priests of the Syrian goddess, στίζονται δὲ πάντες, &c. they were all marked; some in their wrists, others in their necks: from whence all the Assyrians στιγματηφοροῦσι, carry such brands, or marks, in their flesh. And so are the Jews, that were initiated in the Egyptian rites, said (by the author of the third book of Maccabees) to be stigmatized with the leaves of ivy, which were the insignia of Bacchus. From which ancient practice, it is probable, Christians have derived the custom of printing the Jerusalem cross upon the arms of those who go to visit our Saviour's sepulchre. (See Tollius in Carmina inedita Gregor. Nazianz. p. 160.) I shall add no more, but that the Jews themselves were so inclined to receive such a badge as this, that they made no scruple to print the name of their own God in their flesh; as appears by that saying mentioned by Schickard out of the title Sopherim: "If any man write the name of God upon his flesh, let him neither wash nor anoint in that place." (See his Mishpat Hamelek, cap. ii. Theor. 5. and Carpzovius's Annotations upon it.)

I am the Lord.] For this reason such marks were forbidden, because the Israelites were peculiarly devoted to him, as their sovereign Lord and Benefactor (for the Syriac adds your God), and therefore were not to own any other but him, whose mark they had received in circumcision; which made all other absolutely unlawful.

Ver. 29. Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore.] It is scarce to be imagined that any man would prostitute his daughter, to be a common strumpet; though he might possibly overlook the lewdness to which she had given up herself. Therefore here, in all probability, is prohibited the exposing their daughters, as a piece of religion, to the service of such filthy deities, as were worshipped in those days, by acts of uncleanness in their temples. For which purpose both men and women were there kept as persons consecrated to such uses. Our great Selden hath observed something of this in his discourse upon Succoth-Benoth. (See Syntagma de Diis Syris, ii. cap. 7.)

Those are fanciful interpretations which R. Eliezer and R. Akiba make of these words; who say, a man prostitutes his daughter who did not get her a husband when she was marriageable; or married her to an old man. (Gem. Sanhedrin, cap. 9. n. 1.)

Lest the land fall to whoredom.] Unto which nothing could contribute so much as to make whoredom a piece of religion.

And the land become full of wickedness.] By such abominable idolatries (as St. Peter calls them), and many other foul sins, particularly murders, which flowed from hence; as Maimonides observes in his More Nevochim. par. iii. cap. 49.

Ver. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths.] Not the days consecrated by the gentiles to the service of their gods; but the solemn days which I have appointed for the remembrance of my benefits. (See ver. 2.)

And reverence my sanctuary.] This reverence consisted principally in coming to it so prepared as the law required; in such purity and cleanness as was there prescribed: and then behaving themselves there with an awful humility. But the better to secure this reverence, the masters in Israel ordained, that no man should come into the mountain of the house with a staff, or a sword, or a girdle with a purse, or with shoes on his feet; and that no man should spit there, nor make it a thoroughfare; nor go out of it with his back towards the sanctuary, but go backward leisurely with his face towards it, till he was out of the gate, &c. So Maimonides in his Beth Habbechira, cap. 7. R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. ccxxi. and see Petrus Cunæus, lib. ii. cap. 12. de Republ. Hebr.

But the great thing which secured the reverence due to the sanctuary, was, that which I mentioned at first, the strict purity from all legal defilements, with which they were to be prepared; which made it very difficult to be in a condition to approach it. For when there were so many ways of being defiled, and so much time required to make men clean again, and so many things, in many cases, to be done for that purpose, it was not possible that they should be fit to come thither very often, without exceeding great care and diligence; as I observed before out of Maimonides, (par. iii. More Nevoch. cap. 47.) which very much tended to preserve their reverence to the sanctuary: for men led by sense, as they were, make nothing of those places to which they may go when they please; but those to which they cannot be admitted, without much solemnity, and only at certain times, and after great pains to fit themselves for it, they are apt to have in great esteem.

I am the Lord.] Whose majesty dwelt in that house; unto which therefore nobody might approach, either for prayer or for sacrifice, without an awful sense of him. For so Maimonides explains it in the place now named; "the sanctuary itself was not be reverenced, but He who commanded that reverence."

Nor did this reverence belong only to the tabernacle or temple, instituted by God's express command, for that ceremonial service, which was unlawful to be performed any where else (for then it might seem proper only to that ceremonial dispensation, and to be now vanished under the gospel); but the perpetual practice of the Jewish nation shews, that they thought themselves obliged by this precept to use reverence in their synagogues, which were neither instituted by any written precept of the law, nor for any ceremonial service, which was confined to the temple, but for public assemblies, to hear the law read and expounded, and to offer the prayers of the people to God; for in the Psalms of Asaph (where there is the only mention we find of synagogues in the Old Testament), they are called, not only houses and assemblies of God, but also sanctuaries (as the word is here in Moses), Psal. lxxiii. 17. lxxiv. 4. 7, 8. lxxxiii. 12. See Mr. Thorndike in his Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 213.

Ver. 31. Regard not them.] Do not go to consult them; nor follow their directions.

That have familiar spirits.] It is uncertain what is here meant by oboth, which we translate familiar spirits. But the word ob signifying a bottle, or hollow vessel, (Job xxxii. 19.) the Jews think it probable that oboth here signifies such as the Greeks call Ἐγγαστρίμυθοι, who had a spirit or demon speaking out of the belly, or chest, with a hollow voice, as if it came out of a bottle. So the woman whom Saul went to consult, is called baalath ob, a mistress of such a spirit; where, it is plain, ob signifies the spirit, or demon, (see chap. xx. 27.) and he or she that had familiarity with such a spirit, was properly called baal, or baalath ob, the master or mistress who possessed it, and gave answers by it, with a voice that seemed to come out of the lower parts of the belly. In one place, indeed, the LXX. translate it, οἱ ἐκ τῆς γῆς φωνοῦντες, (Isa. xix. 3.) They that speak out of the earth; because the voice coming from the lower parts of her that was possessed, seemed to come out of the earth; as Mr. Selden explains it in de Diis Syris.

R. Levi Barzelonita saith, the manner of it was thus: (Præcept. cclviii.) After certain fumes, and other ceremonies, a voice seemed to come from under the arm-holes (so he takes it, and so it is said in Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 7.) of the person that had the familiar spirit, which answered to the questions which were asked. For this he quotes Siphra. But if it came from under the arm-holes, still it was so low and hollow, as if it had been out of the bottom of the belly, or the cavities of the earth. Others imagine such persons had the name of oboth, because they were swelled with the spirit, as a bladder is when it is blown. However it was, this continued till the times of the gospel, as appears from Acts xvi. 16. for she that had the spirit of Python was the same with an ἐγγαστρίμυθος, as Plutarch informs us. (See Casaubon and L. de Dieu on that place.) The famous Pythia, who delivered the oracles of Apollo, sat over a hole, and by her secret parts received the spirit which swelled her, and made her utter oracles; as Origen observes, lib. vii. contra Celsum; and St. Chrysostom, Hom. xxix. in 1 Epist. ad Corinth. (See Beyerus in his Annot. upon Selden de Diis Syris, p. 226, &c.)

There are those that look upon all that these authors say as old stories, to which no credit is to be given. But Aug. Eugabinus affirms, that he himself had seen such women, called ventriloquæ (which is the same with the Greek ἐγγαστρίμυθοι), from whom, as they sat, a voice came out of their secret parts, and gave answers to inquiries. And Cælius Rhodoginus (lib. viii. Antiq. Lect. cap. 10.) saith, this is not to be entertained with laughter; for not only he saw such a woman, and heard a very small voice coming out of her belly, but innumerable other people, not only at Rhodigium, but in a manner through all Italy; among whom there were many great persons (who had her stripped naked, that they might be sure there was no fraud), to whom a voice answered unto such things as they inquired. Hieron. Oleaster also, upon Isa. xxiv. 4. saith, he saw such an one at Lisbon, from under whose arm-holes, and other parts of her, a small voice was heard, which readily answered to whatever was asked.

Neither seek after wizards.] The Hebrew word jideonim, importing knowledge, as all confess, signifies such as we call cunning men; who pretended to tell what was lost, or what fortune people should have; and these were men (as far as I can judge), as the other were mostly women, who held intelligence with some demon; for this word seems to have the very same derivation in Hebrew which the other hath in Greek, for all say Δαίμονες are as much as δαήμονες, knowers; and jideonim are as much as joadim, which is the very same, futurorum conscii, as Mr. Selden observes; and so the LXX. translate it, γνῶσται, (2 Kings xxi. 7.) though here and chap. xx. ult. they render it ἐπαοιδοὶ, and elsewhere τερατοσκόποι. This knowledge they pretended to obtain (as some think) by looking into the entrails of their sacrifices; or, as Maimonides will have it, by putting the bone of a certain bird, called jaduà, into their mouths, with certain fumes and adjurations, which made them fall into an ecstacy, and foretell things to come. (R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cclix.) And there are those who think that these jideonim were such as pretended by charms to cure diseases, &c. of which we can have no certainty, and it seems to rely only on the LXX. in this place, who, as I observed, translate it by a more general word in another.

To be defiled by them.] With the foulest sins. For seeking to these was a forsaking of God, and one peculiar kind of idolatry; and therefore they that were guilty of it were to be stoned (as the same R. Levi observes) if they committed this sin knowingly, and there were witnesses of it. If there were no witnesses, then they were left to God to be cut off by his hand, (chap. xx. 6.)

I am the Lord your God.] Unto whom you are to seek for all that you desire.

Ver. 32. Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head.] That they might accustom themselves to modesty and humility, (as Maimonides glosses upon this law, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36.) for the maintenance of which the usage was, they say, to rise up to them, when they were at the distance of four cubits; and as soon as they were gone by, to sit down again; that it might appear they rose up purely in respect to them. To this nature directed all civilized people; who anciently, as Juvenal says, (Sat. xiii.) believed this a great wickedness, to be punished with death, if a young man did not rise up to an old.

> "Credebant hoc grande nefas, et morte piandum, > Si juvenis vetulo non assurrexerat"——

And such a law there was established among the Lacedemonians, τοὺς γέροντας αἰσχυνέσθωσαν οὐδὲν ἧττον ἢ πατέρας, that aged persons should be reverenced no less than if they were their fathers. And so Plato, πᾶς αἰδείσθω τὸν ἑαυτοῦ πρεσβύτερον ἔργῳ καὶ ἔπει, let every one reverence him that is elder than himself, in deed and in word, (lib. ix. de Legibus,

p. 875.) where he requires that a youth should honour a stranger that was his ancient; and hath this memorable saying, Καλλωπίζεσθαι χρὴ τῷ καλῶς δουλεύσαι, &c. that youth should glory more in obeying well, than in ruling well: and first of all in obeying the laws; for this is all one with serving God; and next in giving honour to old men; and to those especially, who have passed their days honourably and with glory. (See more to this purpose in Henricus Stephanus de Juris Civilis Font. et Rivis.) And there was the greater reason for this reverence towards old men in this nation, there being nothing else among them but age and experience that could distinguish them; for they were all equally noble, and equally rich; of the same profession, and brought up in the same manner.

And honour the face of the old man.] Or, of the elder; that is, or those who are skilful in the law, as the Jews interpret it; and I see no reason to contradict it (as some have done), since he speaks of aged persons before. See Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 14. where he deduces this at large: and another excellent writer of our own, Mr. Thorndike, in his Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 214, &c. "For if such as taught the law had not been honoured before men, nobody would have minded their words, nor received what they propounded, about things to be known or to be done;" as Maimonides's words are, in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36. And it made no difference of what age he was, whether an old man or a young (for some elders, it appears by Daniel, were not aged); but the same honour was given to him, even by wise men, as R. Levi Barzelonita shews, (Præcept. ccxxii.)

And fear thy God.] This is the fountain of all virtue; particularly of the forementioned; God having imprinted a venerable character upon those who are grown aged, especially on such as are wise, and instruct others in virtue. But some of the Hebrews think that in this verse there are three degrees of honour enjoined to three ranks of men; one to the aged; the next to the wise and learned; and the third to the judges; who they imagine are here meant by Elohim (God) whom they are commanded to fear or reverence.

I am the Lord.] Most high above all; and therefore greatly to be feared.

Ver. 33. And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him.] Not so much as by upbraiding him with his being a stranger, or his having worshipped idols heretofore; for of such a stranger they understand this, as was become a proselyte to their religion. (See chap. xvii. 8. 12, 13. and Exod. xxii. 21.) But common humanity teaches every body to be kind to all manner of strangers, and not merely to refrain from oppressing them, or giving them vexation. Plato hath most excellent discourses about this in several places; particularly lib. v. de Legibus, where he shews, that God is the avenger of all wrongs done to strangers, more than of those that are done to our fellow-citizens: Ἔρημος γὰρ ὢν ὁ ξένος ἑταίρων, &c. For a stranger being destitute of friends and kindred, is the greater object of pity, both of men and of God; and therefore, he that can hurt most, should be most ready to help him, &c. (See p. 729, 730. edit. Serrani.) Upon which account he makes it lawful for a stranger to pluck any of the best fruit, as he is upon his way, whether grapes, figs, or apples, &c. (lib. viii. p. 845.) And the corn being divided, as he would have it, into twelve parts; and a twelfth part divided into three; he orders one of those third parts to be given to strangers, p. 847, 848. Τὸν γὰρ εἰσεπιδημήσαντα χρὴ φιλοφρονεῖσθαι, for a stranger or sojourner ought to be comforted, in a most friendly manner, &c. (See lib. xii. p. 952, 953.)

Ver. 34. But the stranger that dwelleth with thee shall be as one born among you.] They understand this only of such a stranger, who by circumcision was become a perfect proselyte; whom they were to be so far from oppressing, that they were to treat him as if he had been a native Jew, and love him as a brother.

And thou shalt love him as thyself.] He had commanded them, (ver. 18.) to love their neighbour, i. e. an Israelite (they expound it), as themselves; and now he commands them to love a stranger with the same affection; which demonstrates, they think, he was become an Israelite; and therefore was to have the same privileges with themselves, both in all civil and sacred things. And this, no doubt, was true, that they were bound to treat such a proselyte with a tender affection, and to make no difference between him and an Israelite. For he was to be admitted to eat of the paschal lamb, and of the peace-offering, and he might marry with an Israelite; insomuch, that Moses saith, one ordinance shall be for both, (Numb. xv. 15.) All the difference I can find was, that they never admitted any stranger to be a member of the great Sanhedrin. But notwithstanding all this, I cannot think it reasonable to exclude all other strangers from their affection; but they were bound to love them, and to be kind to them, though not to embrace them with such a strict friendship as the other. And, to confirm this, it may be observed, that in the fourth commandment, the stranger within their gate signifies, as they confess, not him that was a perfect proselyte, but only one that had renounced idolatry: and so they understand the word stranger in the twenty-fifth chapter of this book, (ver. 47.) and I see no reason why such a stranger should not be admitted here to have a share in their affection, who was become a worshipper of the true God, though he had not taken upon him to observe the whole law.

For ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.] This reason is little less than a demonstration, that such strangers as I now mentioned are comprehended in the foregoing precept. For the remembrance of what their condition was in Egypt, is that whereby they are moved to have pity on those whom they found among themselves in the same; and they and the Egyptians were not of the same religion, but they found such kind entertainment there a long time, as they were to give to those who were of their religion.

This argument indeed became stronger, when any persons were incorporated with them, and became more one with them than they were with the Egyptians; but was of great force to procure kindness to those who did not live by their laws.

I am the Lord your God.] Who have done so much for you when you were mere strangers, that you should not stick to be kind to those who are in the like condition.

Ver. 35. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment.] The Hebrews refer this word judgment to all the following particulars; and think that Moses uses it here to shew of what moment this law is, which he calls doing judgment; so that he who measures or weighs hath the office of a judge: and if he commit any fraud in his measures or weights, he is a corrupter of judgment, and is called wicked, abominable, accursed. They are the words of R. Levi Barzelonita, Præcept. cclx. where he adds, that such men are the cause of five mischiefs, which are imputed to unjust judges: "who defile the land; profane the name of God; remove the presence of the Divine Majesty; bring a sword upon the people; and at last carry them captive out of their own country." And therefore great punishments have been enacted in all countries against this crime, as destructive to human society; particularly Justinian ordained that such offenders should be beaten ἰσχυρῶς ὡς ἀσεβεῖς sorely, as impious people.

In mete-yard.] By which they measured lands, cloth, and such-like things; for middah (as Fosterus observes) is the measure of continued quantity, viz. in things dry.

In weight.] By which they paid and received money in those days; and sold brass and iron, and things of like nature.

Or in measure.] The Hebrew word mesurah (from whence seems to come the Latin mensura, and our English word measure) denotes the measure of discrete quantity (as we speak), as of corn; and of all continued fluid quantity, as of wine and oil. And the forenamed R. Levi will have it to signify the very least of such measures; about which, saith he, the law concerns itself, that men should be exact in them, as well as in the greatest. And so Hesychius here notes, that Moses provides against all injustice in small things, as well as in great; for what the possession of a field or a house is to a wealthy man, that the measure of wine or corn, or the weight of bread, is to the poor, who have daily need of such things for the support of their life.

Ver. 36. Just balances, just weights.] This verse only positively requires strict justice in those things, wherein the former verse forbade all deceit. And these two words refer to things sold by weight.

A just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have.] These two words, ephah and hin, comprehend all sorts of measures of things, whether wet or dry. And, that they might have such just weights and measures among them, the standard of them was kept in the sanctuary, by which all were to be governed; as appears from 1 Chron. xxiii. 29. (See Exod. xxx. 13.) The Jewish doctors also say, that it was a constitution of their wise men, for the preventing all fraud in these matters, that no weights, balances, or measures should be made of any metal, as of iron, lead, tin, &c. (which were obnoxious to rust, or might be bent, or easily impaired), but of marble, stone, or glass, which were less liable to be abused.

For these constitutions Moses was so famous, that his name was celebrated on the account of them in other nations. Nay, Lucius Ampelius (a rude kind of writer, but who had collected much out of better authors) saith, that Mochus was the inventor of scales and weights; and that his memory is preserved in the constellation called Libra. Now if for Mochus we read Moschos, it is the very name of Moses in Hebrew (viz. Moscheh), who is called so by other authors, as the learned Huetius observes in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 7. n. 16.

I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt.] This is the general reason for their obedience; which is repeated in this chapter above a dozen times. Sometimes more briefly, I am the Lord; and sometimes a little larger, I am the Lord your God: and here with this addition, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. Whereby he in a special manner demonstrates himself, both to be their Lord (faithful to his promise, Exod. vi. 3.) and their God, who obliged them to his service, by the most singular benefit.

Ver. 37. Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them.] These words, statutes and judgments, comprehend all the laws of God: some of which were prohibitions, which they were to mark and observe diligently, so as to abstain from such things; and other precepts, or commands, which they were to practise, and do according to them.

I am the Lord.] No more need be said to engage your obedience in every thing than this, that I am your sovereign, and the sovereign of the whole world.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Some time after the delivery of the laws mentioned in the two foregoing chapters, the chief of them were enforced with the addition of penalties, which are set down in this chapter.

Ver. 2. Again thou shalt say to the children of Israel.] Repeat what I said before, (chap. xviii. 21.) and add this which follows unto it.

Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth among you.] The proselytes, who had embraced their religion, were no less concerned in this law than the native Israelites: (see chap. xvii. 8. 10, &c.)

That giveth any of his seed unto Moloch.] This looks like the prohibition before given, (chap. xviii. 21.) and R. Levi gives this reason of its repetition—because it was a piece of idolatrous worship so usual in those days, when the law was delivered, that there needed great endeavours to preserve them from it, (Præcept. ccviii.) And Maimonides also observes, (as I noted upon chap. xviii. 21.) that idolaters used to fright people into this worship, by telling them their children would die, if they did not make them pass through the fire, and thereby devote them to their gods. But upon due consideration of these words, it may appear probable, that there is something more in them than in the former; importing a higher degree of this sin. For to give their children to Moloch, seems to be no less than to offer them in sacrifices (so Christ giving himself for us, constantly signifies in the New Testament), which was a more horrid thing than merely making them pass through the fire, which did them no hurt. And therefore this crime is here forbidden under the penalty of death; whereas in the eighteenth chapter no punishment is threatened. Certain it is, children were really burnt upon the altars of the ancient pagans, especially in times of great distress, when they hoped to pacify the anger of their gods, by offering to them the dearest thing they had: see our great Selden, lib. de Diis Syris Syntagm. i. cap. 6. where he shews the Phœnicians offered their children to Saturn, (so Porphyrius expressly says, lib. i. de Abstin.) who is said by the poets to have devoured his own children; and by many is thought to be the same with Moloch. Though others take it for the sun, to whom it is certain human sacrifices were offered. Many authors make mention of it; and Eben Batrich thinks such sacrifices began in the days of Serug, and were first used among the Syrians. Which is a very probable opinion, as Johan. Geusius hath demonstrated, (lib. de Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 4, 5.) And it is easy to conceive how, from the Syrians, this abominable practice was derived to the Phœnicians, who worshipped the sun under the name of Baal, or Bel, as Herodian (lib. viii.) testifies. Which doth not contradict what others say, that they were devoted to the worship of Hercules: for by him is meant the sun also, as his very name imports, viz. Or-col, which in that language signifies as much as him that illuminates all things. From the Phœnicians this worship of offering human sacrifices was propagated to the Carthaginians, and other people of Africa, among whom this impious idolatry continued till the time of Hannibal; as Bochartus gathers out of Silius Italicus: (lib. iv.)

> "Mos fuit in populis quos condidit advena Dido, > Poscere cæde Deos veniam, ac flagrantibus aris,
> Infandum dictu, parvos imponere natos."

Who says, the Carthaginians were wont to appease their gods, by burning their children on their altars: and then follows (after the words now mentioned) the lamentation of Imilce the wife of Hannibal, whose son was, by lot, to be sacrificed, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 28.) And this wicked custom continues still to this day, among some of the people in the southern parts of Africa, as good authors affirm; it having spread itself all over the world (as appears by the discoveries that have been made in America), even into the northern countries of Scythia. But I shall content myself with observing only what the Scripture saith concerning a people in the east, called Sepharvites, who "burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech," 2 Kings xvii. 31. which god seems to have been the same with Moloch, here mentioned by Moses; only with the addition of an epithet, signifying their opinion of him: for adra is as much as potent, or mighty: and therefore Melech signifying a king, Adramelech is in our language mighty king. Now, that the children of Israel, notwithstanding this severe prohibition against it, imitated this barbarous worship, is evident from 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 31. xix. 5. Psal. cvi. 37, 38. and we may very well think the prophet Micah also alludes to it, chap. vi. 7. as Isaiah, lvii. 5, 6. and Ezekiel, xvi. 20, 21. 36. xxiii. 37. 39. likewise do.

The manner of sacrificing their children, and the figure of the idol to which they offered, are described by many, according to the Jewish notion; particularly by Paulus Fagius out of Jalkut: who makes it a hollow image, having seven apartments in it (according to the number, I suppose, of the seven planets), into one of which, viz. the lowest, the infant was thrown when it was red hot; as flour, a turtle-dove, a sheep, &c. were into the rest. We can have no certainty of this; but such kind of statues were found in the West Indies when they were discovered, as Ludovicus Vives observes in lib. vi. cap. 19. de Civitate Dei. And Diodorus Siculus, in his Bibliotheca, lib. xx. describes the statue of Saturn among the Carthaginians, as stretching forth its hands down towards the earth; so that the child which was put into it might roll and fall, εἰς τὸ χάσμα πλῆρες πυρὸς, into a gulf full of fire. Benjamin Tudelensis in his travels (about five hundred years ago) affirms, that, in some islands in the east, the worshippers of fire were wont to leap into it, in performance of some solemn vow, and were counted by all to be happy men. Which I mention here, because he says these fires were kindled in a valley, as those among the Jews were in the valley of Hinnom, (p. 108, 109.)

He shall surely be put to death.] Sufficient proof being made of the fact, (Deut. xvii. 6.)

The people of the land shall stone him with stones.] Which was the proper punishment in this, and in some other cases; particularly adultery, (ver. 10.) and blasphemy, (chap. xxiv. 14, &c.) The manner of it is described out of a Hebrew MS. (Ez Hechajim.) by J. Wagenseil, upon Sota, cap. 3. to have been thus: he that was to be punished with stoning was stripped naked, having only a covering before, and set upon a high place, attended by the witnesses against him, his hands being bound: one of the witnesses giving him a strong push, threw him down headlong from thence. If this fall killed him, there was an end; but if life remained in him, the witnesses took up a stone, which was laid there on purpose, as big as two men could lift, and threw it upon him; and before he quite expired, all the people that stood by threw stones at him, according to the law, (Deut. xvii. 7.) A woman was only stripped to her shift.

Ver. 3. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people.] In case, that is, there was not sufficient proof against him, God threatens that he himself would take care to punish him, by cutting him off from the land of the living. R. Bechai, and others, observe, that this cutting off is threefold in the law: one is, the cutting off the body, i. e. shortening men's lives; which is threatened to six sins in Scripture. The second is, the excision of the soul only; which is threatened by Moses six-and-twenty times, and particularly to incestuous marriages. The third is, excision both of soul and body; which is threatened to fifteen sins; among which they reckon this, of giving their children to Moloch: (see Selden, lib. vii. de Jure N. et G. sec. Heb. cap. 9. p. 828, 829, &c.)

To defile my sanctuary.] By this sin God's sanctuary was defiled, as well as his holy name profaned, because they sacrificed to Moloch in other places, despising the tabernacle, which was the only place appointed by God where Divine service was to be performed. And therein consisted part of the honour and reverence which God required to his sanctuary, (chap. xix. 30.) that it should be looked upon as the only place where acceptable sacrifices could be offered to him. And therefore, then it was dishonoured and defiled, when they offered sacrifice in any other place, as they did, in aftertimes, to Moloch in the valley of Hinnom, as I observed before, 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Where they built high places to Baal (which is another name for the sun), on purpose that they might offer their children upon them, (Jer. xx. 5, 6. xxxii. 35.) This was a plain contempt of God, and of his sanctuary, which they forsook, as if it had not been a holy, but a defiled place. Otherwise they would have kept to it, and offered no where else, nor after any other manner than according to the rites thereof.

And to profane my holy name.] By giving the name of God and his honour to such an abominable idol.

Ver. 4. If the people of the land.] In that part of the country where this crime was committed.

Do any way hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Moloch, and kill him not.] If they connived at what he did, and dissembled their knowledge of it; or would not speak the whole truth, and endeavour to convict him of this foul crime, that he might be stoned.

Ver. 5. Then will I set my face against that man, and against his family.] As the idolater was liable to this punishment from the hand of Heaven, (see ver. 3.) so they that favoured him, and would not testify against him when they knew him guilty, fell under God's high displeasure (which is meant by setting his face against them), and so did all their children, whom God threatens to destroy. He speaks, indeed, in the singular number, because commonly, in such cases, there was some one person by whose authority others were persuaded to wink at such offences, and not to discover what they knew of them. But all such men are threatened with the Divine vengeance in the next words.

And will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, &c.] That is, all others, who, following his example, favour such idolaters, and protect them from punishment. For every one knows that idolatry is called by the name of whoredom in Scripture; because God having espoused the Israelites to himself, as his peculiar people, their forsaking him, to serve other gods, was a spiritual adultery.

To commit whoredom with Moloch.] i. e. To worship him as their god.

Ver. 6. And the soul.] i. e. The person.

That turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards.] Who they were that pretended to have familiar spirits, or were wizards, see chap. xix. 31. where they are commanded not to regard them; and here, if any did consult them (which is called turning after them), cutting off is threatened to them; that is, shortening their days: for such persons are reckoned by the Jews as the chief of those six sorts of sinners, who were liable to the first kind of excision, which I mentioned ver. 3. As for the man himself who had a familiar spirit, or was a wizard, he was to be stoned, if he was discovered and convicted, (ver. 27.) And so they observe in Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 7.

To go a whoring after them.] It was a kind of idolatry to seek to such people for advice or relief; being a forsaking of God, and putting confidence in them. Though sometimes to go a whoring, signifies the commission of any grievous sin, which idolatry usually led men unto; as Mr. Selden hath noted, lib. iii. de Uxore Hebr. cap. 23.

There is some reason to think, there was something magical in the oblation of their children to Moloch; and that thereby they consulted with demons about things future or secret; because such superstitions are here immediately forbidden, after the prohibition of giving their children to Moloch; and because they are frequently joined together in other places, as in Deut. xviii. 10, 11. 2 Kings xvii. 17. and xxi. 6. Certain it is, that in aftertimes they did sacrifice children, ὑπὲρ μαντικῆς, that they might divine, by looking into their bowels; as Joh. Geusius hath shewn out of Porphyrius, Philostratus, Herodotus, and others, lib. de Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 17.

I will even set my face against that soul, &c.] See ver. 3. 5.

Ver. 7. Sanctify yourselves therefore.] Worship therefore God alone; to whose service you are set apart.

And be ye holy.] Keep yourselves free from all idolatry. (See chap. xi. 44.)

I am the Lord your God.] See chap. xix. 2, 3. 10, &c.

Ver. 8. And ye shall keep my statutes, and do them.] Be governed by these laws, and not by the customs of other people.

I am the Lord which sanctified you.] Separated you to myself from all other people, by peculiar laws which I have given you.

Ver. 9. For every one.] Or, if any one; the particle we translate for signifying frequently with, or if.

That curseth his father or mother.] Reproacheth them with imprecations.

Shall surely be put to death.] i. e. Be stoned. And it made no difference, whether he cursed them when they were alive, or after their death, as R. Levi Barzelonita says, the rule of their doctors was; yet they resolve, that, unless he cursed them by some proper name of God, he was not liable to be put to death, but only to be scourged, (Præcept. cclxi.) See Exod. xxi. 17.

His blood shall be upon him.] When the law only saith, a man shall die the death, the Jews understand it of strangling; which was the easiest punishment among them. For where there was not an express mention of the kind of death, they thought the most favourable was to be inflicted. But when the law adds, his blood shall be upon him, they say, it is meant of stoning: and the meaning of this phrase is, he shall perish by his own fault; and therefore his blood, that is, his death, shall not be vindicated. The blood of one that was slain, being innocent, was upon the murderer, and therefore avenged; but he that was put to death for his crimes, had his blood upon himself, and nobody was to bear it, the executioner himself being not guilty of blood.

Ver. 10. And the man that committeth adultery with another man's wife, &c.] By the ancient law of Draco and Solon, the husband of the adulteress, if he found them in the fact, might kill them both, or put out their eyes, or stigmatize them; or make the adulterer pay a fine, if he had a mind to spare his life. See Meursius in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 4, 5. and the Leges Atticæ, set forth by Petitus, lib. vi. tit. 4. where it appears, that it was infamous for the husband to live with his wife after she had committed adultery; and that it was unlawful for her to enter into the public temples, or go dressed in the streets. If she did, any body might tear off her clothes, and beat her, only not kill her. (See S. Petiti Comment. p. 460, &c.)

The adulterer and adulteress shall surely be put to death.] It is not left to the husband's liberty, by this law, whether he would spare their lives or not; but the fact being proved, they were both to die for it: only it is not said here what kind of death they should suffer; nor was the same kind of death inflicted upon all that were guilty of this crime; for, if the daughter of a priest played the adulteress, she was to be burnt, (chap. xxi. 9.) and the adulterer to be strangled, as the Jews understand it. If a man lay with a virgin espoused to another man, but not yet married, they were both to be stoned, by the express words of the law, (Deut. xxii. 23.) But adultery with a married woman, if we may credit the Jewish doctors, was punished with strangling. (See Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 2.) For when we meet with this phrase, they shall surely die, it is always meant of death by the sentence of the house of judgment (as they speak), and if the law add no more, they resolve it to be by strangling. If these words be added, their blood shall be upon them, then, they say, they were to be stoned. This I observed before; and shall add now, that strangling, as they describe it, was not such a punishment as our hanging men by the neck; but the criminal being stuck up to the knees in dung, they tied a napkin about his neck, and drawing it hard at both ends, choked him. There was such a thing as hanging men on a gallows (as we speak), but it was after they were dead, and only such as had been stoned; and not all of them neither, but such alone as had been stoned for blasphemy or idolatry. (See Joh. Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. xiv.)

The greatest thing that can be objected against this account of the punishment of adultery, is that which St. John tells us the Jews said concerning the woman taken in the very act of it, "Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned," (John viii. 5.) But it may be answered, that this woman was espoused only, and not yet married; and so, by the law, as I observed before, was to be stoned, (Deut. xxii. 23, 24.) If this seem absurd, that the adultery of one espoused should be accounted a greater crime than of one married (for stoning was a heavier punishment than strangling), it ought to be considered, that the love of those who were newly espoused, was commonly more fervent than theirs who were married, especially among the Jews, who for light causes were wont to be divorced from their wives; and therefore no wonder if the adultery of the former was judged a greater crime than of the latter.

Ver. 11. And the man that lieth with his father's wife, &c.] This was condemned before as a heinous sin, (chap. xviii. 8.) and now the penalty of death is inflicted upon the offenders.

Their blood shall be upon them.] All the Hebrew doctors agree, that wheresoever we meet with this phrase, it is meant of stoning, as I before observed.

Ver. 12. If a man lie with his daughter-in-law, both of them shall surely be put to death.] This was forbidden, chap. xviii. 15. and the same penalty is here enacted as against the former crime.

They have wrought confusion.] By perverting the order which God hath appointed, and making great disturbance in the family, &c. It is the same word that is used for a more foul sin, (chap. xviii. 23.) and therefore shews this to be an abominable mixture.

Ver. 13. If a man also lie with mankind, &c.] This also was condemned before, (chap. xviii. 22.) but the penalty not declared till now.

They shall surely be put to death, &c.] By stoning; unless one of them was under a force, and then that law took place which we find Deut. xxii. 25, 26.

Ver. 14. And if a man take a wife and her mother, it is wickedness.] See chap. xviii. 17.

They shall be burnt with fire.] Which was a higher punishment than stoning, as that was higher than strangling. R. Levi Barzelonita (Præcept. ccxxiv.) describes the manner of it to have been thus: they set the malefactor in dung up to the knees, and then tied a cloth about his neck, which was drawn by the two witnesses, till they made his mouth gape; into which they poured hot melted lead down his throat, which burnt his bowels. And thus the rest of the Talmudists expound it: but I see no good authority they have for it, the word for burning being the same that is used, when mention is made of burning with fire and faggots, as we speak. And R. Eliezer ben Zadoc saith, he saw a priest's daughter thus burnt for fornication. But the doctors commonly say, the judges were ignorant of the law; or, that they were Sadducees who then had got into the seat of judgment, who followed the very letter of the Scripture.

Both he and they.] That is, both the mother and daughter, if the mother were consenting to it. Otherwise, only the woman that offended. From whence the Karaites formed this rule, "after the same manner that men were obliged by a precept in Scripture, the women were obliged also." (Selden. lib. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 5.)

That there be no wickedness among you.] That others may be deterred from the commission of such enormous crimes: for the Hebrew word imports more than ordinary wickedness. (See chap. xviii. 17.)

Ver. 15. And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death.] See chap. xviii. 23. This death was by stoning, as appears from the next verse.

And ye shall slay the beast.] Just as they were to destroy, not only the inhabitants of an apostate city, but their cattle also, &c. (Deut. xiii. 15, 16.) to terrify others from committing the like sin; and, as the Talmudists observe, that there might be no memorial left of so foul a crime, by men's pointing at the beast, and saying, There goes the beast that such a man lay with. They might have added, to prevent monstrous births. (See Selden, lib. i. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4.) Maimonides gives a good reason, why a beast that killed a man should be slain; as a punishment to the owner, for looking no better after it; but his application of it to this matter seems impertinent, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40.) Bochartus's gloss is far better; the beast was killed as an instrument in the crime, just as a forger of deeds is hanged with his pen and counterfeit seals; and a conjurer with his magical books and characters. And this also is useful for an example, though not to other beasts, yet to men; whose concern it is to consider, that if beasts were not spared, who were not capable of sinning, what would become of them who committed such crimes against the known law of God, and the impressions of nature itself? (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 16.)

Ver. 16. Their blood shall be upon them.] This relates to the man and the woman (mentioned in these two verses), who committed this foul crime; for a beast is not capable of punishment. But, as the canon law speaks, "Pecora inde credendum est jussa interfici, quia tali flagitio contaminata refricant facti memoriam;" it is to be believed, that the beasts which were polluted with such a flagitious wickedness, were therefore commanded to be slain, because they rubbed up the memory of the fact: which is the very reason given of it in the Mischna, Tit. Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 4. And so R. Solomon: "the beast was killed, lest it should be said, There is the beast for which such a woman was put to death."

Ver. 17. If a man shall take his sister, &c.] Whether she was his sister by the whole blood (as we speak), or by half blood only, by the father's side or mother's, he was not permitted to marry her by the law mentioned, chap. xviii. 9.

And see her nakedness.] It is the same with uncovering her nakedness to lie with her; as it is there expressed, and here in the end of the verse (he hath uncovered his sister's nakedness), the sense of seeing being put for that of touching, or any other, in this language.

It is a wicked thing.] A flagitious, or nefarious wickedness, as the Vulgar expresses it. But the Hebrew word chesed signifying sometimes in the prophetical language mercy and indulgence; the Talmudists take these words, as if they came in by a parenthesis, to obviate an objection which might be made, that Cain and Abel married their sisters. True, saith Moses, that was by an indulgence in the beginning, arising from the necessity of things, when there were none but brothers and sisters in the world. But now they shall be cut off in the sight of their people, who marry such near relations. So the Gemara Hierosol. ad Tit. Sanhedrin. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 8. p. 581.) And so the Chaldee paraphrase, ascribed to Jonathan, whose words are these: "It is a filthy thing; but I used an indulgence to the first men by whom the world was to be propagated, until mankind was sufficiently multiplied: after that, whosoever doth any such thing, let him be cut off," &c.

And they shall be cut off in the sight of their people.] Publicly put to death: (see ver. 10.)

He shall bear his iniquity.] i. e. The punishment of it, (chap. v. 1.)

Ver. 18. And if a man shall lie with a woman, having her sickness, &c.] Here the sentence of death is pronounced upon them; whereas in chap. xv. 24. it is only said, the man should be unclean seven days. Therefore many think in that place he speaks of doing this ignorantly, and here of doing it knowingly. But if the man might be ignorant of the condition she was in, the woman herself could scarce be so: and, therefore, others think, when the fact was altogether private, they only incurred a legal impurity for a certain season; but when it was publicly known, and proof made of it before a judge, it was a capital crime, because it was done in contempt and despite of the law; otherwise, it could not have been so publicly known as to be legally proved. Whether this law oblige in the state of Christianity, is at large discussed by Bishop Taylor (not to mention other writers abroad), in his Ductor Dubitant. book ii. chap. 2. rule iii. n. 8. and book iii. chap. 2. rule ii. n. 3, &c.

Ver. 19. And thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister, &c.] See chap. xviii. 12, 13.

They shall bear their iniquity.] It not being said, they shall die, or be cut off (as in the former cases), it hath made some conclude this sin, being not of so high a nature as the foregoing, was punished only as those that follow, (ver. 20, 21.) where they that committed them are threatened to die childless.

Ver. 20. If a man shall lie with his uncle's wife, &c.] See chap. xviii. 14.

They shall die childless.] This is understood by some as if Moses meant they should be put to death, before they could have any fruit of such a conjunction. But most think he only means, that either they should have no children; or that their children should not live, but die before their parents; or be looked upon as a spurious issue, and not inherit their estate; which is the sense St. Austin puts upon these words. And Procopius Gazæus also mentions it; and says this was the Roman law about all incestuous marriages; "Semen eorum non recensebitur inter liberos;" such issue shall not be reckoned among their children.

Ver. 21. And if a man shall take his brother's wife, &c.] See chap. xviii. 16.

They shall be childless.] See ver. 20.

Ver. 22. Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, &c.] Particularly these concerning the foregoing matters. (See chap. xviii. 4, 5.)

That the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spew you not out.] As it did the former inhabitants. (See chap. xviii. 25. 28.)

Ver. 23. And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation which I cast out before you.] viz. Of the Amorites, as the Hebrews rightly expound it; for they were the principal nation in Canaan, and extremely given to idolatry. R. Levi Barzelonita extends this to all their customs, in cutting their hair, and such like, (Præcept. cclxii.) but it seems here particularly to relate to their marriages and idolatry. (See chap. xviii. 3.)

For they committed all these things.] These words shew that the foregoing have particular respect to their abominable marriages and idolatry.

Therefore I abhorred them.] So as to cast them out of their country, (chap. xviii. 25.) Onkelos translates it, my Word [Memri] abominated them. Which is a plain intimation of a notion they had in ancient times of more persons than one in the Deity; and particularly here denotes him whom St. John calls the Word. For Memri (Word) plainly signifies a person in this place; and a person of the same essence with Jehovah.

Ver. 24. But I have said unto you.] Made you a promise.

Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess it, &c.] For he promised to expel the former inhabitants of that country, to make room for them. (See Exod. iii. 8. 17. xxiii. 27, 28. xxxiii. 3.)

I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people.] This may refer either to what goes before, that they should not live like other nations, because he had, by peculiar laws, as well as by signal deliverances, distinguished them from all the people of the earth; or to what follows, that he had made such a difference between them, and other people, that in their very diet they should not agree with them, much less in the forenamed impurities. For, that the difference of meats was instituted, to keep them from familiar conversation with their idolatrous neighbours, is very evident (as I before observed), and the gentiles themselves took notice of it, and looked upon them as unsociable people upon this very account. Josephus often mentions this objection against them. And Euphrates complains, (in Philostratus de vita Apolon. Lib. cap. 2.) "That of old they separated not only from the Romans, but from all mankind: for they had invented βίον ἄμικτον a manner of living that would not let them mix with other people, either at a common table, or in their prayers or sacrifices."

Ver. 25. Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, &c.] According to the prescriptions in the eleventh chapter, which are here briefly repeated, to enforce the observation of the foregoing precepts against such incestuous marriages as other nations allowed; their law not permitting them so much as to eat such meat as those nations did; but to account many things, which they freely used, unclean and abominable.

Ye shall not make yourselves abominable, &c.] See chap. xi. 43.

Which I have separated from you, as unclean.] Forbidden you to eat; and thereby separated you from all other people. Which had this intention in it (among others already mentioned), that this nation, from whom the Messiah was to spring, might be kept pure and sincere; free from all mixture with strange people; unto which nothing contributed more efficaciously (as an excellent person hath observed) than the difference of meat, which made it not easy for them to contract acquaintance, much less friendship, with other nations. And truly, unless the people from whom the Messiah was to come, had been kept separate from all other nations, either all hope of him would have been lost, or many in every country, to the great hurt and destruction of mankind, would have pretended to be the person: whereas, by keeping them a people distinct by themselves, it came to pass that all countries thereabouts were filled with a report, that the Lord of the world should come out of Judea: see Joh. Wagenseil. Confut. Carm. Lipman. p. 554, &c.

Ver. 26. And ye shall be holy unto me, for I the Lord am holy.] See chap. xi. 44. xix. 2. and ver. 7. of this chapter.

And have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine.] The very difference of meats which they used, was a token that God had separated them from other people, to be subject to such rites and laws as he ordained: and hereby also they were so severed from others, as to be kept from the most familiar conversation with them (which is at meals), and thereby they were preserved from the danger of being seduced to the worship of strange gods.

Ver. 27. A man also, or a woman, that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, &c.] The consulting such persons is forbidden, chap. xix. 31. and the penalty added ver. 6. of this chapter: and here the persons themselves who were proved to have a familiar spirit, or to be a wizard (what they are, see there), are condemned to the heaviest punishment; which was by being stoned to death. For which severity Maimonides gives this reason: "Because it is the very scope of the whole law to root out idolatry, and abolish the very name of it. And therefore God ordered magicians to be stoned, because, without doubt, they are idolaters; though in a manner peculiar and different from the vulgar. And the greater part of such evil arts being practised by women, (which is the ground, he thinks, of that law, Exod. xii. 18.) towards whom men are naturally pitiful: therefore Moses saith in this place, A man also, or woman, that hath a familiar spirit, &c. like to which we find in no precept, not about the profanation of the sabbath; but in this case it was necessary expressly to mention women as well as men; because of men's natural tenderness and clemency towards women." Thus he, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37. Procopius Gazæus's gloss on these words is very pious, but something fanciful; "He that is hardened like a stone to virtue, deserves to be stoned. For magic commits murders, digs up sepulchres, disturbs the souls of men. For magicians are men who corrupt human nature."

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto the priests.] This law about the priests, perhaps, follows that last mentioned (ver. 27. of the foregoing chapter), to shew unto whom they should resort, and of whom they should inquire, viz. of the priests; who should always be ready for any priestly office, and for common conversation.

The sons of Aaron.] His daughters were not concerned in the following prohibitions; because they had nothing to do in offering sacrifices; as Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.

There shall none be defiled for the dead.] By touching the dead body, or coming (as the Hebrews say) within four cubits of it, or entering into the house where it lay (though it were to take care of the funeral), or by following the corpse to the grave, or making any mourning for the dead: because by these things they were legally polluted for no less than seven days, (Numb. xix. 11. 14.) and, consequently, unfit for the service of God, and for conversation with their neighbours; who had the greater reverence also for them, when they saw their dignity to be so great, that they were not permitted to perform such offices as others were obliged unto. For this, no doubt, was intended very much to put an honour upon the priesthood: as it was also in other nations, particularly among the Romans, who would not have their Pontifex to look upon a funeral, as Bochart observes out of Seneca, (Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 4.) and the Flamen Dialis might not go into the place where the coffin was. For which reason, as Servius tells us, (ad lib. iii. Æneid.) they ordered a bough of a cypress-tree to be stuck at the door of the house where a dead body lay, that the high-priest might not ignorantly go into it. It appears also by Plato, that it was thus likewise among the Greeks. For he would have the priests, of both sexes, to accompany one that had discharged the office of a censor well, unto his grave when he was buried, as unto a pure funeral (ὡς καθαρεύοντι τῷ τάφῳ ἕπεσθαι); but for this, he says, they must ask leave of Apollo, (lib. xii. de Legibus, p. 947.) See Porphyrius de Abstin. lib. ii. sect. 50.

Among his people.] The Jews are so critical, as, from the word beammo, among his people, to gather, that if a man did not die among his people, but in a strange country, where there was nobody to take care of his funeral, and see him buried, a priest might do it himself, rather than his body should lie above ground.

Ver. 2. But for his kin that is near unto him.] Here is an exception to the general rule; because it would have been very hard to restrain natural affection from carrying them to their parents, and children, and brethren, and sisters, when they died. Which cases would not often happen, as Maimonides observes in the place before alleged; and they are particularly named, that there might be no mistake, nor any colour to extend this indulgence to relations more remote.

For his mother, and his father, and for his son, and for his daughter, and for his brother.] If any have a mind to know the rabbinical reasons, why the mother is here put before the father, and ver. 11. the father before the mother, with such-like things, he may consult Simeon de Muis in his Varia Sacra, p. 356, &c.

Ver. 3. And for his sister a virgin.] I see no reason why it should be restrained to his whole sister, both by father's and mother's side (as some of the Hebrew doctors would have it); for, that his half-sister, by either of them, was nigh unto him (as it here follows), it appears by the law about incestuous marriages, (chap. xviii. 9.)

Which hath had no husband.] To take care of her funeral, which her brother therefore, though a priest, might. It is commonly observed, that there is no mention here of his wife. But Maimonides, with great reason, thinks it was lawful for him to mourn for her; but it was needless to mention her, who, by the law of God, was dearer to him than father or mother. And there is this argument for it: that Ezekiel, who was a priest, is forbidden, by a special command, to mourn for his wife, which otherwise he would have done, (ch. xxiv. 16, &c.)

Ver. 4. But he shall not defile himself, being a chief man among his people.] But though he might defile himself for such very near relations, yet he might not for the greatest man in the nation, who was not so near of kin to him. This seems to me to be the easiest and the most natural sense of this verse, by adding the particle lamed (which in the two foregoing verses is put before mother, father, son, daughter, brother, and sister) to Baal, i. e. chief man (as we translate it); nothing being more usual than to omit such a particle, which yet must be understood when it hath been often before mentioned. And thus the Vulgar Latin understands it; and the sense is the same, if we take it as our translation seems to intend it: But he shall not defile himself (for any other), being a chief man, &c. As for the marginal translation, I can see no ground for it: and there must be a greater supplement, by adding for his wife; which one cannot well think is here forbidden, as I observed on the foregoing verse. They also who translate it, a chief ruler shall not defile himself, &c. have still less reason, the whole discourse in this place being concerning the priests.

To profane himself.] He himself, in sacred offices, being the greatest person, would have been profaned, i. e. rendered a common man, if he had mourned for any but those whom nature had very closely linked him unto.

Ver. 5. They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corners of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh.] Though they were allowed to mourn for some persons, yet for none after this manner: that is, according to the custom of certain places in Chaldea, as Aben Ezra glosses upon these words. And he might have added also, of the Egyptians; among whose ceremonies we find this in aftertimes, and it is likely it had been very ancient. For Jul. Firmicus tells us, in the beginning of his book, that in their annual lamentations of Osiris, they were wont "to shave their heads, that they might bewail the miserable misfortune of their king, by depriving themselves of the ornament of hair," &c. And he adds, that they did tear their flesh, and cut open the scars of their old wounds, &c. where Johan. Wouver observes the same out of several other authors. And Plutarch, in his book of Superstition, saith, they generally used in mourning to be shaven; whereas the Hebrews let their hair grow: (see chap. x. 6. xix. 27.)

Ver. 6. They shall be holy unto their God.] Attend to their office, unto which they are peculiarly consecrated; and not, without great necessity, be at any time unfitted for it.

And not profane the name of their God.] By doing as the common people did; or rendering themselves incapable to minister unto the Lord; as they were when they were any way defiled.

For the offering of the Lord made by fire.] They attend upon his altar, where the burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, and all the rest were offered.

And the bread of their God, do they offer.] The word and is not in the Hebrew, and the sense will be clearer if it be left out: the offering of the Lord made by fire, being called the bread of their God, i. e. his meat, or food. For the altar was his table; and what was burnt thereon was in the nature of his provision: which in the Scripture language is comprehended under the name of bread. So Solomon Jarchi saith, whatsoever may be eaten is called bread, (see chap. iii. 11.) Thus fruit is called bread, Jer. xi. 19. and milk, Prov. xxvii. 27. and honey, 1 Sam. xiv. 28. And therefore no wonder the sacrifices are here called by that name, and by Malachi his meat or food, (chap. iii. 12.) Which phrase is used, as the author of Sepher Cosri well observes, to keep up the notion that God dwelt gloriously, and kept house among them, (par. ii. cap. 26.)

Ver. 7. They shall not take a wife that is a whore.] All incestuous marriages were as much forbidden priests as any other men. But besides, here are three sorts of persons whom it was unlawful for a common priest to marry, though there was no kindred between them. The first is a whore; whereby the Hebrew doctors understand, not only one that was a common prostitute, but one that was not an Israelite, or an Israelitish woman, with whom a man had lain, whom it was unlawful for her to marry. Which comprehends not only all such as are forbidden in the eighteenth chapter of this book; but those also in Deut. xxiii. 2, 3. (See Selden de Successionibus, lib. ii. cap. 2. et 3. and Uxor. Hebraica, lib. i. cap. 7. lib. iii. cap. 23.)

Or profane.] A woman was accounted so (as he shews in the same place) who was either descended from such a person, as is beforementioned; or who was born of such a conjunction, as is here forbidden to a priest. And there are those who think it may be understood of one that had been consecrated to a false deity; whom she served with the use of her body, which she exposed to the worshippers of that deity: who, though she afterwards repented, and became good, yet a priest was not to marry her, no more than an ordinary whore. But the simplest meaning of these three seems to be, that they should not marry one that had prostituted her body, or that had been any way vitiated, though against her will; or was of suspected chastity; or (as it follows) was divorced from her husband.

Neither shall they take a woman put away from her husband.] For commonly women were put away for some fault, as Abarbinel notes; and were presumed not to be such as a priest should desire. To the same purpose Procopius Gazæus. A priest, saith he, should not only fly from manifest evils, as fornication, but decline whatsoever may blemish his fame: now a woman that is put away by her husband, lies under a suspicion of something that is bad. For which reason (as Mr. Selden observes in the place abovenamed), a priest might not marry her, whom her husband's brother refused to marry after his death.

For he is holy unto his God.] Consecrated, after a special manner, to the service of the Divine Majesty; and therefore was not to dishonour his priesthood by such marriages as were not of good reputation. If he did, he was not to be suffered to minister, until he had given such a wife a bill of divorce; as Maimonides saith in Biath Hamikdasch, cap. 6. An example of which there was in Manasseh, the brother of Jadua the high-priest; who, marrying, contrary to the law, the daughter of Sanballat the Samaritan, was commanded either to put her away, or not to come to the altar. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Successione in Pontificatum, cap. 6. p. 238.)

Ver. 8. Thou shalt sanctify him therefore.] This seems to be spoken to Moses, and to all that should succeed him in the supreme authority, that they should take care the priests should not marry with such persons; or if they did, not be suffered to minister in the priest's office till they had put them away. Accordingly we find, that, to keep the priesthood pure, and to avoid all suspicion of any such pollution, the names of the priest's parents were carefully preserved in the genealogical tables, as we learn from Ezra ii. 62. Nehemiah vii. 64. (See Selden de Succession. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 3. Uxor. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 7.)

For he offereth the bread of thy God.] Ministereth at the altar. (See ver. 6.)

He shall be holy unto thee.] Keep himself pure, that he may not be unfit to offer sacrifice for the people, as need shall require.

For I the Lord which sanctify you am holy.] I, who have taken you to be my peculiar people, excel in all perfections; and therefore require persons of extraordinary sanctity to minister unto me.

Ver. 9. And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore.] The Hebrew doctors understand this of one married, at least espoused. So Aben Ezra and R. Sol. Jarchi say expressly, "Our rabbins confess, with one mouth, that one not espoused is not concerned in this law." (See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 6. and lib. iii. cap. 23. p. 488.)

She profaneth her father.] She was doubly guilty: first, in profaning, i. e. dishonouring herself; who, being the daughter of such an eminent person, committed such a heinous crime; and secondly, in dishonouring her father, whose reputation hereby suffered.

She shall be burnt with fire.] Which was the sorest punishment among the Jews, (see chap. xx. 14.) and was not inflicted upon other persons, in this case, (who were barely stoned, Deut. xxii. 14.) but only upon the daughter of a priest, from whom greater virtue was expected. But if the witnesses of this fact were convicted of perjury by other credible witnesses, produced by the woman or her father, then both her husband who accused her, and those false witnesses, suffered the same punishment that she should have done. (See Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Heb. cap. 1. p. 321.)

Ver. 10. He that is the high-priest among his brethren.] Hitherto the laws given in this case concern the common priest: now follow those by which the high-priest was to govern himself, who was under peculiar laws more strict than the rest.

Upon whose head the anointing oil was poured, &c.] He having a peculiar consecration different from the rest, by pouring the holy oil upon his head, and clothing him with the most glorious robes, (see chap. viii. 7, 8, &c.) was in all reason to distinguish himself, more than the rest of the priests, from common men.

And that is consecrated.] In the Hebrew the words are, whose hand is filled; as it was with the fat and the right shoulder of the ram of consecration, &c. by which he was hallowed to minister in the priest's office, (Exod. xxix. 22—24.)

To put on the garments.] To be high-priest.

Shall not uncover his head.] Rather, shall not let his hair grow neglected without trimming; as the manner was, in token of mourning. So Onkelos and Jonathan, and a great many more: (Selden, lib. ii. de Successione in Pontificatum, cap. 5. p. 235.) and what I have noted upon the tenth chapter of this book, ver. 6.

Nor rend his clothes.] Another token of mourning which he was to forbear; though the Talmudists will have it, that he might rend his garments at the bottom, about his feet, but not at the top, down to his breast; as P. Cunæus observes out of Mass. Horajoth, lib. ii. de Rep. Hebr. cap. 3. Before his anointing and consecration, and putting on the holy garments, it was not unlawful for him to attend the funeral of his father; and therefore Eleazar was present when Aaron died, (Numb. xx.) being as yet in a lower ministry, and not completely advanced to the office of high-priest, but only declared Aaron's successor by putting on his garments. (See chap. x. 6.)

Ver. 11. Neither shall he go in to any dead body; nor defile himself for his father, or for his mother.] He might not go into the house, where the body of his father or mother lay dead, (which was permitted to the inferior priests, ver. 2, 3.) and, consequently, he was not to make any external signs of mourning for son or daughter, brother or sister.

Ver. 12. Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary.] If he was there when he heard of the death of his father or mother, he was not to stir out from thence till he had finished his ministry. (See chap. x. 7.) For he had a little house (after the temple was built) within the precincts of it, where he commonly remained all the day-time, which was called lischcath cohen gadol, the parlour of the high-priest: as Cunæus observes out of Mass. Middoth, lib. ii. de Repub. Hebr. cap. 3. At night he went to his own dwelling-house, which was in Jerusalem, and no where else; there he might perform all the offices of a mourner, except those which are here forbidden; and the people came to comfort him (as Maimonides relates in his treatise on this subject), and, sitting upon the ground, while he sat in his chair at the funeral feast, they said, Let us be thy expiation (i. e. let all the grief that is on thee fall upon us); unto which he answered, Blessed be ye from heaven; as their words are reported in Sanhedrin, cap. 2. n. 1.

Nor profane the sanctuary of his God.] By preferring his affection to the dead, before the service of God in the sanctuary: or, by returning thither to his ministry, when he had been defiled by the dead; which had been a great profanation: for he that touched a dead body was unclean seven days, (Numb. xix. 11, 12.)

For the crown of the anointing oil of his God is upon him.] Some supply the word and between crown and anointing oil; and so make two reasons why he should distinguish himself from all other men: first, because the holy crown, as it is called, (Exod. xxix. 6.) which had holiness to the Lord engraven on it, (Exod. xxviii. 36.) was set upon his head; and his head also was anointed with the holy oil, (Exod. xxx. 25. 30.) whereby he was, in a special manner, consecrated to the service of the Most High. But there is no need of this, for the anointing oil itself was that which sanctified him to his office, and was poured on him, after the holy crown was set on his head; (Lev. viii. 9. 12.) and so these words may be translated, the consecration (for so the Hebrew word nezer signifies) of the anointing oil of his God is upon him. That is, he must remember he is solemnly devoted unto my ministry by that anointing; and therefore must not leave it to attend any other.

I am the Lord.] Whose servant he is by a peculiar obligation.

Ver. 13. And he shall take a wife.] From the word wife, in the singular number, the Talmudists generally conclude, that polygamy was not allowed to the high-priest, who was to have but one wife at a time, though other men were permitted to have more. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Successione in Pontif. cap. 2. p. 207. and Uxor. Hebraica, lib. i. cap. 8.) If he did take another, he was to give a bill of divorce to one of them before the great day of expiation; or else he was incapable to perform the offices of it; as P. Cunæus observes in the place forenamed out of Joma. But if his wife died, it was not unlawful for him to marry again, as Tertullian fancied from this very place, (lib. de Monogam. cap. 7. and Exhort. ad Cast. cap. 7.)

In her virginity.] And not so much as espoused to any other person. Nor was any sort of virgin thought fit for his wife, but only one that was newly come out of her minority, and had not yet attained to her full puberty; as Maimonides explains the sense of their ancient doctors. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. 7. where he observes also, that this is to be understood of the high-priest after he was in his office; for if he had married a widow before he was high-priest, he was to keep her, and not put her away when he was advanced to it. But there are those who imagine this law obliged all the common priests, who were to marry none but virgins; as they are persuaded from Ezek. xliv. 22. And no less a man than Hugo Grotius seems to be of this opinion, both here and in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, (lib. ii. cap. 5. n. 9.) in his Annotata to that section. But the Hebrew doctors are all of a contrary mind, and so are Josephus and Philo; as Mr. Selden observes, in his Addenda to the seventh chapter of his first book Uxor. Hebr. and lib. ii. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 2, p. 208. And so Cunæus also in the place forenamed, speaking of this very law, "Non enim Sacerdotibus posita eadem lex fuit; quippe viduam illi rite duxerunt," &c. But above all, a later most learned writer, Joh. Wagenseil, hath largely confuted this opinion, in which he hath shewn Grotius was singular; for, besides that Ezekiel there supposes they might marry the widow of a priest, it is evident both from Jewish and Christian interpreters, that the state of things under the law is not to be measured by what the prophet Ezekiel saith concerning the future temple and priests: but, as Kimchi himself saith upon this place, "if this verse must be expounded of every priest, it relates to the greater sanctity of the future temple:" for the law at first undoubtedly was, that none but the high-priest was confined to marry a virgin. What Grotius alleges out of Josephus to prove his assertion, he hath shewn, with due respect to so great a man, doth him no service. (See his Annotata ad Mischna Sota, cap. 4. p. 557, &c.)

Ver. 14. A widow.] This was peculiar to the high-priest, that, besides other women which no priest might marry, he alone is forbidden to marry a widow; as the same learned person there shews is the sense of all the Hebrew writers. And Moses Kotzenses observes, that by a widow is to be understood, not only a woman that had been married; but if she had been merely espoused, it was unlawful for the high-priest to take her for his wife: and by the high-priest, he saith, is to be understood, not only the successor of Aaron, but he also that was anointed to the war; which seems to be stretching of the word beyond its meaning, though the word widow may be allowed to comprehend one only espoused, whom he might not marry, though she had been espoused to his predecessor.

Or a divorced woman.] No, nor the wife of his brother that died without issue; which others were bound to marry, but he was not.

Or profane.] The word chalalah was explained before, ver. 7. which, according to the Jews, signifies a woman born of such a person as a priest is prohibited to marry; as, if the high-priest had taken a widow, and had a daughter by her, that child was profane, and might not be married, though a virgin, by a succeeding high-priest. And so of the rest. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divort. p. 37, 38.)

Or a harlot.] See ver. 7.

But he shall take a virgin of his own people.] He was commanded before to marry none but a virgin; and now he is further limited to a virgin of Israel; for he doth not mean one of his own tribe, there being instances to the contrary, of a high-priest marrying into the royal tribe, (2 Chron. xxii. 11.)

Ver. 15. Neither shall he profane his seed among his people.] Many think this refers to what goes before, that he should not debase his family by such mixtures as have been mentioned; but I rather think it to be a new precept (as the Vulgar Latin takes it), that as he might marry none but of his own people, i. e. an Israelite; so among his people he should not match with a vulgar person, but with one nobly born; for that was the way to preserve the dignity of the priestly office, at which all these precepts aim.

For I the Lord do sanctify him.] I have separated him to myself, for a special and most holy service; for which reason he was to distinguish himself from other men, even in his marriage, to make them the more reverence the Lord whom he served. Upon this account it was, that many constitutions were made by the elders, forbidding him what was allowed to other people; whereby they intended to advance his honour. For instance, he was forbidden to go into the public baths, or to feasts. If he would visit any that mourned, he was to be attended by other priests. He was obliged to cut his hair every week, but never to shave with a razor; to be in the sanctuary every day, and to go home not above twice in a day; to have but one wife at a time; and going into the temple to have three other priests with him, &c. So Maimonides in Cele Mikdash, cap. 8.

Ver. 16. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Upon this occasion God gave some other precepts concerning the priests, who were to wait upon him in his house and at his table.

Ver. 17. Speak unto Aaron, saying.] Having forbidden such marriages as would have been a dishonour to the priesthood, had they been permitted, he now forbids any to serve at his altar, who had the least blemish in his body; for that would have disparaged his Divine service.

Whoever he be of thy seed.] Whether high-priest or the common priests.

In their generations.] In future ages as well as the present.

That hath any blemish.] From these general words the Hebrew doctors conclude, that not only the particular blemishes afterward mentioned made them incapable to minister, but all other whatsoever which appeared in the body; of which these here named are but a specimen or example. So Maimonides in Biath Hamikdasch, whose words are, "the blemishes expressed in the law, are propounded for examples of the rest;" which they reckon to be in all one hundred and forty-two, accounting only those which openly appeared, and not those which were inward, in the kidneys, bladder, or bowels; because there are no examples of such in the particulars which here follow. They are divided by the doctors into three classes: such as made beasts unfit to be offered, (chap. xxii. 20.) as well as priests unfit to minister; of which sort they reckon fifty. And such as only made priests incapable to minister; of which sort they reckon ninety. And such as only made men look ill-favouredly; which were but two. (See Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Successione in Pontific. cap. 5.)

Let him not approach.] Unto the altar.

To offer the bread of his God.] i. e. To sacrifice. (See ver. 6. and chap. iii. 2.)

Ver. 18. For whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish.] Though never so wise or pious.

He shall not approach.] He makes it a standing law, that no man that had a blemish should come to minister unto him at his altar. And a reasonable law it was, approved by pagans themselves; for it is the very first qualification which Plato requires in him who was to be made a priest, that he should be ὁλόκληρος καὶ γνήσιος, &c. perfect in all his parts, and not a bastard; and that he should be born of honest parents, who had lived without the blemish of murder, or any other impiety, (lib. vi. de Legibus, p. 759.) And such a law there was among the ancient Romans: sacerdos integer sit, that a priest should be entire in all his parts. Which Seneca mentioning (Controv. iv. 2.) explains it by the example of Metellus, who, losing his eyes, by adventuring to snatch the Palladium out of the flames, when the temple of Vesta was burnt, was denied the priesthood; for, though he had done great service, which did him great honour, yet their opinion was, that "Sacerdos non integri corporis, quasi mali ominis res, vitandus est:" a priest who wanted any part of his body, was to be avoided, as a thing that boded ill: for thus it was in sacrifices, and therefore they thought, with much more reason it should be so in the priests that offered them. (See Dilherrus Disput. Academ. tom. ii. p. 187, &c.)

A blind man, or a lame.] Such natural defects which befal us without or against our will, as Procopius Gazæus observes, are not to be imputed to us as any fault: and therefore he thinks such vices in the mind as answer to these blemishes in the body, are here intended by Moses; yet he could not but acknowledge, that if we will follow the literal sense (which no doubt is meant by these words), it is not becoming to see a man perform priestly offices, who hath any visible blemish in his body; for instance, that halts, or cannot walk unless he have one to lead him. But Moses, he still thinks, had a respect to higher matters, viz. to all the good qualities that St. Paul requires in a bishop; and therefore by a blind man he understands one without knowledge; and by a lame, one that walks not uprightly in the ways of God's commandments. Such accommodations are so easy, that I need not take further notice of them.

Or he that hath a flat nose.] In the two first words, blind or lame, there was no difficulty; but the word harum (which we translate hath a flat nose) is not so plain; yet the Hebrews generally agree it signifies one, the upper part of whose nose was so depressed, that the two eyebrows seemed to meet, and to be but one; as Bochartus observes out of R. Solomon, in his Canaan, (lib. i. cap. 33. p. 655.)

Or any thing superfluous.] The Hebrew word sarua signifies any member disproportionable to the rest; but more especially (as their doctors take it) the inequality of those members that are pairs: as, when one of a man's eyes, or ears, or legs, was bigger than the other.

Ver. 19. Or a man that is broken-footed.] Though a man did not halt, yet, if his foot was so broken, that it looked deformed, he was incapable to minister to the Divine Majesty; because it rendered him contemptible in the eyes of the people; at least not so graceful, as the servants of the Most High were to be.

Or broken-handed.] Any fracture in the hand made a man more remarkably unfit than the foregoing blemish; because by this part all the Divine offices were to be performed.

Ver. 20. Or crook-backed.] The Hebrew word gibben properly signifies bunch-backed: whether the bunch came from the luxation of the backbone, or from a swelling in the flesh.

Or a dwarf.] Who, besides that he looked despicably, was not able to reach up to the altar. The marginal translation may be justified from the Hebrew, for dak in that language signifies lean, or slender: but then the meaning must be, one whose flesh was wasted by a consumption. The Vulgar took it for one blear-eyed: and the LXX. also thought it signified some disease in the eyes, if the Complutensian edition be right, where this word is translated ἔφηλος τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς. But other editions leave out the two last words, and then it is uncertain what ἔφηλος signifies; but most likely some ill-favoured spots or pustles in the face.

Or that hath a blemish in his eye.] The Hebrew words toballul beeno signify one that hath a confused spot in the eye; which is called by the Chaldee paraphrasts, and by the Talmudists, chillez and chaluzon, which is the very same with the Greek word Χάλαζα, importing a concretion of a white humour (like to a hailstone), κατὰ τὸ βλέφαρον, as Ægineta speaks, and Galen also. (See Bochart in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 9.) But this spot did not make a priest incapable to minister (as Selden observes in the place abovementioned), unless it was a little prominent, which made the blemish more apparent.

Or be scurvy, or scabbed.] One of these words signifies a dry scurf or scab, the other a purulent.

Or hath his stones broken.] Is bursten, or hath a rupture, as some expound it. The LXX. translate it Μόνορχις; which Procopius Gazæus understands an hermaphrodite.

Ver. 21. No man that hath a blemish of the seed of Aaron the priest shall come nigh, &c.] This seems to confirm what was observed before, (ver. 17.) that any other blemish, besides these here particularly mentioned, made a man incapable to officiate at the altar. And, in the first place, the Hebrew doctors reckon five in the ears, besides the want of them: an example of which Josephus gives in the story of Hyrcanus the high-priest, whose ears Antigonus cut off, that, if he should return again, he might not resume his office, (lib. i. de Bello Jud. cap. 11.)

He hath a blemish.] This general repetition is a farther confirmation, that all apparent blemishes of the same kind with these here particularly named, excluded them from ministering at the altar. And there being some of them that were permanent, or perpetual (as they speak), and others that were transient, which remained but for a time; no man that had a blemish, though only of the latter sort, was to minister at the altar till it was gone.

He shall not come nigh to offer the bread of his God.] i. e. The offerings made by fire beforementioned, which are here plainly represented as the meat that was served up to his table. (See ver. 6.) If any of them did presume to offer at the altar, there were different effects of their contumacy, according to the different sorts of their blemishes, which the Hebrew doctors divide into three classes, as I observed ver. 17. If any man having a blemish of the first sort ministered, it profaned the very sacrifice which he offered, and he was to be scourged. The second sort did not vitiate the sacrifice, but the priest was to undergo the forenamed punishment. The third sort was so inconsiderable, that neither of these effects followed, upon his ministering who was blemished by them; as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. ii. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 5. p. 234.)

Ver. 22. He shall eat of the bread of his God.] But, though such a priest might not offer any sacrifice, yet he might eat with his brethren of that part of the sacrifices which was given to them for their portion, which no man in his uncleanness might do. Therefore these natural infirmities were not legal impurities, but only incapacities (as we speak) which disabled them for their office.

Here again the sacrifices are represented as the provision made for the Divine Majesty. (See ver. 6. 21.)

Both of the most holy.] Such were the meat-offerings, (chap. ii. 3. vi. 17.) the sin-offerings, (chap. vi. 25, 26.) and the trespass-offerings, (chap. vii. 1.) See chap. xiv. 13. The shew-bread also was a most holy thing; and all such were to be eaten only by the males of the priest's family, in the holy place, (Numb. xviii. 9—11, &c.)

And of the holy.] Such were the wave-breast and the heave-shoulder of the peace-offerings, (chap. vii. 35. and x. 14.) and the first-fruits, and the tithes. But, though the peace-offerings of particular persons were among the less holy things, yet the peace-offerings of the whole congregation were most holy. (See chap. xxiii. 20.)

Ver. 23. Only he shall not go in unto the veil.] He was not to enter into the sanctuary to burn incense, or to trim the lamps, &c.

Nor come nigh unto the altar.] No, nor go to the altar of burnt-offering, which was in the court of the Lord's house; but he was to sit in the wood-room, where he was employed in picking out all the wood which had any worms in it, that it might be laid aside, and not carried to the altar, as Maimonides and others relate. He had also another employment. (See chap. xiii. 2.) If any man were so presumptuous, or so forgetful, as to minister notwithstanding the manifest blemish which was upon him, he fell under censure, and was punished according to the degree of his fault, as I observed before, (ver. 21.) out of Mr. Selden, who hath, in the place there mentioned, handled this more accurately than I thought it needful for me to do.

That he profane not my sanctuary.] That he might not make others think meanly of the service of God; and consequently of God himself; who would have men, in their greatest perfection, minister unto him, to preserve in people's minds a sense of his most excellent being, unto whom they ministered. For which reason all the foregoing prohibitions were given against marrying such persons as had been vitiated, &c. and against mourning for the dead, that they might not profane the name of their God, (v. 6.) by doing as vulgar people did, or making themselves incapable to minister unto God, as they were when they were defiled. And thus Maimonides discourses upon this subject: (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45.) "God commanded his ministers should wear precious apparel, and that none should be admitted to the ministry who had any defect in his body; nay, they who were deformed and ill-favoured were excluded; because the vulgar do not judge according to men's true worth or beauty (which lie in the soul), but according to their outward appearance, in the comeliness of their bodies, and the richness of their garments; and therefore the end of all these things was, that God's house might be had in due honour and reverence."

My sanctuaries.] This word, in the plural number, relates to the two parts of the sanctuary; the court where the altar of burnt-offering stood (which was a holy place) and that which was properly called the sanctuary, wherein the altar of incense was; into neither of which a priest that had any blemish might enter; as was said before.

For I the Lord do sanctify them.] I have set apart both those places for my service; and therefore, no man with a blemish shall be admitted into them, to perform any holy office there; yet they might come into the court, to eat with their brethren, of holy things, but not in their priestly garments, which it was not lawful for them to use.

Ver. 24. And Moses told it unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel.] They were all acquainted with these laws, because they were all concerned the service of God should be administered acceptably unto him.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] These commands that follow were delivered at the same time with the foregoing; belonging to the same matter: for though the priests, who had a blemish, might eat of the holy things, yet he would have them know, that neither they, nor such as were unblemished, should presume to do it in their uncleanness.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 2. Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, that they separate themselves.] viz. When they were in their uncleanness, (ver. 3.)

From the holy things of the children of Israel.] Abstain from eating (ver. 3, 4. 12.) of that part of the sacrifices which belonged to the priests, but was to be eaten only by such of them as were free from legal impurities, (chap. vii. 20, 21.) Nor were they to eat of the first-fruits, which were also their portion, (chap. xviii. Numb. xii. 13.) but they might eat of the tithes, which were allowed for their constant sustenance.

And that they profane not my holy name.] This is the very ground of this prohibition; that they might preserve in their minds a due reverence to the Divine Majesty: unto whom, as they might not approach, so they might not meddle with any thing consecrated to him, in a state of legal impurity. All great persons are to be approached with a great deal of ceremony, especially when any are invited to their table; otherwise they might fall into contempt; and therefore, much more was this reverence to be shewn to the Divine Majesty, that they might entertain high apprehensions of him, by abstaining from all things belonging to him, when they were under any pollution.

In those things which they hallow unto me.] Which the children of Israel devoted unto God; for so the foregoing words and the next verse explain it.

I am the Lord.] The greatest regard is to be paid to my majesty.

Ver. 3. Say unto them, Whosoever he be of your seed.] Of the priests.

Among your generations.] In succeeding times.

That goeth unto the holy things.] To eat of them; as appears from ver. 4. 6. 12.

Which the children of Israel hallow unto the Lord.] Offer to him at his altar.

Having his uncleanness upon him.] For which they were to separate themselves, (ver. 2.)

That soul shall be cut off from my presence.] Thrust out of the priest's office, no more to minister at the altar; and then it was the act of a judge: or cut off from the land of the living; which was done by the hand of Heaven.

I am the Lord.] Who will vindicate my own honour.

Ver. 4. What man soever of the seed of Aaron.] These words, of the seed of Aaron, include his daughters as well as his sons, who might eat of some holy things, (Numb. xviii. 11. 19.) but not in their uncleanness.

Is a leper, or hath a running issue.] There are eleven fountains of uncleanness (as the Hebrews speak), two of which are these here mentioned; as appears from chap. xiii. 3. xv. 2.

He shall not eat of the holy things until he be clean.] See chap. xiv. 2. xv. 13.

And whoso toucheth any thing that is unclean by the dead, or a man whose seed goeth from him.] These were two other fountains of uncleanness, (chap. xi. 31, 32, &c. xv. 16.)

Ver. 5. Or whosoever toucheth any creeping thing, whereby he may be made unclean.] See chap. xi. 24, &c.

Or a man of whom he may take uncleanness.] See chap. xv. 7.

Whatsoever uncleanness he hath.] Suppose the leprosy, (chap. xiii. 45.) These are two such fountains of uncleanness as the former.

Ver. 6. The soul which hath touched any such shall be unclean until the even, and shall not eat, &c.] So the law was in the forenamed cases; as appears by the places abovementioned.

Ver. 7. And when the sun is down he shall be clean.] Having washed his flesh with water.

And shall afterward eat of the holy things; because it is his food.] God was so gracious, as not to keep a priest any longer in a state wherein he should want his necessary or comfortable sustenance.

Ver. 8. That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat, to defile himself therewith.] This was forbidden before to all the Israelites, (chap. xxii. 15.) but made a priest no longer unclean than an ordinary man, because of the foregoing reason.

I am the Lord.] Who will have my ministers pure from all such pollutions. The remainder of which were, the uncleanness of the water of separation, as Maimonides speaks, chap. xix. 21. and of the great sacrifice of expiation, chap. xvi. 28. and of a menstruous woman, chap. xv. 9. and of a woman in child-bed, chap. xii. 2. But nothing made men so unclean as the dead body of a man; which defiled, not only him that touched it, for seven days, but all that came into the house, and every thing that was in the house where he died, (Numb. xix. 11. 14.) which was the reason of the foregoing law, that the high-priest should not go in to the dead body of his father or mother; nor any inferior priest be defiled for any, but their near relations, (chap. xxi. 1, 2. 11.)

Ver. 9. They shall therefore keep mine ordinance.] Observe this constitution; because I, who am their Lord, make it.

Lest they bear sin for it.] Be punished if they break it.

And die therefore.] As Nadab and Abihu did; who presumed to break another law about holy things.

If they profane it.] By eating of the holy things in their uncleanness.

I the Lord do sanctify them.] Separate them to my service; and by such constitutions teach them carefully to avoid all pollutions.

Ver. 10. There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing.] The holy thing here mentioned is that beforenamed; (chap. x. 14.) and by a stranger he doth not mean one of another nation, but one that is not of the seed of Aaron, or is not one of his family; for the word in the Hebrew is not nechar, which properly signifies such a stranger as is not an Israelite, but zar, which signifies any one to whom a thing doth not belong; as holy things did not to those who were not at least part of the priest's family, though not of his race. For, that such might eat of them who were not of their race, provided they belonged to them as a part of their family, appears from the next verse.

A sojourner of the priest.] Who boards with him (as we now speak), or dwells in a part of his house (as some understand it), but hath a distinct family.

Or a hired servant.] Such were those who served by the day, (chap. xix. 13.) or for a certain time, and after that might dispose of themselves as they pleased.

Shall not eat of the holy thing.] None of these might eat of the priest's portion, (chap. x. 14. Numb. xviii. 11.) because they were not members of his family.

Ver. 11. But if the priest buy any soul (i. e. person) with his money.] There were those of their own nation, who, by their poverty, were compelled to sell themselves, or their children, (chap. xxv. 39.) and others they bought of other nations, (ver. 44, 45, &c.) who, becoming proselytes to the Jews' religion, were permitted to eat of the priest's meat, because they became part of his family.

And he that is born in his house, &c.] They that were born of such purchased servants were their master's goods, and such a part of their family, that they left them to their children who succeeded them; and, therefore, they also were allowed to eat of the meat of the priest.

Ver. 12. If a priest's daughter also be married unto a stranger.] Unto one that is not of the family of the priests.

She may not eat of an offering of the holy things.] She lost her right to eat of those holy things, which she did partake of while she remained a part of her father's family; for that entitled persons to this privilege; insomuch, that a priest taking a wife out of another family, she might eat of them, because she was one with him, and therefore had more right than a servant. But, for the same reason, a priest's daughter, married to a stranger, might not eat of them, because she was gone out of his into another family.

Ver. 13. But if the priest's daughter be a widow, or divorced, and have no child.] If she had any children, they and she made another family; and they being begotten by a father who was not a priest, had no right to eat of the priest's meat. But if she was left without children, then she was accounted still one of her father's family, provided she returned (as it follows) to live with him.

And is returned to her father's house, as in her youth.] To be a part of his family, as she was before she married, (chap. x. 14.)

She shall eat of her father's meat.] Have the same privilege she had when she was a virgin.

But there shall no stranger eat thereof.] This seems, as I said, particularly to relate unto her children, if she had any; who, being begotten by one of another family, were looked upon as strangers. (See ver. 10.)

Ver. 14. And if a man.] Who hath no right to them.

Eat of the holy thing unwittingly.] Not knowing it to be a holy thing.

Then he shall put the fifth part thereof unto it.] Besides his sacrifice which he was bound to offer for his trespass. (See ver. 15.)

And shall give it unto the priest, with the holy thing.] He could not give the priest the holy thing which he had eaten; but the meaning is, that he should make satisfaction to the priest for the damage done to him, by paying him the true worth of the thing, and the fifth part more of its value. (See ver. 16.)

Ver. 15. And they shall not profane the holy things of the children of Israel, which they offer unto the Lord.] This seems to refer to the persons beforenamed, none of which should presume to profane sacred things, by eating them when they did not belong to them. The priests seem also to be concerned in it, who were not to suffer them to eat such holy things; as it follows in the next verse. Or, if it entirely relate to the priests, the meaning is, they should not profane holy things, by eating them in their uncleanness, (ver. 9.) And one reason was, because the children of Israel, whose offerings these were, might be discouraged from bringing them to the Lord, when they saw them so profaned.

Ver. 16. Or suffer them.] i. e. The people.

To bear the iniquity of trespass, &c.] To fall under the punishment which God will inflict for their trespass, in eating things which do not appertain to them. The marginal translation refers this also wholly to the priests, in this manner, Or lade themselves with the iniquity of trespass in their eating holy things; viz. in their uncleanness, and with such persons (it may be added) as ought not to eat of them.

For I the Lord do sanctify them.] These words seem to justify this last interpretation: (see ver. 9.)

Ver. 17. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The following laws, no doubt, were delivered at the same time with the former; because they still concern the same matter.

Ver. 18. Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel.] For they were all concerned in the perfection of the sacrifices, as they were in the perfection of the priests that offered them: (see chap. xxi. 24.)

And say unto them, Whosoever he be.] The Hebrew doctors say, that the phrase isch, isch (man, man, i. e. any man), is here used, as it was chap. xviii. 6. to shew that gentiles are comprehended under this law as well as Jews; as Mr. Selden observes out of the Gemara Babylon. Tit. Cholin. (See lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. p. 289.)

Of the house of Israel, or of the strangers in Israel.] They understand by strangers in Israel, such as they called proselytes of the gate; who were not circumcised, but had renounced idolatry, and joined themselves to the God of Israel. R. Levi ben Gersom takes perfect proselytes to be here meant (whom they called proselytes of righteousness), yet not excluding the other.

That will offer his oblation for all his vows, and for all his free-will-offerings.] See chap. vii. 16.

Which they will offer unto the Lord for a burnt-offering.] If a gentile brought a peace-offering to the Lord, it was offered as a burnt-offering; and no meat-offering was permitted to be offered with it, as Maimonides observes: (see Selden in the place beforenamed, and ver. 25. of this chapter.) And Dr. Lightfoot gives a large account of it in his Temple Service, chap. 8. sect. 4.

Ver. 19. Ye shall offer at your own will.] So these words are commonly understood; that the sacrifices, both of Jew and gentile, should be spontaneous, as well as without blemish: though they will bear another sense, as I observed, chap. i. ver. 3.

A male without blemish, of the beeves, and of the sheep, and of the goats.] See chap. i. ver. 3. 10. All burnt-offerings were to be males; though peace-offerings might be females, (chap. iii. 1. 6.) and so might sin-offerings also, (chap. iv. 32.) but all without blemish. For, as God accepted only some kind of creatures (viz. beeves, sheep, and goats, and no other of the herd), so he would have a choice to be made out of them, of the very best; as had been often before directed.

Ver. 20. But whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer.] This general rule is here repeated, because he is going to specify what creatures they should account blemished.

For it shall not be acceptable for you.] This seems to justify the exposition which I said might be given of that phrase in the foregoing verse, at your own will; or for your acceptation: (see upon chap. i. 3.)

Ver. 21. And whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the Lord.] Which were either to obtain blessings, or to give thanks for them when they were obtained.

To accomplish his vow.] It was usual to make such vows, for procuring from God what they desired, when they undertook a journey, or went to sea, or were sick, or in any danger, &c. an example of which we have in Jonah i. 16. where we read, the mariners in a storm offered a sacrifice to the Lord, and made vows; i. e. they vowed a sacrifice to God (for they could not sacrifice on ship-board), when he had brought them to a safe port. And so Cicero speaks of certain mariners, who, being tossed in a tempest, vowed, if they gained their haven, " Ei Deo, qui ibi esset, se vitulum immolaturos;" they would offer a calf to the god of that place. And Homer, in like manner, brings in the mother of Telemachus, vowing perfect hecatombs unto all the gods, if she might obtain her desires, (Odyss. xvii. ver. 59.)

Or a free-will-offering.] This also was a peace-offering for obtaining blessings; not when they were in distress, I suppose, but in general to procure God's favour to them and theirs.

In beeves, or sheep.] And likewise goats; for all these were allowed in peace-offerings, (chap. iii. 1. 6. 12.)

It shall be perfect to be accepted.] That was accounted perfect which wanted none of its parts, nor had any defect in any of them. The heathen themselves did not think any other would be accepted, and therefore made a careful choice of their sacrifices; as appears by those words of Virgil, (lib. iv. Æneid. ver. 57.)

——— " Mactant lectas de more bidentes."

Which he calls elsewhere eximii, singled out as most excellent, (lib. iv. Georg. ver. 550.)

" Quatuor eximios præstanti corpore tauros."

And, that they might be such, there was probatio victimarum, proof made of sacrifices, as Pliny speaks, lib. viii. cap. 45. where he saith, such as were lame, or had one leg shorter than the other, were rejected. Which probation was to be made by those that brought the sacrifices; but if they did not do their duty, the priest upon examination refused to admit them to be offered.

There shall be no blemish therein.] This is an explication of what he means by perfect, which Solon (who seems to have taken the rites of religion from Moses) called Ἀφελῆ; in the explication of which word, Hesychius, after several other expressions, concludes with this, ὁ μήτε πλεονάζων μήτε δέων τι τοῦ σώματος, which neither hath any part more or less than it should have. Julius Pollux (who reports this of Solon) hath a great number of other words to express the perfection required in sacrifices, which were to be ἄρτια, ἄτομα, ὁλόκληρα, ὑγιῆ, ἄπηρα, παμμελῆ, ἀρτιμελῆ, μὴ κολοβὰ, μηδὲ ἔμπηρα, μηδὲ ἠκρωτηριασμένα, μηδὲ διάστροφα, (lib. i. cap. 1.) some of which are of the same signification, and serve only to shew how complete their sacrifices were to be.

Ver. 22. Blind, or broken, &c.] In this and the following verses he mentions twelve blemishes, which render any beast unfit for sacrifice; and the first is blind, under which the Hebrews comprehend that which the Latins call cocles, a beast that hath but one eye.

Or broken.] In the bones of the thighs, or the legs.

Or maimed.] Most take it for that which the Latins call mutilum, that which lacketh any part. The LXX. took it more particularly for that which had its tongue cut out: the Hebrew doctors for that whose eye-brows or lips were slit, or cut off; which is nearer to the Hebrew word charuts than the Vulgar, which translates it only a scar.

Or having a wen.] The Hebrews generally understand by the word jabbeleth, that which the Latins call verruca, a wart, or hard knob rising in the flesh; which is better than the Vulgar, who translates it papulas, which properly signifies pimples, pushes, or wheals. But I think our translation cannot be mended; a wen being a more manifest deformity, and more common in beasts, than the other.

Or scurvy.] This is that which the Greeks call Ψώρα, the itch.

Or scabbed.] Some take this word to signify the same with the Latin impetigo, i. e. a ring-worm or tetter, which spreads in the skin with a dry scab; though others take it for that which they call porrigo, for which I know no English word, unless it be the mange. The Hebrews take it for the porrigo Ægyptiaca, as Bochart observes, a scabby disease of this kind frequent among the Egyptians.

Ye shall not offer these unto the Lord.] Not so much as present them to be offered in sacrifice.

Nor make an offering by fire of them upon the altar unto the Lord.] Much less burn them upon the altar; for the Lord will not accept such sacrifices.

Ver. 23. Either a bullock or a lamb, that hath any thing superfluous.] This word we had before (which we translate superfluous), chap. xxi. 18. but it properly signifies the inequality and disproportion that there is between those parts that are pairs, as the eyes or legs; and particularly when one of them exceeds its just bigness, ex. gr. when one leg is longer than it should be.

Or lacking in his parts.] This word signifies just the quite contrary to the other; when one part is less, and more contracted than it should be; one leg supposed shorter than ordinary. So all the Hebrews understand these words, particularly Onkelos and Jonathan.

That mayest thou offer for a free-will-offering.] A very learned person of our own takes these words for an exception to the foregoing general rule; that such defects as these two should not hinder the acceptation of a beast for a free-will-offering, though not for a vow; and it must be acknowledged, that is the most plain and simple sense. But the Jews, as he observes, particularly R. Solomon Jarchi, expound them otherwise, and will not have this offering to signify the sacrifice of such things at the altar, but the giving them to the priest for some sacred use; to be sold, for instance, for the reparation of the temple, for which they were accepted. (See Dr. Outram, lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 9. n. 2.)

But for a vow, it shall not be accepted.] Free-will-offerings were much different from vows, there being no obligation upon them to offer the former, as there was to offer the latter: and a less perfect creature would be accepted in the one case, though not in the other.

Ver. 24. Ye shall not offer unto the Lord that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut.] That is, as the Hebrews interpret it (and so do the LXX. and the Vulgar), any beast whose testicles were compressed or bruised, &c.

for these four ways they used to castrate a lamb (for instance) and make it wether; and so they did with kids and calves, as Bochart observes out of Aristotle and others, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 46.

Neither shall you make any offering thereof in your land.] The word offering is not in the Hebrew, and this passage may be thus exactly translated, neither in your land shall ye make, or do. So the LXX.: the sense of which the Vulgar expresses by adding the word this, i. e. the forenamed castration, either by compression or contusion, or any way; for Josephus saith, it was unlawful among them to geld any creature; which was prohibited to keep them from doing so with men, which they were taught to be abominable. And these words suggested as much, being thus translated, Neither in your land shall it be done. (See Selden, lib. vii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 3. p. 799.)

Ver. 25. Neither from a stranger's hand.] By bennechar, the son of a stranger (as it is in the Hebrew), who is called (chap. xxv. 47.) a stranger and sojourner (viz. a gentile that dwelt among them), is meant a pious man of another nation, who had renounced idolatry, and abstained from blood, and observed the rest of the precepts of the sons of Noah (as they called them), but was not circumcised, which would have obliged him to the whole law of Moses. Such persons, being worshippers of the true God, were permitted to bring him sacrifices to be offered at his altar. (See Grotius, lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 1. sect. 16. n. 3.)

Shall ye offer the bread of your God from any of these.] Some have taken these words, as if no sacrifice was to be accepted from a gentile, but only money, with which the priest might buy a sacrifice, and offer it for him. But this is confuted by ver. 18. and here it is evident, he only forbids them to accept of any sacrifice which had the forenamed blemishes from a gentile, who might think them not unacceptable, because the gentiles made no scruple to offer such as these last mentioned to their gods, though their laws, in some places, were against it. The bread of your God: the Hebrews understand hereby to be meant, only burnt-offerings; which Maimonides saith, were accepted from a gentile, even burnt-offerings of birds, though he had not yet renounced idolatry. But they were not to accept from him peace-offerings or meat-offerings, or sacrifices for sins of ignorance, (chap. iv. 27.) or trespass-offerings, (mentioned chap. vi. 6.) nor was a burnt-offering to be accepted, unless it was a free-will-offering, or a vow, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. But if he brought such spontaneous offerings as had the forementioned blemishes, the priest was to reject them (though the gentile might say they were such as had been accepted by his gods), or else he was to be scourged. So this law is briefly expounded by the Jews, when they reckon it up among their precepts, that a defective sacrifice is not to be accepted, no, not from the hand of a gentile; as he observes in the same book, cap. 7. where he discourses at large on this subject. And it need not seem strange a gentile should bring any such sacrifices (when their laws, as I observed before, required a choice to be made), for they were not so curious in their choice as the Hebrews; but, as Tertullian upbraids them, sacrificed enecta, tabidosa, et scabiosa, (Apolog. adv. Gentes, cap. 13.) which the better sort of people, perhaps, did not offer, but the vulgar did: and the priests made no scruple to accept them.

Because their corruption is in them, and blemishes be in them.] The word corruption seems particularly to relate unto the forementioned castration, for it signifies such a corruption as is the destruction of any member. See Bochart in his Hierozoicon, (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 4.) And blemishes relate to other defects, which made them unacceptable; twelve of which, as I said, are here mentioned; but the Hebrews look upon them only as examples and specimens of other the like defects, which they make in all to be fifty; as I observed before out of Selden, (lib. ii. de Success. ad Pontific. cap. 5.) Maimonides gives us a catalogue of them in his treatise of Entrance into the Sanctuary, (cap. 7.) but to make up that full number, he is constrained to add these three, which have no example among the twelve here mentioned, viz. such as tremble by age, or by some disease, or are torn by wild beasts.

Ver. 26. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] These laws following being of the same nature, were in all likelihood delivered at the same time with the foregoing.

Ver. 27. And when a bullock, or sheep, or goat is brought forth.] These were the only beasts that were allowed to be sacrificed, (ver. 19.)

Then it shall be seven days under the dam; and from the eighth day and thenceforth it shall be accepted for an offering, &c.] They were not fit for food when they were not seven days old, and therefore not for sacrifice; which was the bread or food of God, as it is called ver. 25. but this hath been sufficiently explained before, Exod. xxii. 30. I shall only add, that I have since observed that P. Cunæus hath briefly expressed the sense of Maimonides, which I there represented, (lib. iii. de Republ. Hebræor. cap. 5.) and that the Gentiles were so far from offering creatures so young, that they thought them fittest for sacrifice when they were two years old; as appears from the words of Virgil beforementioned,

——— "Mactant lectas de more bidentes."

Where Servius saith that bidentes were so called, because they were biennes, two years of age; for it was not lawful to sacrifice those that were younger, nor those that were older.

Ver. 28. And whether it be cow, or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day.] Lest the young one, saith Maimonides, should happen to be killed before the dam; which would have given the greatest grief to her, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 48.) Any thing that looked like cruelty, therefore, was by this law banished from among them; for they might not so much as kill both the young and the dam on the same day, to offer them to God himself; of which he is here speaking.

Ver. 29. And when ye will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving unto the Lord.] He had mentioned free-will-offerings and vows before, (ver. 21.) and now briefly touches upon the third sort of peace-offerings. (See chap. vii. 15, 16.)

Offer it at your own will.] Male or female; of the herd, or of the flock, (chap. iii. 1. 7. 12.) Or the meaning may be (as hath been often said), he shall offer it in such a manner as that it be accepted. (See chap. i. 3.)

Ver. 30. On the same day it shall be eaten, &c.] See chap. vii. 15.

Ver. 31. Therefore shall ye keep my commandments, and do them, &c.] Because he had said before, (ver. 30.) and now repeats it again in the conclusion of this verse, I am the Lord: to whom they owed obedience; especially when he required they should reverently use all holy things.

Ver. 32. Neither shall ye profane my holy name.] This may refer either to what goes before, (that they should not make him and his service contemptible, by offering such things as were defective, &c.) or be taken as a precept by itself. And then the name of God was profaned three ways (as Mr. Selden observes), besides the most grievous of all, by blasphemy. Either when a man, for fear of death, violated the Divine law; or when he contemptuously and wantonly broke any precept; or when a man of great note, for knowledge and piety, gave a scandal to others by doing such things, as were not perhaps directly against the law, yet made him lose all his authority. (See lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disc. Hebr. cap. 10.)

But I will be hallowed among the children of Israel.] Either by the observation of his laws, or by punishing those who transgressed them: for so this phrase is used, chap. x. 3.

I am the Lord which hallow you.] Have separated you to myself, as a special people from all others, by laws different from theirs, and more excellent.

Ver. 33. That brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God.] And moreover distinguished you from all others, by singular benefits; particularly by delivering you from the most grievous slavery, that I might make you a happy people.

I am the Lord.] When you remember my benefits, remember I am your sovereign, who expect your obedience.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] All the laws in this chapter were delivered at one time, not long after the former.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Who were highly concerned to observe all the solemnities enjoined in this chapter, in such a manner as God required.

And say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the Lord.] It hath been anciently observed, that φιλέορτοι οἱ Σύροι, the Syrians were great lovers of feasts. Which made it the more reasonable (if they were so in Moses's days), that the Israelites, who were to be their neighbours in the land of Canaan, should have so many feasts appointed them, weekly, monthly, and yearly; all in honour of their God. From whence they are called feasts of the Lord. But this word moed, which we translate a feast, properly signifies an assembly. And so Mr. Thorndike would have it here translated; because the name of feasts is proper to those solemnities which are to be celebrated with joy and cheerfulness; whereas under this general word moed is comprehended the day of atonement, which is one of the assemblies here named, (ver. 27.) but was no feast; being to be observed with the greatest humiliation and affliction that could be expressed. He therefore exactly translates these words in this manner; The assemblies of the Lord (for the word concerning is not in the Hebrew) which ye shall proclaim for holy convocations, these are my assemblies: (see Religious Assemblies, chap. ii.) All that can be said for our translation is, that the day of atonement being a day of rest from all labour, it may go under the name of a feast, in opposition to working-days.

Which ye shall proclaim.] Or call by the sound of the trumpet, which the priests were to blow upon these days, (Numb. x. 10.)

To be holy convocations.] The Hebrew word mikra, which here signifies a convocation, signifies also reading, (Neh. viii. 8.) For on these days they were called to assemble together to hear the law read to them, as well as to offer sacrifice, and make their prayers to God, with thanksgivings for his benefits.

Even these are my feasts.] Or my assemblies, as I said before; the first of which was the sabbath, then the Passover, Pentecost, the beginning of the new year, the day of atonement, and the feast of tabernacles: which are all contained under the general word moed, and none besides.

Ver. 3. Six days shall work be done.] They were allowed all these for any sort of business, wherein they pleased to employ themselves.

But the seventh day is the sabbath of rest.] See Exod. xx. 9, 10. xxxi. 15. This was the greatest of all solemnities appointed for assemblies, returning once every week; and therefore is set in the head of all the rest; from which it seems to be distinguished, (ver. 37, 38.) And accordingly in the next verse, having here mentioned this as a day by itself, he begins to reckon the feasts or assemblies of the Lord. And the reason why this day was made a sabbath of rest, was, because God himself then rested from his works. In memory of which they were to keep this day free from all labour, that the belief of the creation of the world might be fixed in their minds; or, as Maimonides phrases it, (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 113.) a belief that nothing is coævous with God. Whence that saying of theirs (mentioned by Aben Ezra), "whosoever doth any work upon the sabbath-day, denies the work of the creation."

Ye shall do no work therein.] They were commanded so to rest on this day from all bodily labour, as not to kindle a fire, to dress the meat they ate upon it: which is not required upon any other day, but only the great day of expiation, (ver. 28. 30.) Concerning these two days alone it is said, Thou shalt do no work upon it: but of the days of other assemblies, no more is said but this, Thou shalt do no servile work therein, (chap. v. 7, 8, &c.) that is, only such work as they were wont to put their slaves to do was prohibited. For though they might not bake nor boil their meat on the sabbath-day, (Exod. xvi. 23.) nor on the day of expiation (ver. 28. of this chapter); yet on other solemn days they might make provision for their tables, Exod. xii. 16. where Aben Ezra notes, "of none of the solemn assemblies, besides the sabbath and the day of atonement, it is said no manner of work: only of the Passover he saith it, and addeth an exception of the meat of the soul;" that is, what was requisite for the sustenance of nature: as our Mr. Thorndike observes, in the place before quoted.

It is the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings.] To be kept holy in honour of the Lord, by every man, wheresoever he dwelt: for they had synagogues for worship in all their towns; though most of the other assemblies could be held only in the place where the sanctuary, and afterwards the temple was; whither all their males went up thrice a year at the great festivals. Aben Ezra therefore thus glosses upon these words: "In all your dwellings; in your land, and out of your land; at home, and upon the way:" to shew that the command, (Exod. xxxv. 3.) "You shall kindle no fire throughout your habitation on the sabbath-day," was to be observed, not only whilst they lived upon manna in the wilderness, (when God gave them a double portion on the sixth day, that they might prepare it against the sabbath, Exod. xvi. 5. 29.) but in all places, whereso-ever they dwelt afterwards.

Ver. 4. These are feasts of the Lord.] Now follow the solemn assemblies which are to be kept by this ordinance of mine; besides that of the seventh day, which was celebrated from the beginning.

This looks like a title to all that ensues.

Even for holy convocations.] Solemn meetings of the people, who were called together to celebrate the mercies of God with sacrifices of thanksgiving and public rejoicings. Such there were in all nations, who had their Πανηγύρεις (as the Greeks called them), general assemblies of all the country, to do honour to their gods. As in Egypt, we are told by Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 59. they did once a year πανηγυρίζειν in honour of Isis, Mars, and Diana. The like was in other nations, as every body knows.

Dr. Hammond hath observed something concerning this phrase holy convocations, upon Matt. xx. not. c.

Which ye shall proclaim in their season.] Or, in their appointed times: which here follow.

Ver. 5. On the fourteenth day of the first month.] See Exod. xii. 18.

At even.] See Exod. xii. 6.

Is the Lord's Passover.] See Exod. xii. 27.

Ver. 6. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord, &c.] That is, then the seven days of eating unleavened bread were to begin, (Exod. xii. 15.)

Seven days ye must eat unleavened bread.] See Exod. xii. 19, 20.

Ver. 7. On the first day ye shall have a holy convocation.] Exod. xii. 16.

Ye shall do no servile work therein.] Such days as these were not observed so scrupulously as the seventh day of every week, on which (as I observed before) they might not boil nor bake, i. e. prepare their meat; which on this day was allowed, as appears from the place last named in Exodus. Nor might they stir out of their place, i. e. take a journey on the sabbath, (Exod. xvi. 29.) but on this day they might: as appears from Deut. xvi. 7. where, having sacrificed the passover, and eaten it on the fourteenth day at even, they have leave given them to go home the next morning, which was the first day of unleavened bread. For on this very day, betimes in the morning, they came out of Egypt, and travelled from Rameses to Succoth. By servile work therefore we are to understand their ordinary labours on other days, from which both they and their servants were to abstain on this day: which it was the custom of all nations to forbear, upon such great solemnities, as Strabo informs us, (lib. x.) where he saith, Κοινὸν τοῦτο καὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων καὶ Βαρβάρων ἐστὶ, τὸ τὰς ἱεροποιΐας μετ' ἀνέσεως ἑορταστικῆς ποιεῖσθαι· This is common both to Greeks and barbarians, to keep their holy days, with a festival remission of their labours.

Ver. 8. And ye shall offer an offering made by fire seven days unto the Lord.] These were not merely idle times, but days for Divine service; about which there is a particular direction given afterward (Numb. xxviii. from the nineteenth to the twenty-fifth verse), where the sacrifices for every one of the seven days are prescribed. And though there is no mention of any particular work of the moral service of God upon these days (no more than there is of that sanctification of the sabbath-day), yet the Jews were not so blind, but that they were able to perceive the spiritual service of God, by prayers, and praises, and hearing the law, and meditating upon God's works, was required on these days, especially on the sabbath: which appears from Josephus and Philo, and divers others of their later writers.

In the seventh day is a holy convocation.] Exod. xii. 16.

Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was to be observed as the first day of the seven, that the feast might conclude as it began.

Ver. 9. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Though the following could not be yet practised; yet he would have them take a particular notice of it, as no less solemnly enjoined than the foregoing.

Ver. 10. Speak unto the children of Israel.] They being all concerned in this precept.

And say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you.] In the wilderness they sowed no corn, and therefore could not be obliged by this precept till they came to Canaan: nay, till they had driven out the old inhabitants, and God had given them rest in the land of promise, as Moses himself seems to expound it, Deut. xii. 10, 11.

And shall reap the harvest thereof.] Begin to reap it, as it is explained, Deut. xvi. 9.

Then shall ye bring a sheaf.] Or a handful, as it is translated in the margin of our Bibles. And there was the very same custom among the heathen, to bring δράγμα, a handful of the new corn, to be offered to their gods; as Diodorus Siculus saith the practice was among the Egyptians.

Of the first-fruits.] There were several things comprehended under the name of first-fruits, which are commanded to be offered unto God, (Exod. xxiii. 19.) The Greeks have accurately distinguished them by proper and peculiar names. Πρωτότοκα were the first-born of men or of cattle, mentioned Exod. xiii. Then Πρωτογενήματα were the first corn that was ripe, or the first-fruit of trees, which they brought from the field, or from their plantations, before they ate any themselves. And then Ἀπαρχαὶ (which the Hebrews call terumoth, or trumoth) were the first-fruits of their wine and oil, (Numb. xviii. 12.) and the first loaves or cakes made of their wheat, mentioned below, ver. 17. (See there.)

Of your harvest.] Of barley-harvest, which began at the Passover, when they offered the first-fruits here mentioned; as wheat-harvest began at Pentecost, when they offered the first-fruits, mentioned ver. 17. as at the feast of tabernacles those of the vine, and other fruit-trees, were brought and offered. And so much weight was laid on this, and there were so many of them, and such care taken of their payment, because this was held by all mankind as a principal part of religion, to make this early acknowledgment to God for his goodness; insomuch, that they who offered no first-fruits were looked upon as atheists. So Porphyry, lib. iii. περὶ Ἀποχῆς, sect. 78. And, indeed, this was a practice derived from the beginning of the world, (Gen. iv. 3, 4.) Aristotle himself testifies as much when he saith

(lib. viii. ad Nichomachum), Αἱ ἀρχαῖαι θυσίαι καὶ σύνοδοι, &c. The ancient sacrifices and assemblies were after the carrying in the harvest, when they offered the first-fruits, μάλιστα γὰρ ἐν τούτοις ἐσχόλαζον τοῖς καιροῖς, for they chiefly relaxed themselves at those seasons.

Unto the priest.] Who offered part of it to God, and had the rest himself. For thus the Jews describe the gathering and offering of them: On the evening of the first day of the Passover-week, some were ordered by the Sanhedrin to take sickles and baskets, &c. and go out when it was dark (having a great company with them), and cut a sheaf of corn, which they brought into the court of God's house, and parched it, (as may be gathered from the second chapter of this book, ver. 14—16.) and having ground it, they sifted it often (no less than thirteen times), till it was very fine flour. After which they took out a tenth-deal (an omer, which was the tenth part of an ephah), and brought it to the priest, who took out a handful, and put it on the altar with oil and frankincense, and the remainder he had for himself. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. xiv. sect. 2. Dr. Outram de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 8. n. 6. and J. Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 2. Annot. 11.)

Ver. 11. And he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord.] They did not offer the corn green in the ears (as I observed in the foregoing verse), but parched, dried, ground, and searsed; and then they waved a tenth-deal of the flour, which came from the sheaf, as a present to the Lord of the whole earth.

To be accepted for you.] To procure God's blessing upon the rest of the harvest; and that they might have liberty to use the corn it produced: which it was not lawful for them to do, till the first-fruits were given to God.

On the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it.] We are not to understand by the sabbath the seventh day's rest, which was the opinion of the Sadducees, as R. Levi ben Gersom tells (upon the fifth of Joshua), but the day here mentioned, (ver. 7.) which was a kind of sabbath, because no servile work might be done therein. And therefore this morrow after the sabbath was the sixteenth day of Nisan, or the next day to the first of unleavened bread. So the LXX. translate it, τῇ ἐπαύριον τῆς πρώτης, the morrow after the first: and Josephus more plainly, τῇ δευτέρᾳ τῶν ἀζύμων ἡμέρᾳ, &c. on the second day of unleavened bread, which is the sixteenth day of the month, &c. (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10.) This was the first of the fifty days, which they reckoned till Pentecost, (ch. v. 15.) and was the day on which manna ceased when they came into Canaan, because then they ate of the fruits of that country, (Josh. v. 10—12.) And indeed it was not lawful for them (as I said before) to eat of the fruits of the earth, till after the Passover; because then the sheaf of the first-fruits was waved, which consecrated the rest of the corn. And so God continued manna to them till they had other food to eat.

Ver. 12. And ye shall offer that day, when ye wave the sheaf, a he-lamb without blemish, &c.] Though this day was not so holy as the first day of unleavened bread, yet it was a part of the festival, and was called moed katon, a lesser solemnity; as all the rest of the days were, between the first and the seventh. And therefore a special offering is here ordered upon this day, besides the daily burnt-sacrifice; and besides the sacrifice which was appointed (ver. 8.) to be offered upon every one of the seven days.

Ver. 13. And the meat-offering thereof shall be two tenth-deals of fine flour, &c.] I observed before (upon the second chapter, ver. 1.) that all sorts of bread might be offered to God, as being a very ancient sacrifice, and commonly used at every table; for which reason wine also is here ordered; but it was to be simple wine, not mixed, as was the heathenish custom. Salt also was added (chap. ii. 13.) as common at all tables; but no honey, nor leaven, which men's superstition had introduced, (and therefore expressly forbidden in that place, ver. 11.) as it did also milk, and herbs, and leaves of trees; not a word of which is to be found in the law of Moses. But here it is observable, that he commands two tenth-deals of fine flour to be offered; whereas one tenth was the common meat-offering, (Exod. xxix. 40.) Because, as one of them was a necessary attendant on the lamb, (mentioned before, ver. 12.) so the other was in honour of the day, which was a lesser kind of festival.

And the drink-offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of a hin.] Here is not a double proportion of wine ordered, but the usual quantity; because, perhaps, this was a thanksgiving only for their corn, not for their vintage, which came afterward.

Ver. 14. And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering to your God.] It was not lawful for them to reap, and therefore not to eat any of the fruits of the earth, till the forenamed first-fruits were offered, as an acknowledgment to the Donor of them. For nothing was more just and equal, all men thought, than to give some part to him, who gave to them all they had; and, in the first place, to give him his due before they took any thing to themselves. The Romans in this expressed the sense of all mankind; who, as Pliny tells us, lib. xviii. cap. 2. "Ne gustabant quidem novas fruges, aut vina, antequam sacerdotes primitias libassent," did not so much as taste of their corn or wine, till the priests had offered the first-fruits.

It shall be a statute for ever, &c.] As long as their polity lasted.

In all your dwellings.] Throughout the whole land of Canaan.

Ver. 15. And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath.] From the sixteenth day of Nisan, or the second day of unleavened bread; which was the morrow after the sabbath, (ver. 11.)

From the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering.] This is added only as a fuller description of the time from which they were to count.

Seven sabbaths shall be complete.] Seven whole weeks, reckoning that day from which the account begun, for the first day of the first of those weeks; which made forty-nine days in all. Maimonides thinks it was for the honour of this great day of Pentecost, that they were to count the days till it came; just as a man, saith he, who expects his best friend, is wont to tell the days and hours till he arrive, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43.) And therefore the present Jews begin this supputation with a solemn prayer, saying, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the Lord of the world, who hath sanctified us with thy precepts, and commandest us to number the days of harvest: and this is the first day." And thus they go on to pray till the seventh day, when they add, "Now there is one week:" and so proceed in the same prayers to the evening of Pentecost. Which feast they not being able now to keep, as the law appoints, they pray to God every day, after they have done counting, that he would restore Jerusalem and the temple; and then they promise to do all that is here prescribed. And this counting in some places is performed publicly in their synagogues; yet so that every master of a family is bound every night to do it at home: (see Buxtorf. Synag. Judaica, cap. 20.)

Ver. 16. Even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days.] The next day after the seventh sabbath (or week) made just fifty days: from which this feast was called Pentecost: and in the Old Testament, the feast of weeks; because it began the next day after the seven weeks beforementioned, Exod. xxxiv. 22.

And ye shall offer a new meat-offering to the Lord.] viz. Of new corn made into loaves, as it follows in the next verse: which was the first-fruits of wheat-harvest, as the place beforementioned tells us, Exod. xxxiv. 22.

This day the Samaritans take to have been the first day of the week, after the very letter of this law; which is thus made out by the great primate of Ireland: Our blessed Lord being slain at the feast of the Passover, the whole sabbath following (which was the first day of unleavened bread) he rested in his grave. The next day after that sabbath, the sheaf, or omer, of the first-fruits of the barley-harvest was offered to the Lord; when Christ rose from the dead, and became the first-fruits of them that slept. From this day was the account taken of the seven sabbaths, or weeks: and upon the morrow after the seventh (that is, upon our Lord's-day) was celebrated the feast of weeks, which is called the day of the first-fruits, (Numb. xxviii. 26.) because then were offered the first-fruits of their second, or wheat-harvest; and therefore called the feast of harvest, (Exod. xxiii. 16.) because then was the principal and the conclusion of the whole harvest of the year. Upon which day the apostles, having themselves received the first-fruits of the Spirit, begat three thousand souls, through the Word of truth, and presented them as the first-fruits of the Christian church unto God and unto the Lamb. Now the matter being so ordered by God, that in the observation of the feast of weeks, the seventh day of the week (the Jewish sabbath) was purposely passed over, and that great solemnity kept upon the first day of the week, no wonder the Christian church hath appropriated that day, instead of the seventh, for the service of God.

Ver. 17. Ye shall bring out of your habitations.] These oblations seem to have been offered at a common charge, in the name of the whole nation, which is the reason of this phrase, Out of your habitations. For to affirm, as some do, that two loaves were to be brought out of every house, or, at least, out of every town, is absurd; for they may as well say seven lambs (as it follows) which were offered with this bread, were to be furnished in like manner out of every family or town.

Two wave-loaves of two tenth-deals.] A double proportion, as before, ver. 13. which was presented to God, the Lord of the whole world, by waving them to all quarters. Each loaf did not contain two tenth-deals, but there was one in each loaf.

They shall be of fine flour.] Of wheat.

They shall be baken with leaven.] And therefore were not burnt upon the altar, (for that was unlawful, Lev. ii. 11, 12.) but wholly given to the priests. Whence it was, as the Jews observe, that the bread accompanying their peace-offerings of thanksgiving was leavened, (chap. vii. 13.) and not burnt on the altar, but entirely given to the priests, the servants of God, who attended at his altar, that they might feast together with him.

They are the first-fruits unto the Lord.] Other first-fruits are mentioned, ver. 10. but these were the principal, being the first-fruits of wheat-harvest, which, with all the rest, are exactly enumerated by Nehemiah, chap. x. 35—37. And that place of Pliny, mentioned ver. 14. seems to prove, that the heathen offered both the first of their fruits before they brought them out of their fields and vineyards, and also the first of what was made of them after they were brought home; which they did, partly out of gratitude to God, to thank him for making the year fruitful, and partly to pray him to grant fruitful seasons for the future.

Ver. 18. And ye shall offer with the bread seven lambs without blemish, &c.] This being a great day, and burnt-offerings being the noblest sort of sacrifice, purely in honour of God, a greater number, both of lambs and other creatures, are required upon this solemnity.

And one young bullock, and two rams.] In Numb. xxviii. 27. it is said, two young bullocks and one ram, besides the seven lambs. Perhaps they were left to their liberty, either to bring one young bullock and two rams, or one ram and two young bullocks; or else those mentioned in Numbers were distinct sacrifices, besides those here mentioned: and so Josephus saith, (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10.) that there were offered upon this day three young bullocks, two rams (it should be three rams), and fourteen lambs; all which were offered, besides the morning and evening sacrifice of every day.

They shall be a burnt-offering to the Lord, with their meat-offering, &c.] There being all sorts of sacrifices prescribed for the great solemnity of this day, he mentions the burnt-offering in the first place, because it was the principal, and offered next to the two loaves.

Ver. 19. Then shall ye sacrifice one kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] Next followed the sin-offering, which, for a particular sin of the congregation, was a bullock, (chap. xviii. 14.) but for the sins of the nation in general, only a kid of the goats: for, as Maimonides observes, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.) the more grievous the sin was, the viler the sacrifice, there being no greater sin than idolatry, nor viler sacrifice than a she-goat; and yet this was the expiation of that sin, as they interpret chap. iv. 27. Numb. xv. 17.

And two lambs of the first year, for a sacrifice of peace-offerings.] Double the number to what was commonly offered; for this being a high day, all sorts of sacrifices (as I said before) were offered (burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, and peace-offerings) upon it, and in greater proportions (except the sin-offering) than on other days. And these were the only peace-offerings of the whole congregation of Israel, offered only at this one time of the year, and never else.

Ver. 20. And the priest shall wave them with the bread of the first-fruits, for a wave-offering before the Lord.] These sacrifices, with the trespass-offering for a leper, (chap. xiv. 12, 24.) were the only offerings that were waved about towards all the corners of the world. So Abarbinel upon this place: "The waving was performed by the priest, who reached them out, upward and downward, this way and that way, towards the six quarters of the world, to shew that the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" or, as R. Levi ben Gersom speaks, "that they might understand the providence of God is every where, above and beneath, in every corner of the world."

With the two lambs.] This seems to signify the forenamed burnt-offering and sin-offering were thus waved, as well as these peace-offerings; that is, some part of them all, in the name of the rest; for the priest could not wave the whole body of them, they were so heavy.

They shall be holy to the Lord for the priest.] Who had not only the breast and the shoulder (as was usual); but all the flesh of these peace-offerings (their blood being sprinkled, and their inwards burnt) was given unto him, to be eaten by the males among the priests, in the court of the sanctuary, even as the sin-offerings were: for these peace-offerings being (as I before noted) the only peace-offerings of the whole congregation, were reckoned among the most holy things; whereas the peace-offerings of private men were less holy, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, in his Temple Service, chap. viii. sect. 4. And the true reason why the priest had all the flesh of these sacrifices was, because they being for the whole congregation, the offerers were too many, to have any portion of them distributed among them.

Ver. 21. And ye shall proclaim on the self-same day.] Before the solemnities began.

That it may be a holy convocation to you.] See ver. 4. The reason of this holy assembly was, partly to commemorate God's great goodness, in giving the law from Mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt, (which was the chief end of God's bringing them from thence, as Maimonides speaks, par. iii. More Nevoch. cap. 43.) and partly to thank him for giving them such fair hopes of completing their harvest, which had been begun at the Passover.

Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was to be observed, as the first and the last days of unleavened bread, (ver. 7, 8.) with such a rest, as made it little different from a sabbath. And that great vision (as Maimonides calls it), at the giving of the law, lasting but one day, was the reason the memory of it was celebrated only for one day in the year; whereas the feast of unleavened bread lasted seven days, for one day was not sufficient to make them sensible enough of the affliction they endured in Egypt. But, perhaps, one day only was appointed at Pentecost to be free from all servile work, because of the great business of wheat-harvest, which was then coming on, and could not permit them to be so much at leisure, as they were when the fruits of the earth were all gathered. Then they kept a feast seven days, (ver. 39.) as they did at the beginning of barley-harvest, when the feast of unleavened bread was held: at which time harvest did not come on so fast, as it did at Pentecost; for the first-fruits then were of green corn, parched, and dried, and offered to God, for the hope they had he would bring the rest to maturity.

Ver. 22. And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of the field, &c.] This precept hath been sufficiently explained before, (chap. xix. 9, 10.) only the occasion of its repetition here ought to be observed, which is the mention of harvest and first-fruits, which, in gratitude, they then offered unto God, of whose goodness he would have them so sensible, as not to be unmindful of the poor; but to be such benefactors to them, that they might still receive more benefits from God.

Ver. 23. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] These words are frequently prefixed to a new matter, though delivered at the same time with what went before

Ver. 24. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying.] Who (as I have often said) were all concerned to take notice of such precepts.

In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, ye shall have a sabbath.] Such a sabbath as those mentioned, ver. 7, 8. 21. on which no servile work was to be done, as it follows in the next verse: for the seventh month was the first month of the year, according to the ancient computation, and continued so still to several purposes; particularly with respect to their jubilee, when they were to blow the trumpet, as they did on this day, which was the chief new moon in all the year, and the more illustrious, because it fell in the time when all the fruits of the earth were gathered.

A memorial of blowing with trumpets.] It is not easy to tell of what this blowing of trumpets was a memorial. Maimonides, in the place aforenamed, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43.) will have it to be instituted to awaken the people out of sleep, and call them to repentance; being to put them in mind of the great day of expiation, which followed nine days after. This he explains more largely in his Jad Chazakah, in the treatise of Repentance, (cap. 3.) where he saith, "The sound of the trumpet, at this time, did in effect say, Shake off your drowsiness, ye that sleep; and, being awaked, watch to your duty. Search and try your ways; remember your Creator, and repent. You, whom the vanity of the times hath led into a forgetfulness of the truth; who spend your days wandering after empty things, which profit nothing; bethink yourselves, and take care of your souls. Let every one forsake his evil way, and his thoughts which are not good." And accordingly he saith, in the same place, "the Israelites were wont to multiply alms and good works, and to apply themselves to the precepts (as his phrase is), from the beginning of the year, till the day of atonement, more diligently than at any other time; rising in the night to pray in their synagogues till break of day," &c. But, though this be very pious, I see no ground for it; no more than for what they say of commemorating the deliverance of Isaac: for why should not blowing of trumpets be ordered for a preparation to other solemn days, and in memory of other deliverances, as well as this of Isaac?

It seems more probable, that all nations making great shouting, rejoicing, and feasting in the beginning of the year, at the first new moon (as many have observed), hoping the rest of the year, by this means, would prove more prosperous; God was pleased to ordain this great rejoicing among his people, in honour of himself, upon the day of the first new moon (which was to be continued every first day of the month), that he might preserve them from the worship of the moon, and make them sensible, that he alone gave the good years, and renewed his mercies daily, from month to month, upon them. Bonfrerius imagines, that God put an honour upon this month, because it was the seventh: that, as every seventh day was a sabbath, and every seventh year the land rested, &c. so every seventh month of every year should be a kind of sabbatical month; there being more feasts in this month than in any other month in the year.

But all this doth not explain what this blowing of trumpets was a memorial of, which I take to be the creation of the world, which was in autumn; upon which account it was, that they anciently began their year at this time, as the eastern people do at this day. They acknowledged also God's goodness, in blessing all the year past, and bringing them to the beginning of a new year, which they prayed him to make happy to them.

They began to blow at sun-rise, and continued it till sun-set. He that sounded the trumpet began with the usual prayer, Blessed be God, who hath sanctified us with his precepts, &c. subjoining these words, Blessed be God, who hath hitherto preserved us in life, and brought us unto this time. When all was ended, the people said, with a loud voice, these words of the Psalmist, (Psal. lxxxix. 15.) Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance. (See Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 24.)

Such blowing with trumpets was used by the gentiles; particularly in the solemnities they observed in honour of the mother of the gods: one whole day (which was the second) being spent in blowing of trumpets, as Julian tells us, in his fifth oration upon this subject, εἶθ' ἑξῆς περισαλπισμὸς παραλαμβάνεται, p. 168.

Ver. 25. Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was a very solemn day, like the day of Pentecost, (ver. 21.) and others beforenoted, on which they might only make provision for their meals, (Exod. xii. 16.) which were wont to be very liberal upon this day. And, among other dishes, they serve up to the table a ram's head, in memory of that ram which was sacrificed in the room of Isaac, which they fancy was upon this day.

But ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] About which directions are given afterward, (Numb. xxix. 2, &c.) For it was not to be a day of rest merely, but of religion.

Ver. 26. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The following precept is of great moment, which makes this preface to be set before it.

Ver. 27. Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement.] This hath been explained, chap. xvi. 29—31.

It shall be a holy convocation to you.] On which they were to assemble, to humble themselves before God; as it here follows.

And ye shall afflict your souls.] See chap. xvi. I shall only add, that the Jews fancy this solemn day of fasting was appointed, partly to avert those diseases which were wont to be rife in the autumnal season; and this day chosen rather than any other, that they might express their grief at that time, when the sin of the golden calf was committed.

And offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] A burnt-offering, about which directions are given in Numb. xxix. 8.

Ver. 28. And ye shall do no work on that same day.] See ver. 3. and chap. xvi. 31.

For it is a day of atonement.] Set apart wholly for this work; which is at large described in chap. xvi.

To make an atonement for you before the Lord your God.] First the priest made an atonement for himself and his family, (chap. xvi. 6, &c.) and then for the people, and for the holy place, &c. (ver. 15, 16. 33.)

Ver. 29. For whatsoever soul he be that shall not be afflicted on that day, he shall be cut off from among his people.] The affliction here spoken of consisted chiefly in abstaining from all manner of food (as the Jews make account) from one evening to the next: in which time, if any man ate to satisfy his appetite, that is, above the quantity of a date, he was in danger to be cut off; by the hand of God, I suppose: so they say, in Joma, cap. 8. n. 2. Besides which, there were four other mortifications; for no man was to put on his shoes, nor anoint himself, nor wash his face, nor enjoy his wife. (See Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 26.)

Ver. 30. And whatsoever soul he be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people.] The two great things required on this day, being to afflict themselves, and to rest from labour; they who transgressed either of these commands, are threatened to be cut off, and that by God himself, as this verse teaches us to expound the foregoing.

Ver. 31. Ye shall do no manner of work: it shall be a statute for ever, &c.] This is repeated again, because it was a thing of such high importance, that they should wholly attend to the business of this great day, which was a day of humiliation and repentance, and making their peace with God. And, as the Jews themselves observe, there was no man so good but he had offended in some thing or other: and besides, they were to afflict themselves for the sins of the whole body of the nation.

Ver. 32. It shall be unto you a sabbath of rest.] As the weekly sabbath was, (ver. 3.) when they did not merely rest from labour, but employed themselves in the Divine service; as (ver. 8.) I observed they did on other sabbaths of lesser strictness. And this the heathens themselves could discern, that the design of their festivals, which were days of ease and remission of labours, was τὸν νοῦν ἀπάγειν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρωπικῶν ἀσχολημάτων, to withdraw the mind from human employments, τὸν δὲ οὕτως τρέπει πρὸς τὸ θεῖον, that so a man may have leisure to turn his mind towards God; which is a most Divine saying of Strabo, which, I think, I have noted before, but cannot be too oft repeated, (lib. x. Geograph. p. 467.)

And ye shall afflict your souls in the ninth day of the month at even.] They kept the high-priest on the even of the day of expiation from eating much, because it would make him sleepy, as they tell us in Joma, (cap. 1. n. 4.) Where our learned Sheringham observes, that the evening before is called the even of the day of expiation, because they began the fast before the setting of the sun; so that the whole evening belonged to the following sabbath. By which these two places, chap. xvi. 29. where it is said they shall afflict their souls on the tenth day, and this verse, which saith on the ninth day, which seem to clash one with another, may be easily reconciled; for they began to afflict themselves in the conclusion of the ninth day, and ended the fast in the conclusion of the tenth. (See Manasseh ben Israel, Quest. 4. ad Lev.)

From even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath.] This justifies what was just now said, that this day began in the even of the ninth day, and continued till the even of the tenth.

Your sabbath.] So this day was called, because no manner of work might be done on this day, no more than on the seventh, or weekly sabbath, (ver. 31.) And so it is called by the prophet, Isa. lviii. 13.

Ver. 33. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The same preface is prefixed to this, as to the rest, because it was one of the three greatest solemnities appointed by God in remembrance of his benefits. (See ver. 39.)

Ver. 34. The fifteenth day of this seventh month shall be the feast of tabernacles, for seven days unto the Lord.] It was to begin on the fifteenth day, and continue seven days, as the feast of unleavened bread did. The design of this feast is thus expressed by Maimonides, who compares it with the Passover; which served, saith he, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43.) to preserve the memory of all the miracles which God did in Egypt, out of which he brought them at that time; as the feast of tabernacles did to preserve the memory of the signs and wonders he did in the wilderness, where he afforded them his Divine protection under a glorious cloud, and preserved them without any houses, both in the cold of winter and heat of summer. In short, there are two ends mentioned in this chapter of the institution of this festival; one to give thanks for the fruits of the earth, which were then gathered, (ver. 39.) another, and the principal, in a grateful remembrance that they dwelt in booths forty years, and were brought into better habitations when they came to Canaan, (ver. 42, 43.)

Ver. 35. And on the first day shall be a holy convocation, &c.] It was to be observed as the day of Pentecost, (ver. 21.) And they every one carried in their hands the bough of some goodly tree, as the Hebrews understand the first words of ver. 40. Josephus, describing this festivity, (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10.) mentions, in the first place, boughs of myrtle.

Ver. 36. Seven days ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] The peculiar sacrifices, with their meat-offerings, which were to be offered on these seven days, are distinctly set down in Numb. xxix. from the thirteenth verse to the end, where it will be most proper to consider them.

On the eighth day shall be a holy convocation unto you.] See ver. 4.

And ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] A burnt-offering, with a meat-offering attending upon it, according to the appointment in Numb. xxix. 36, 37.

It is a solemn assembly.] This is a new word, which is not used hitherto concerning any of the feasts here mentioned; signifying, as we translate it in the margin, a day of restraint, or rather, a closing, or concluding day, for then the solemnity ended. And so Theodoret, τὸ τέλος τῶν ἑορτῶν, the conclusion of the feasts; whence the last day of the feast of unleavened bread is also called by this name of atzereth, (Deut. xvi. 8.) And so is the feast of Pentecost (which was kept in the end of seven weeks) called, by Josephus, by the same name of asartha, (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10.) This, therefore, as it was the last, so it was the great day of the feast, as St. John calls it, chap. vii. 37. On which day they read the last section of the law, and so concluded the reading of the whole five books of Moses. And thence any great solemnity is called by this name of atzereth, (2 Kings x. 20. Joel i. 14.) This seems to me to be a far better account of this word, than that which the Jews commonly give, who render it a day of detention; because, saith Abarbinel, they were bound to detain the feast to this day (whereas no other feast continued more than seven days), staying at Jerusalem till it was over; whence this day seems to him to be to the feast of tabernacles, as the day of Pentecost was to the Passover; for as they were bound to count seven weeks from that time, and then made this fiftieth day a feast, so they are here commanded, after the seven days of the feast of tabernacles, to stay and feast one day more. Others of them, as R. Solomon Jarchi, say this was as if a man, having been entertained by his friend seven days, should, to express greater kindness to him, be detained one day more.

And ye shall do no servile work therein.] But spend their time in feasting, mirth, and rejoicing, with thankful acknowledgments of God's benefits to them: (see ver. 7, 8.)

Ver. 37. These are the feasts (or assemblies) of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations.] This was the preface to them, (ver. 4.) and now is the conclusion, to make them the more observed.

To offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, and a sacrifice, &c.] These offerings are particularly set down (as hath been noted all along) in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth chapters of Numbers; and, by a sacrifice, seems here to be meant a sin-offering; which is ordered, throughout those two chapters, together with burnt-offerings, upon all these festivals.

Ver. 38. Besides the sabbaths of the Lord.] i. e. Besides the sacrifices appointed upon all the sabbaths in the year, which were not to be omitted, if any of the feasts here mentioned fell upon the seventh day of the week.

And besides your gifts.] Most understand by gifts, such presents as men made to God, beyond their first-fruits and tenths; but it may be thought only a general word, including the two particulars which follow, vows and free-will-offerings.

Ver. 39. Also in the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruit of the land, &c.] Here is no new injunction in this verse, but only an enforcement of what was said before, the very same days being appointed to be observed with those named, ver. 24. Therefore, the Hebrew particle ak should not have been translated also, but surely, or certainly, or truly, as we translate it in other places; particularly Gen. xxix. 14. "Surely thou art my bone and my flesh." Psal. lxxiii. 1. "Truly God is good to Israel." Lam. ii. 16. "Certainly this is the day that we looked for."

When ye have gathered in the fruit of the land.] These words give a reason of the repetition of the command, because there was something more designed in this festival than merely the remembrance of their condition in the wilderness; which was, to express their thankfulness to God for their desired harvest, which they had now gathered; for which cause, besides the seven days which were in commemoration of their dwelling in tents in the wilderness, there was an eighth added, to acknowledge the mercy of receiving the fruits of the earth.

Ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days.] This was the feast of tabernacles, which lasted all these seven days.

tion of the feast of unleavened bread, it is said, In the seventh day is a holy convocation, ye shall do no servile work therein; i. e. it shall be a sabbath; (ver. 8.) but here the eighth day hath that honour put upon it (not the seventh), being added to the festival for a peculiar reason, and therefore to be observed in a very solemn manner; for the feast of tabernacles fell in the time of vintage, when the fruits of the earth were, in a manner, all gathered, (Deut. xvi. 13.) from whence it is called by the name of the feast of ingatherings, (Exod. xxiii. 16.) not because the whole feast was celebrated on this account, but because a principal part of it was kept on this score; viz. the eighth day, as the other seven days were in memory of their dwelling in tents. But, that the eighth day had no relation to this is apparent; for they did not dwell in tabernacles on the eighth day of this feast, but only on the seven preceding; which being ended, they returned to their houses, and kept this day there to another purpose, here named; for so it is expressly said, ver. 42. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; which being over, a great solemnity continued to another purpose, and was kept after another manner, not in booths, but in their houses. So Maimonides, in his More Nevoch. (par. iii. cap. 43.) "That we go from the feast of tabernacles to another solemnity, on the eighth day, it tends to make our joys perfect; which could not be done in tabernacles, but in large and spacious houses and palaces;" where they made still greater feasts, as well as sung the praises of God at the temple, with trumpets and instruments of music; in which service some say those three Psalms were used, which have the title of Alhagittith, (viz. Psal. viii. lxxxi. and lxxxv.) For gath signifies a wine-press, and therefore they think these Psalms were sung in the time of the vintage. Certain it is, that the two last named were sung at some great solemnity, wherein they celebrated God's wonderful providence over them: and, that they used to sing and shout at their vintage, is clear from Judges ix. 27. Isai. xvi. 9, 10. Jer. xlviii. 33. Hosea ii. 15. which the gentiles imitated; who, when they pressed their grapes, sung a song to Bacchus, which was thence called ἐπιλήνιος, the song of the wine-press: (see Scaliger, lib. i. Poet. cap. 15.)

Now this being a time of such great rejoicing, in both respects, it led Plutarch into a fancy, that the Jews celebrated two feasts unto Bacchus at this time; for he writes, in his Symposiacs, (lib. i. prob. 3.) that in the midst of the vintage the Jews spread tables furnished with all manner of fruit, and lived in tabernacles, made especially of palms and ivy wreathed together, and called the day which goes before the feast, the day of tabernacles. And then, a few days after, saith he, they kept another festivity; which openly shews it was dedicated to Bacchus, for they carried boughs of palms in their hands, &c. with which they went into the temple; the Levites (who he fancies were called so from Εὔιος, which was the name of Bacchus) going before with instruments of music, &c. All which may very well incline us to think, that the gentiles corrupted this holy festivity (as they did other sacred institutions), and turned it into the profane Bacchanalia; which is no improbable conjecture of Jo. Mich. Dilherrus, in his Dissert. de Cacozel. Gentil. cap. 3.

Ver. 40. And ye shall take you on the first day.] Then they began to build their booths, that they might dwell in them the rest of the feast.

Boughs of goodly trees, &c.] Some fancy, that this is not a direction for the building of booths with these branches, but for the carrying them in their hands, as Josephus tells us, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10. And they say these branches were called hosannas, because they sung those words of the Psalmist as they marched along with these boughs in their hands, "Save now [in the Hebrew the word is hosan-na] O Lord: O Lord, send now prosperity," Psal. cxviii. 25. And this is so riveted in the minds of the Jews, that Aben Ezra makes it the opinion of the Sadducees to hold that they were not for any other use. But it is evident, from Nehem. viii. 15. that they cut these branches to make booths, and not to carry in their hands; though it is likely that this might also be thought a fitting expression of joy in aftertimes, especially after they were expelled out of their own land. It is not unlikely also that they celebrated this festival by singing of hosannas, among other tokens of rejoicing, praying for a happy new year, whose feast went a little before on the first of this month; whence the rabbins call this feast of tabernacles by the name of hosanna, and the last day of it they call hosanna rabba. And they repeat this often in their prayers at that time, as they tell us in their Minhagim (or books of rituals), saying,

> "For thy sake, O our Creator, hosanna.
> For thy sake, O our Redeemer, hosanna.
> For thy sake, O our Seeker, hosanna."

As if they beseeched the blessed Trinity to save them, and send help to them. In short, they call the prayers they say at this feast by the name of hosannas, as Joh. Mich. Dilherrus hath observed, lib. ii. Electorum, cap. 20.

Boughs.] The Hebrew word pri signifies fruit, as is noted in the margin of our Bibles; from whence some have gathered that they were to be the boughs of fruit-bearing-trees; nay, the Jews fancy they were to be boughs with their fruit, as well as leaves on them. But Buxtorf made no doubt (in his sixteenth chapter of Synag. Judaica), that the word is rightly translated a bough, whether without fruit or with it; though in later editions of that book this passage be left out.

Goodly trees.] The Hebrew word hadar doth not merely signify that which is beautiful and goodly, but that which is large and well spread; as is observed by Hottinger, in his Smegma Orientale, lib. i. cap. 7. where he thinks these words may be thus exactly translated, Take to you the boughs of trees with broad leaves, such as the branches of palm-trees; so that hadar is a general word, and branches of palm-trees a special instance of a tree with spacious leaves, which were the fittest to be used, because they were best able to defend them, either from heat, or cold, or rain. Maimonides takes this word to signify the boughs of a particular tree, which he will have to be a citron: and the Jews are so possessed with this opinion, that, at this day, they fancy the feast cannot be celebrated without such branches; and therefore the Jews now in Germany send into Spain, and endeavour to get one every year with the pomecitrons on it; and, after the feast, they offer the citrons to their friends as a great present. Hottinger saith he had one presented to him at Heidelberg, that very year he wrote his book now mentioned. (See Dr. Lightfoot, in his Temple Service, chap. 6. sect. 3. and Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 21.)

Branches of palm-trees.] With which Judea abounded, and was so noted for them, that in the ancient coins a palm-tree represented that country.

And the boughs of thick trees.] Which were shady, and afforded a good shelter. The Jews take these for myrtles, which have very thick leaves and boughs, close one to another, though the leaves be small.

And willows of the brook.] If this translation be right, it is likely they served only to twine about the rest, and bind them together: and therefore, in Nehemiah viii. 15. no mention is made of them; their tabernacles not consisting of such boughs, which were used only for the compacting and tying together the other.

And ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days.] These were the seven days of the feast of tabernacles (as I noted before), which were spent in feasting, and other tokens of joy, with thanks to God for his great goodness, who had brought them out of the wilderness, where they had no fig-trees, vines, or pomegranates, into a country which abounded with fruitful trees of all sorts; which was the reason, Maimonides thinks, that Moses bids them take the boughs of the most goodly trees wherewith to build their booths, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43.)

But of all the joys at this festival none was comparable to that of drawing and pouring out water; concerning which the Talmudists have this noted saying, "He that never saw the rejoicing of drawing water, never saw rejoicing in all his life." The manner of which is described out of the Jewish writers by Dr. Lightfoot, in his Temple Service, chap. 16. sect. 4. And our blessed Saviour is thought to allude to it, when, in the last, the great day of this feast, he cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink, &c. out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water," John vii. 37, 38. But I have not met with any one that gives a tolerable reason of this custom at the feast of tabernacles; which I take to have been in memory of that water which followed them all the time they were in the wilderness, without which they had perished; and in thankfulness to God, that he had brought them into a "land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills," as well as into "a land of vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates," &c. as Moses speaks, Deut. viii. 7, 8.

Ver. 41. And ye shall keep it a feast unto the Lord seven days in the year.] He repeats it again, because it was of very great importance that they should keep in mind such a singular benefit as this, of their preservation in the wilderness.

It shall be a statute for ever in your generations.] For the end mentioned ver. 43.

Ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month.] They came out of Egypt in the first month, and then began to dwell in tabernacles at Succoth, (Exod. xii. 37.) and, from that place, were conducted ever after under the cloud, (Exod. xiii. 20, 21.) which being in that month we call March, some may think it had been most proper to have kept this feast at that time of the year, and not in September. To which the Jews answer, that in March summer began, when it was usual for people to dwell in booths, as more refreshing than houses: so that if they had kept this feast then, it would not have been known that they dwelt in booths by a singular command of God, and in memory of a Divine benefit; but men would have thought the season of the year led them to it. Therefore God appointed it in the seventh month, which is a time of cold and rain, when men commonly left their tabernacles, and betook themselves to their houses; that it might appear they did not go out of their houses into booths for their own pleasure, or from common custom, but by the Divine precept, in memory of a marvellous benefit: yet the fifteenth day of this month was appointed for the beginning of this feast, because it was upon the fifteenth day of the first month that they marched out of Egypt to Succoth.

Ver. 42. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days.] They left their houses for seven days, and went into the fields, and pitched their tents there, or on their house-tops, or in their court-yards; as we read in Nehem. viii. 17.

All that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths.] Sick people were excepted; and the rabbins also freed women and little children from this obligation. If the rain likewise proved so great that they could not live there dry, and the cold so intense that it endangered their healths, they might all return to their houses.

Ver. 43. That your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths.] This expresses the end and intention of this feast, which was, to preserve a memory in future ages of the goodness of God to their forefathers, in affording them his Divine protection; which overshadowed them, and was a covering to them (when they had no houses), by that glorious cloud which went before them to conduct them. For all the forty years they were in the wilderness, it overspread them like a tabernacle, and defended them from the injury of the weather, and wild beasts, and all their enemies; they having no other shelter in that desolate place, but only this: and consequently, this feast was instituted to make them sensible how very happy they were in goodly cities and fine painted houses (as Maimonides speaks in the place abovementioned), when they came to the good land promised to their fathers, who wandered in a howling wilderness, without any certain dwelling-place.

And another feast was tacked to this, on the eighth day, on purpose to make them more sensible of the happy exchange of their condition from a wilderness into a land of corn, and wine, and oil, which they had plentifully gathered. Dr. Lightfoot, in his Harmony of the Evangelists, upon Luke iii. 21. hath another reason for the observation of this festival; for which I can see no ground, and therefore do not mention it, but refer the reader to the first volume of his works, p. 477.

When I brought them out of the land of Egypt.] For the very first place where they rested, after their first day's march out of Egypt, was called Succoth, (as I observed before), that is, tabernacles; because here they began to spread their tents, in which they lived ever after, for forty years. Nay, in the very land of Canaan there were some who preferred tents before houses, as appears by that phrase we meet with so often, when any assembly or army was dissolved, They went every man to his tent. And, indeed, it was the most ancient way of living, for shepherds, and such as feed cattle, (as Moses observes, Gen. iv. 20.) and therefore no wonder it lasted so long among the Israelites, who originally were such people.

I am the Lord your God.] Whose commands ought to be observed, and whose benefits ought to be remembered.

Ver. 44. And Moses declared unto the children of Israel the feasts of the Lord.] So he was commanded to do, ver. 2. they being concerned, as much as Aaron and the priests, in keeping these holy solemnities in honour of the Lord.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Directions having been given, after the setting up of the tabernacle, for the several sorts of sacrifices that were to be offered there (particularly upon the great day of atonement); and Aaron and his sons having been consecrated, and care taken that none of their posterity should minister before God, but such only as were without blemish; nor any other sacrifices be offered but such as were every way perfect; and only such feasts observed as are mentioned in the foregoing chapter: he proceeds now to give order for the daily service of God in the sanctuary, which was not yet settled, till the princes had all made their offerings, &c. (Numb. vii. 1, 2, &c. viii. 1.)

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel, that they bring unto thee.] The daily sacrifices were to be maintained at the public charge, and so were the incense and the lamps; and therefore it was proper to speak to all the people, in whose name the priests performed all these things, to take care they should be furnished with them. (See Exod. xxx. 13, &c.)

Pure oil-olive, beaten, for the light, to cause the lamps to burn continually.] All this hath been explained, Exod. xxvii. 20. where this order was first given, and now is commanded to be put in execution. It is not improbable that the oil, to make it more pure and free from all dregs, passed through two strainers into the lamps; as Fortunatus Scacchus endeavours to make out, (Myrothec. i. Elæochrys. Sacr. 10.)

Ver. 3. Without the veil of the testimony, &c.] This is a short expression, which, in Exod. xxvii. 21. is delivered more fully, without the veil, which is before the testimony, that is, before the ark.

Shall Aaron order it.] He or his sons, as it is explained in Exod. xxvii. 21.

From the evening unto the morning.] The Hebrew word boker properly signifies, that part of the morning which is from break of day till sun-rise; and the other word arvaim, the evening, after sun-set, till it be dark. Therefore, very early in the morning, and late at night, the priests were to look after the lamps.

Before the Lord continually.] For the lamps burnt on one side of the sanctuary, as the table stood on the other side with the shew-bread on it; and both of them before the Lord, i. e. before the ark of the testimony, where the Divine Majesty dwelt, (Exod. xxv. 30. xxvi. 35.)

It shall be a statute for ever, &c.] Exod. xxvii. 21.

Ver. 4. He shall order the lamps upon the pure candlestick.] The candlestick was made of pure gold, (Exod. xxv. 31. xxxvii. 17.) and thence seems to be called the pure candlestick, (Exod. xxxi. 8.) But here it is possible Moses may have respect to the making it clean every day, before the lamps were lighted.

Before the Lord continually.] See Exod. xxx. 7, 8.

Ver. 5. And thou shalt take fine flour.] Of the best wheat.

And bake twelve cakes.] These are called the bread of the presence (which we translate shew-bread), in the place now named, Exod. xxv. 30. where see what I have noted. They were prepared by the Levites, (1 Chron. ix. 32. xxiii. 29.) and were in number twelve, to represent the twelve tribes of Israel as continually before God, i. e. under the care of his gracious providence. Nor was this number diminished after the apostacy of ten tribes from the worship of God at the tabernacle; but still twelve cakes were set before the Lord, because there was a remnant of true Israelites among them, (1 Kings xxx. 18.) and this was a constant testimony against those apostates, and served to turn them back to the right worship of God at that place; where they were assured they and their sacrifices would be acceptable, and no where else: which made Abijah mention this to Jeroboam and the ten tribes, among other things that should induce them to repent of their forsaking God and his dwelling-place; where he tells them, "the priests, the sons of Aaron, minister; and the Levites wait on their business: and they burn unto the Lord, every morning and every evening, burnt-sacrifices and sweet incense: the shew-bread also set they in order upon the pure table; and the candlestick of gold, with the lamps thereof, to burn every evening," &c. (See 2 Chron. xiii. 9—11, &c.)

Two tenth-deals shall be in one cake.] That is, two omers; for an omer was the tenth part of an ephah, (Exod. xvi. 36.) Where we likewise read, ver. 22. that every Israelite, while they were in the wilderness, gathered just this quantity against every sabbath. On which day these cakes being set upon God's table, (as it here follows, ver. 8.) Dr. Lightfoot thinks, both the measure and the time were designed to put the Israelites in mind of their sustenance in the wilderness.

Ver. 6. And thou shalt set them in two rows, &c.] One upon another, as the Hebrew writers expound it. Who say also, that they were set length-wise cross over the breadth of the table; and that they were ten hand-breadths long, and five broad, and seven fingers thick. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 14. sect. 5.)

Upon the pure table.] It was called pure, because it was overlaid with pure gold, (Exod. xxv. 24.) and, we may be sure, was kept very clean and bright.

Before the Lord.] Who dwelt in the most holy place, before which the bread was set.

Ver. 7. And thou shalt put pure frankincense.] The best that could be got, unmixed with any thing else. And there was no better in the world than their neighbouring countries afforded.

Upon each row.] On the top of each row of cakes there was set a golden dish, with a handful of frankincense therein.

That it may be on the bread.] Or, for the bread. That is, offered unto God, instead of the bread; which was to be given to the priests, who waited on him at his table, for their portion.

For a memorial.] For an acknowledgment of God, and of his sovereignty over them; and to beseech him to be always gracious to them; (see chap. ii. ver. 2.) and to represent also (as Conradus Pellicanus understands it) that God was ever mindful of his people, and had a great love to them; for the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears open to their prayers.

Even an offering made by fire unto the Lord.] The frankincense being set upon the bread, they seem to be considered as one thing; part of which was to be offered unto God, and the rest to be given to his ministers. Now, instead of the bread, which was the principal, the frankincense was burnt every week unto the Lord, when the bread was eaten by the priests. Which bread, it is evident, (ver. 9.) is called one of the offerings of the Lord made by fire; because this frankincense, which stood upon it all the week, was burnt, as an oblation to him.

Ver. 8. Every sabbath he shall set it in order before the Lord continually.] The shew-bread was prepared the evening before; and then, on the sabbath, four priests went in to fetch away the old loaves and frankincense that had stood there all the week before; and other four followed after them to carry new ones and frankincense in their stead: for two of them carried the two rows of bread (six cakes a-piece), and the other two carried each of them a golden dish, in which the frankincense was set upon the bread. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple Service, chap. 14. sect. 5.)

Being taken from the children of Israel.] At whose charge they were provided, though prepared by the Levites. (See Nehem. x. 32, 33.)

By an everlasting covenant.] By virtue of that command (which they had all agreed to observe) which required the shew-bread to be set before the Lord alway, (Exod. xxiv. 3. xxv. 30.)

Ver. 9. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'.] Who, as God's servants, ate of the bread which came from his table.

And they shall eat it in the holy place.] For the most holy things could be eaten no where else. (See chap. iv. 26. 29.)

For it is most holy unto him.] See chap. ii. of this book, ver. 3.

Of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.] It need not seem strange that this bread, which was not burnt upon the altar as meat-offerings were, should be reckoned among the offerings made by fire; for as the altar (where those meat-offerings were burnt) is called God's table, (Mal. i. 12.) so this table, where the shew-bread stood, was really God's altar: insomuch that the bread, which was set upon it before him, was looked upon as offered unto him; and the frankincense set upon the bread, as a part of it, being really burnt, it may be called an offering made by fire. Thus the gentiles also, as an excellent person of our own hath observed, thought tables, rightly dedicated unto their gods, to supply the place of altars. So Macrobius saith, (lib. iii. Saturnal. cap. 11.) it evidently appeared, by Papyrian's law, that aræ vicem præstare posse mensam dicatam, a table consecrated might serve instead of an altar. Of which he gives an instance in the temple of Juno Populonia; and then proceeds to give a reason for it, because altars and tables, eodem die, quo ædes ipsæ, dedicari solent, were wont to be dedicated on the same day with the temples themselves. From whence it was that a table, hoc ritu dedicata, dedicated in this manner, was of the same use in the temple with an altar. (See Dr. Outram de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 8. n. 7.)

By a perpetual statute.] As long as these sacrifices lasted.

Ver. 10. And the son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian, went out among the children of Israel.] In the Hebrew the words run thus; And there went out the son of an Israelitish woman, and he was the son of an Egyptian man, in the midst of (or, among) the children of Israel: which last words signify, that, though his father was an Egyptian by birth, yet he was become a proselyte by religion: and was one of those (as it is probable) who went along with the Israelites when God brought them out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 38.) So R. Solomon Jarchi interprets this phrase, among the children of Israel: hence, saith he, we learn, that he was a proselyte of righteousness. And Aben Ezra to the same purpose, he was received into the number of the Jews. See a great many more in Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 1. numb. 2. where he observes, that it is the common opinion of the Jews, this man was the son of him whom Moses killed in Egypt, (Exod. ii. 12.)

And this son of the Israelitish woman and a man of Israel strove together in the camp.] When God was delivering the foregoing laws unto Moses, this case seems to have happened. And the Jews say the controversy between these two was this: the former, looking upon himself as having a good right to it by his mother, came and endeavoured to set up a tent among the children of Dan, in that place where their tribe had pitched their tents; which was opposed by one of that tribe, who told him, the right of his mother would do him no service, unless his father had been an Israelite: for the law was, (Numb. ii. 2.) that every man of the children of Israel should pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house: which law, though given afterward, yet they suppose was the rule before; by which this man was condemned, by those that heard the cause, to be in the wrong.

Ver. 11. And the Israelitish woman's son blasphemed the name of the Lord, and cursed.] Sentence being given against him, he uttered blasphemous words against God himself (perhaps renounced the Lord), and also cursed those judges that had condemned him.

The Jews commonly think, that this blasphemy was his pronouncing the peculiar name of God, which he heard at Mount Sinai, when the law was given. But this is a mere fancy; for there were some reproachful words uttered against God, as well as against the judges, as appears from ver. 15. And they themselves acknowledge, that a proselyte was guilty of death, whether he cursed by the proper name of God, or any other, as Mr. Selden shews, (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 12.) Pellicanus thinks it probable that this man mocked at the foregoing laws, which were delivered about the worship of God; and contemned God himself, when he was told by whose authority they were enacted.

And they brought him unto Moses.] If the occasion of their strife was such as the Jews imagine, then Mr. Selden thinks it highly probable that the cause had been heard and judged by some of the lesser courts established by Jethro's advice, (Exod. xviii. 21, 22.) where the blasphemy had been so plainly proved, that he was convicted of it: but they, doubting about the punishment of so high a crime, referred the consideration of that to Moses, as the supreme judge.

And his mother's name was Shelomith, the daughter of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan.] I see no reason of mentioning the name of the woman from whom he was descended, but that all might be satisfied of the truth of this history.

Ver. 12. And they put him in ward.] Committed him to prison, that he might be secured till his punishment was declared.

That the mind of the Lord might be shewed them.] In the Hebrew the words are, That it might be expounded to them (viz. by Moses), according to the mouth of the Lord; that is, as the Lord should declare to him. And so Onkelos renders them, Till the matter was expounded to them, according to the sentence of the word of the Lord. For it is noted here, by a famous commentator among the Jews, (as Mr. Selden observes in the place beforementioned, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1.) that God was consulted about this matter, "Because they did not know whether he was to die for this crime; or whether his judgment was to be expected from the hand of Heaven, or otherwise:" whence Jarchi says, "They did not know whether he was guilty of death or not." And so Theodoret, Q. xxxiii. in Lev. There was no law, as yet, about this matter: but there was a plain law, that whosoever cursed his father or mother should die, (Exod. xxi. 17.) from whence they might justly infer he was to be so punished, who cursed his heavenly Father; there being also another law against those that reviled the judges and rulers, (Exod. xxii. 28.) And therefore I take it, they only doubted what kind of death he should die, about which Moses consulted the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 13. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It is likely Moses went into the sanctuary to inquire of God, who, from the mercy-seat, pronounced the following sentence against him; and also made a perpetual law about this case, with some others.

Ver. 14. Bring forth him that cursed without the camp.] This is the sentence pronounced by the mouth of God, from whom they expected it. And, first, he orders the criminal to be carried forth out of the camp, as an unclean, (Numb. v. 2, 3.) nay, an accursed thing, (Josh. vii. 24.)

And let all that heard him.] Next, he orders the witnesses to be produced, who heard him speak the blasphemous words.

Lay their hands upon his head.] This was a peculiar thing in this case, hands being laid upon no man's head condemned by the Sanhedrin, but only upon a blasphemer. By which ceremony they solemnly declared, that they had given a true testimony against him, and thought him worthy of the death he was condemned to suffer; and, perhaps, prayed God, that all the punishment of this sin might fall upon this man, and not upon them, nor the rest of the people. And so the Jews tell us their manner was to say, Let thy blood be upon thy own head, which thou hast brought on thyself by thy own guilt.

And let all the congregation stone him.] This was the last part of the sentence, that, when they that heard him curse had taken off their hands, all the congregation should stone him: which is the same punishment the law inflicted on him that cursed his father or his mother, (chap. xx. 9. see there.)

Ver. 15. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying.] Upon this occasion a new law is made, in express terms, against blasphemy.

Whosoever curseth his God.] Some of the Hebrews understand this of a gentile, who lived among them, and was not yet solemnly made a proselyte of the gate, that, if he cursed the god which was worshipped in his country, he should die for it. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. ult.) And Procopius Gazæus extends the words to such persons as cursed the god they worshipped, though he were a false god: which is according to the common rule of the Talmudists, that where we find these words, isch, isch (man, man, which we well translate whosoever), they comprehend gentiles as well as Jews. But, no doubt, this law particularly concerned the people of Israel; whom God intended, by this law, to preserve from such horrid impiety as is here mentioned.

Shall bear his sin.] Be stoned. (See chap. xx. 9.) If the word curseth be understood in the proper sense, Procopius well observes, that nothing could be more senseless than this sin, and upon that account deserved stoning; for he that curseth his God, upon what God will he call to confirm his curse? But the Hebrew word seems to import only speaking contemptuously of God.

Ver. 16. And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall surely be put to death, &c.] It is uncertain, whether this be a higher degree of the sin mentioned in the foregoing verse, or only a repetition of the same law, with a more express declaration of the punishment he should bear for his sin. The Jews unreasonably understand it of him alone that expressed the name, i. e. the most holy name of God, as they say in Sanhedrin, cap. 7. numb. 5. where Joh. à Coch observes out of the Jerusalem Targum on Deut. xxxii. that it is thus explained, Woe unto those that in their execrations use the holy name; which it is not lawful for the highest angel to express. But this is a piece of their superstition: the meaning undoubtedly is, that if any man reproached the Most High, he should die for it; but the mere pronouncing his holy name could be no crime, when men might swear by it, though not take it in vain, (Deut. vi. 13. Exod. xx. 7.)

All the congregation shall certainly stone him.] As they were ordered to do with the present offender, (ver. 14.)

As well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, &c.] By stranger may be meant a proselyte, like the Egyptian, whose offence was the occasion of this law: but the Jews extend it to Samaritans and gentiles; only they say, such were to be punished by the sword, and not by stoning.

Ver. 17. And he that killeth a man, shall surely be put to death.] This law was given before, Exod. xxi. 12. And it is not easy to give an account why it is here repeated after the case of a blasphemer. Perhaps it was upon the occasion of the last words in the foregoing verse, as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death. For, after the following laws, they are repeated again as a general rule, (ver. 22.) that no man might think it hard a stranger should be punished for blasphemy, as much as an Israelite, when in other cases the same judgment passed upon them both. Procopius Gazæus thinks a murderer is joined with a blasphemer, because they have the same mind and intention; the one desiring to destroy God, if it were possible, as the other doth his neighbour. "Therefore the law puts them together; just as, on the contrary, when it commands the love of God, it couples with it the love of our neighbour." So he.

Ver. 18. And he that killeth a beast shall make it good, beast for beast.] It was incongruous, as the same Procopius speaks, to annex unto the law against murder a law against other injuries. And concerning this, see Exod. xxi. 33, 34. For the Hebrew word behemah, here used, signifies such domestic tame beasts as are there mentioned.

Ver. 19, 20. If a man cause a blemish in his neighbour, as he hath done, so shall it be done to him, &c.] This law concerns only free persons, not their slaves, and hath been explained, Exod. xxi. 24, 25.

Ver. 21. And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it; and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death.] This is a short repetition of the two first laws here mentioned, (ver. 17, 18.) to make them the more regarded.

Ver. 22. Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger as for one of your own country.] In these, and in all other cases, as well as blasphemy, (ver. 16.) you and the stranger shall be judged by one and the same law.

For I am the Lord your God.] Who will neither favour your wickedness, nor suffer theirs to go unpunished; but do equal justice unto all. Yet the Jews, by a stranger here, will understand only a proselyte of righteousness, as they call him; that is, one who had entirely embraced their religion; for such alone, they imagine, were equalled with them. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1. p. 468.)

Ver. 23. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should bring forth him that had cursed out of their camp, &c.] It appears, by this, that all the foregoing admonitions were repeated to Moses, upon the occasion of the law against blasphemy, before he proceeded to put it in execution.

And the children of Israel did as the Lord commanded Moses.] Executed the whole sentence pronounced by God against the blasphemous person, (ver. 14.)

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses in Mount Sinai, saying.] That is, in the wilderness of Sinai, (Numb. i. 1.) For they stayed almost a whole year not far from this mountain, from whence they did not remove till the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt. (See Numb. x. 11, 12.) And thus the Hebrew particle beth is often used for by or near, as in Gen. xxxvii. 13. Josh. v. 13. and we find this expression again in the end of the next chapter, and in the conclusion of this book. Which shews that all here related was delivered to Moses in the first month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, immediately after the tabernacle was set up, (Exod. xl. 17.)

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] For what follows was of universal concernment.

When ye come into the land which I give you.] This law, though delivered before they left Mount Sinai, could not take place till they came into Canaan.

Then shall the land keep a sabbath.] Rest from being tilled, or sown, &c. (See Exod. xxiii. 11.)

Unto the Lord.] In obedience to him, and in honour of him. Some have understood the foregoing words, When ye shall come into the land which I give you, as if they were to begin the sabbatical year as soon as they entered into Canaan: which is very absurd; for so, not the seventh, but the first, would have been the year of rest. And that had been very inconvenient, if not destructive; the war making such great waste, no doubt, that provision would have been very scarce, if no care had been taken for the ensuing year. It is to be considered also, that the old store upon which they lived when they entered into the land of promise, was the fruit of the labour of the Canaanites, and not of the children of Israel. The meaning therefore is, that the seventh year after their entrance into Canaan, or rather, after they were settled, and had rest in it, they should let the land rest.

The only question is, when this year was to begin? whether in the month of Tisri (which answers to our September), which was the ancient beginning of the year; or in Nisan (answering to our March), which was made a new beginning of it, by an express law, Exod. xii. 2. the former still continuing the beginning of the year for civil things as this for sacred. Now there is great reason to think that this sabbatical year was to commence from September, when all their harvest was over, which began in March. Then they were not to sow, as they were wont to do in October, and the following months; but to stay till the return of this season the next year: for, if this year had been to begin in March, they could not have reaped the harvest of the sixth year.

Ver. 3. Six years shalt thou sow thy field, and prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof.] Exod. xxiii. 10. But what was allowed in other years, is forbidden in this.

Ver. 4. But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the Lord.] Or, unto the Lord, (as we translate it before, ver. 2.) who, though he gave this land to them, continued the proprietor of it (as he declares, ver. 23.) and the Lord in chief, himself; of whom they held it by this tenure, that they should till it, &c. only six years together, for their own use; and in the seventh, let it lie in common, for such uses as he appointed. And it was for the honour of the Lord that they observed this law; for as the weekly sabbath was an acknowledgment that they were his, so this sabbatical year was an acknowledgment that their land was his.

Thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard.] By this he explains what he means by letting it rest. And these two words, sow and prune, comprehend all other things that were usually done about their fields or trees, as ploughing, digging, dunging, &c. And though a vineyard be only mentioned, yet it is plain, by Exod. xxiii. 10. that oliveyards are comprehended under the same law; and these are mentioned only as examples of all other fruit-trees, which were to be left in common as these were.

Maimonides seems to be something too curious in what he saith upon this subject; for, inquiring why Moses mentions only these two things, sowing and pruning, his resolution is, that for these two, if men offended in them this year, they were punished with that scourging called malkut; but if they offended in any other sort of labours belonging to the culture of the fields, or of trees, they were not punished with the scourging of malkut (which was by a certain measure, not exceeding thirty-nine stripes), but with the scourging called mardut, i. e. of contumacy and rebellion, which was without number or measure. As, if a man digged or ploughed his ground; if he gathered out the stones, or dunged it, &c.; if he planted trees, or grafted, &c.; he suffered the scourging of rebellion. And more than this, he saith, it was not lawful in the seventh year to plant any tree, though it was not a fruit-tree; nor to cut off the dead branches; nor to make a smoke under them to kill the worms; nor to anoint young plants to preserve them from the bitings of birds, &c. If they did, they were liable to the scourging of mardut. Nay, he is so nice, as to say it was unlawful to sell to any man any instrument of husbandry in this year, as a plough, a yoke, a sieve, &c.; yet he allows them, when they were under the oppression of the gentiles, and bound to find provision for their armies, to sow so much as would maintain them. Of which things he discourses at large, in his treatise called Schemitta ve Jobel, cap. 1. and cap. 7.

Ver. 5. That which groweth of itself.] Either from seed which fell casually the year before, or from the old root which sprouted out again, as Maimonides expounds it in the same treatise, cap. 4. which is wholly about such things.

Of thy harvest.] Of the corn scattered last harvest. He saith nothing of their gardens; which, it is probable, every man had to his own private use, and was not bound to lay them open to all.

Thou shalt not reap.] That is, saith he, not the whole field, so as to gather it into cocks, and to tread out the corn with his oxen (if any did, they were scourged with thirty-nine stripes), but they might cut down a little, in common with other persons, and shake it out, and eat it, as he there determines, (sect. 2.)

Neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed.] In the Hebrew the words are, the vine of thy separation; for it was separated this year from his dressing: and what he gathered in common with others, was not to be pressed in a wine-press, but with another instrument. The like he saith of olives, and of figs, and other things, which were to be ordered after another manner in this year than in the foregoing, (sect. 23.)

For it is a year of rest unto the land.] This general reason is so oft repeated, to make them sensible they were no more to do any thing about their land this seventh year, than they were to labour upon the seventh day. But he acknowledges, that if a gentile hired land in their country, he was not bound to let it rest, (sect. 29. of that chapter.)

Ver. 6. And the sabbath of the land.] Here the word sabbath signifies the fruit that grew in the sabbatical year; as the word sabbaths is used before (chap. xxiii. 38.) for the sacrifices upon the sabbaths.

Shall be meat for you.] This explains the prohibition of reaping any corn this year, or gathering any fruit, not to be meant absolutely; but only that they should not look upon any thing that grew this year as peculiarly theirs, because it grew in their ground, but let all be common to others as well as themselves.

For thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, &c.] This, and the next verse, shew that all the fruits of the earth were perfectly in common this year: for the very beasts were not excluded; and, therefore, much less any man that dwelt among them, though he was uncircumcised. But it is very plain, likewise, that the owner of the land and his family were not forbidden to take their share, but might gather for their daily use as well as others, only not lay up any thing separate for themselves.

Ver. 7. And for thy cattle, and for the beasts that are in the land, shall all the increase thereof be meat.] For his own cattle, and for other men's: which were not to be fed with the fruits which are proper to men; (as Maimonides observes in the same book, cap. 5. sect. 5.) but if they came of themselves, and ate figs, for instance, they were not to be hindered. But it seems probable that wild beasts might be driven out of their vineyards, &c. in this year as well as others, because they made such waste as would have very much damaged the owner for the future. As for all other tame creatures, the Jews, (if we may believe Maimonides, cap. 7.) were so superstitiously careful they should have an equal share with themselves, that when there was no fruit any longer for the beasts in the field, they ceased to eat what they had gathered for themselves; and, if they had any thing of it left, threw it out of their houses.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, &c.] Which, put together, made forty-nine years; as it follows in the rest of this verse. They began their first account (as Maimonides there observes) from the fourteenth year after their entrance into Canaan; for they were seven years in conquering the land, and seven more in dividing to every one their portion: so that the first sabbatical year was in the one-and-twentieth, and the first jubilee in the sixty-fourth year, after they came to the land of promise; so he, cap. 10. where he observes, they numbered seventeen jubilees from that time to their captivity in Babylon, which fell out in the end of a sabbatical year, and the thirty-sixth of the jubilee.

Ver. 9. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee.] The word jobel (which we translate jubilee in the next verse) is not in the Hebrew, but teruah, which, in the margin, we translate loud of sound: for the trumpet was blown after a different manner at this time, than upon other occasions, that every one might understand the meaning of it.

To sound.] In the Hebrew the word is, cause it to pass, that it might be heard every where throughout the land. So these words may be most literally translated, thou shalt cause to pass the trumpet loud of sound.

On the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement.] This day was very fitly chosen, that this year might begin at the same time that a general atonement was made for the sins of the whole nation: for they would be the better disposed to forgive their brethren their debts, when they craved pardon for their own.

Shall ye make the trumpet sound (or pass) throughout all your land.] This is repeated, to make them careful to awaken every one to this duty, by the sound of the trumpet at every door; there being an unwillingness in most people to part with their servants, and their lands, &c. which they had long enjoyed. And therefore, every private man, as Maimonides saith, was bound to blow with a trumpet, and make this sound nine times, that they might fulfil these words of this precept, throughout all your land. By this means, as R. Levi Barzelonita notes, every one was the better inclined to hearken, when he saw it was a duty incumbent on the whole country, which all were to perform.

Ver. 10. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year.] Distinguish it from all other years, by doing what follows. Maimonides fancies, that these two precepts of numbering seven sabbaths of years, (ver. 8.) and of sanctifying the fiftieth year, were delivered only to the house of judgment; whose business, no doubt, it peculiarly was, to give notice of this year, and to cause the trumpet to be sounded, and all the following precepts to be observed. (Schemitta ve Jobel, cap. 10. num. 1.)

And proclaim liberty.] Unto all servants, who were this year made free.

Throughout all the land.] Even in all the highways, as Aben Ezra glosses, that every one might have notice.

Unto all the inhabitants thereof.] That is, to all the children of Israel who were servants; or so poor, that they had sold their estates, as it here follows. From these words the Jews gather, that after the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half tribe of Manasseh were carried captive, jubilees ceased. They are the words of Maimonides in the forenamed treatise; for then all the inhabitants of the land were not in it. And therefore much more when they were all carried captive, they only numbered the rest of every seventh year without any jubilee.

It shall be a jubilee unto you.] Whence this year hath the name of jobel, there are so many opinions, that Bochartus himself scarce knew which to follow. Josephus saith it signifies ἐλευθερίαν, liberty; and the LXX. and Aquila translate it ἄφεσιν, remission, having a regard to the thing, rather than to the import of the word jobel, which never signifies any thing of that nature. D. Kimchi tells us, that R. Akiba, when he was in Arabia, heard them call a ram by this name of jobel; and thence some fancy this year was so called, because it was proclaimed with trumpets of rams' horns. But what if there were no such trumpets? as Bochart thinks there were not, these horns being not hollow. See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43. p. 425, &c. where several other opinions are confuted. The most probable that I meet withal, is, that it was called jobel, from the peculiar sound which was made with the trumpet when this year was proclaimed. For the trumpet blowing for several purposes, viz. to call their assemblies together, to give notice of the moving of their camps, to excite soldiers to fight, and to proclaim this year; there was a distinct sound for all these ends, that people might not be confounded, but have a certain notice what the trumpet sounded for. And this sound mentioned before (ver. 9.) was peculiarly called jobel, as Hottinger thinks, who considers a great many other opinions in his Analecta, Diss. iii. wherein he follows Joh. Forsterus, who, near a hundred years before, observed that jobel, which we commonly translate trumpet, (Exod. xix. 13. and other places) doth not signify the instrument itself, but the sound that it made. And when it is used absolutely alone, it signifies this year, which was called jobel, from that sound which was then made; as the feast of unleavened bread was called pesach, from the angel passing over them when he slew the Egyptians. The opinions of the Hebrew writers about it are collected and largely represented by Josephus de Voisin, (lib. i. de Jubilæo, cap. 1.)

And ye shall return every man unto his possession.] Unto his field, or his house, which his poverty had forced him to sell: but now was restored to him without any price, because they were not sold absolutely, but only till this year. By which means the estates of the Israelites were so fixed, that no family could ruin itself or grow too rich. For this law provided against such changes, revoking once in fifty years all alienations, and setting every one in the same condition wherein he was at the first. By which means ambition was retrenched, and every man applied himself with affection to the improvement of his inheritance, knowing it could never go out of his family. And this application was the more diligent, because it was a religious duty, founded upon this law of God.

And ye shall return every man unto his family.] From which he had been estranged by being sold to another family, either by himself, or by his father, or by the court of judgment. So here are two parts of the liberty forenamed more expressly declared: their land, which was alienated, returned to the first owner; and such as were sold for servants into another family came home again to their own family, being freed from their servitude. Which was a figure of that acceptable year of the Lord, as St. Luke calls it, (chap. iv. 19.) in the prophet Isaiah's language, wherein our blessed Saviour preached deliverance to all mankind. The Jews themselves are not so stupid as to think nothing further was intended, but only freedom from bodily servitude in this year of jubilee; for Abarbinel himself, in this very verse, endeavours to discover something of a spiritual happiness. For the former part of the words now mentioned, ye shall return every man to his possession, he saith, belongs to the body; but the latter part, and every man unto his family, belongs unto the soul, and its return to God: so several others, whom J. de Voisin produces in the forenamed book, (cap. 2.) And, if our Dr. Lightfoot hath made a right computation, the last year of the life of our Saviour, who, by his death, wrought an eternal redemption, and restored us to our heavenly inheritance, fell in the year of jubilee, the very last that was ever kept. For, if we count from the end of the wars of Canaan, which was seven years after they came into it (and I do not know why we should not think they began to number then, and not seven years after, as Maimonides would have it), there were just fourteen hundred years to the thirty-third of Jesus Christ, that is, just twenty-eight jubilees. And it is the confession of the old book called Zohar, as he observes, that "the Divine Glory should be freedom and redemption in a year of jubilee." (See Harmony of the New Testament, sect. 59. and Usserii Chronologia Sacra, cap. 13.)

Ver. 11. A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you.] It is a question, whether the year of jubilee was the year following the forty-ninth year; or, the forty-ninth year was the jubilee; which, reckoning the foregoing jubilee for one, was the fiftieth year. Josephus Scaliger, in his fifth book de Emend. Temporum, and several other great men, are of this last opinion, to avoid a great inconvenience, which otherwise would ensue, viz. that the forty-ninth year being the sabbatical year, in which the land was to rest, if the next year to that had been the jubilee, two sabbatical years would have come immediately one after another; for the land was to rest in the year of jubilee, as it here follows. One would have expected, therefore, that in the forty-eighth year there should have been a special promise, that the land should bring forth fruit for four years, and not for three only, as the blessing is promised every sixth year, (ver. 21.) Thus Jacobus Capellus reasons, in his Historia Sacra et Exotica ad A. M. 2549. But others think this objection not to be so great as to make them depart from the letter of this law, which saith, (ver. 10.) ye shall hallow the fiftieth year; and here in this verse, a jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you. Though a very learned man, P. Cunæus, thinks this of no great moment either way; for it is usual, in common speech, septimanam octiduum appellare (and Hospinian, in like manner, we call a week octiduum, eight days, because we reckon utramq; Dominicam, both the Lord's days). And the greatest writers anciently called an olympiad, which contained but the space of four complete years, by the name of Quinquennium. (See lib. i. de Republ. Judæorum, cap. 6.) Yet, besides the express words of the law, the consent of the Jews sways very much the other way; for they accurately distinguish between the schemitta, or year of remission, and jobel, the year of jubilee, even then when these two solemnities succeeded each other; as I shall have occasion to observe on the next verse.

Ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself in it.] Because it was the sabbatical year, (ver. 4, 5.) as some will have it; from the observance of which they were not absolved by its being the jubilee. But others think, as I observed, that the jubilee itself was a new sabbatical year.

Ver. 12. For it is the jubilee.] He doth not say it is the sabbath of the land, as he doth of the seventh year, (ver. 6.) Which makes for their opinion who think the jubilee was not the same with that, but a new sabbatical year; so that two years together they neither sowed nor reaped. But they that maintain the other opinion, look upon this only as a new reason why they should forbear such labour this year; because, besides that it was the sabbatical year, it was also the jubilee; a time of great joy, in regard of the liberty to which every one was restored; which made it more necessary every one should enjoy what the earth brought forth of itself, and none appropriate any thing to themselves.

It shall be holy unto you.] Because it was the Lord's sabbath, (ver. 3.) separate from the common employments of other years; being dedicated to the uses expressed in this law, (ver. 10.) which are two; manumission of servants, and restitution of men to their ancient possessions: unto which some add a third, viz. remission of debts. But the Jews are of a quite contrary opinion; that in this the year of jubilee differed from the sabbatical year—that debts were remitted in the one, but not in the other. Whence those words of Maimonides, in the treatise I have so often mentioned: (cap. 10. sect. 16.) "In this the sabbatical year excels the jubilee, that it remits debts, which the jubilee doth not: but the jubilee in this excels the sabbatical year, that it sets servants free, and restores possessions, which the other doth not. And the jubilee likewise restores possessions in the very beginning of the year; but the sabbatical year doth not release debts till it be ended."

Ye shall eat the increase thereof out of the field.] By plucking what they needed for every day's use; but not by reaping, and gathering, and laying up in barns.

Ver. 13. In the year of this jubilee ye shall return every man to his possession.] This being the most remarkable thing belonging to the liberty of this year, it is therefore here again repeated. For it was so famous, that the heathens themselves took notice of it; insomuch, that Diodorus Siculus saith, (lib. xi.) it was not lawful for the Jews τοὺς ἰδίους κλήρους πωλεῖν, to sell their own inheritances: meaning, as Mr. Selden expounds it, (Lib. de Success. ad Leges Hebr. cap. 14.) to sell them quite, so as to alienate them for ever from their families; which is expressly forbidden, (ver. 23.) And so the Locrians, as is observed by Aristotle in his Politics, were prohibited, by their laws, to sell their ancient possessions. (See P. Cunæus, lib. i. de Repub. Jud. cap. 4.)

Many reasons are given, by learned men, for this law among the Jews, (see Menochius, lib. iii. de Repub. Hebræor. Quest. 3.) The most obvious is, that by this law God fixed the Jews to the land of Canaan; since all their possessions were so entailed, that the right heir of any of them could never be wholly excluded from his estate; but it would entirely return to him after a certain number of years. And, by this means also, they preserved a distinct knowledge of their several tribes and families to which they belonged; for which end their genealogies were of necessity to be carefully kept, that they might be able to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. By which means, as Menochius notes, it was certainly known of what tribe and family the Messiah was when he was born. And M. Alix hath taken notice (which is worth observing), that God ordered things so, that they should have the means of preserving their genealogies, by not suffering them to continue in captivity out of their own land, for the space of two whole jubilees. For they were but seventy years in Babylon; in which short time their genealogies could not be easily confounded, especially since several who saw the first temple burnt, lived to see the second begin to be rebuilt. Two other reasons are most judiciously managed by Petrus Cunæus, lib. i. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 3. to which I refer the learned reader.

Ver. 14. If thou sellest aught to thy neighbour, or buyest aught of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another.] As Moses took care that the wealth of some should not oppress the poverty of others, by making the foregoing law, that a poor man should not lose his land for ever; so, in buying of a poor man's land, he would not have the rich man give less for it than it was worth; no more than the poor man require more for it than its just value till the year of jubilee. The Hebrew doctors have formed a rule about this: that if a man bought any thing for a sixth part less than its worth, or sold it for a sixth part more than its worth, he was bound to restore that sixth part; but nothing at all if it were short of a sixth part, wherein he had damaged his neighbour. But if the difference was more than a sixth part, the buyer might rescind his contract, if the bargain was not quite finished, and require his money again. And the seller (if the damage was on his side) might at any time require the thing to be returned to him at the price for which he sold it. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 5.)

Ver. 15. According to the number of years after the jubilee, thou shalt buy of thy neighbour.] They were to consider how many years were gone since the last jubilee, and consequently to purchase the profits of the remaining years till the next; for they could not, either by sale or any other contract, transfer plenum fundi dominium (as Cunæus speaks), their full interest in the land to any other man.

And according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee.] He that sold the remaining term of years till the jubilee was to consider, that every sixth year there was no fruit, and therefore he should demand nothing for them; but set his price only according to the number of the other years, not reckoning those.

Ver. 16. According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price.] This is added only to make what was said before plainer, that the price should rise or fall, according as there were more or fewer years to come before the next jubilee. For example, Maimonides puts this case: if there be ten years to the jubilee, and a man buy another's field for a hundred pence; after which, the buyer having enjoyed it three years, the seller hath a mind to redeem it; he must then give to him that bought it of him seventy pence. In like manner, if the buyer have enjoyed it six years, the seller must give him forty pence.

For according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee.] Therefore, if a man, saith the same Maimonides, (cap. 11. num. 6.) sell another a field full of fruit, and, after two years, would redeem it, he must not demand him to restore the field as he sold it, full of fruit, because it is said here, according to the multitude of years, or fewness of years (and, in the foregoing verse, according to the number of years after the jubilee), which shews the years only were to be considered in the redemption, and not the fruits.

Ver. 17. Ye shall not therefore oppress one another.] The seller by demanding too much, nor the buyer by giving too little.

But thou shalt fear thy God.] For nothing could be so powerful as the fear of God to restrain them from oppression, and to preserve an equality between the land to be sold and the price to be paid.

For I am the Lord your God.] Whose land this is, and by whose favour you enjoy it.

Ver. 18. Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments.] Which are the tenure whereby you hold this land of me.

And ye shall dwell in the land in safety.] And if you obey them, you shall not be disturbed in it by your enemies.

Ver. 19. And the land shall yield her increase, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety.] He encourages them in their obedience, by a promise of plenty and abundance, as well as of safety and security in their possessions.

Ver. 20. And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? &c.] To take away all distrust of his promise, he removes an obvious objection which might arise in their minds: that they might want food, if they neither sowed, nor gathered in their increase, in the seventh year, as he required.

Ver. 21. Then will I command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years.] This is the answer to the doubt they might have of wanting sustenance, that he would bless them with such a plentiful crop in the sixth year, as should be sufficient for that and for the two following years. From which Petrus Cunæus thinks the argument very strong, that there were not two sabbatical years together, one in the forty-ninth, and another in the fiftieth year; for then the earth in the sixth year should have brought forth not for three years, but for four; which was never heard of in any country. Palestine, indeed, was a country, to which God afforded an extraordinary blessing, beyond the common laws of nature; yet, since there are no testimonies of so great and frequent a miracle in the book of God, we ought not easily to believe this. Thus he, lib. i. de Repub. Heb. cap. 6. To which it may be replied, that this was not so frequent as he makes it, but only once in fifty years: and the reason why Moses here saith, the land should bring forth fruit for three years, and not for four, is, because he speaks only with respect to the common sabbatical years (every seventh year), not to the great sabbatical year, as they call the forty-ninth; before which, God may very well be supposed to have blessed the earth with a larger crop than in any other preceding sixth year. Besides, though it is said they should not sow in the jubilee, (ver. 11.) yet it is not said they might not prune their trees, as it is of other sabbatical years, (ver. 4.) so that they might be dressed as in other common years, to yield a plentiful increase for their support in the succeeding year.

Ver. 22. And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year.] Some have interpreted these words, as if they were to eat the old store, till the fruits of the ninth year came in; and bring it as an argument, that the sabbatical year began in March; whereas the plain sense is, that the fruits of the eighth could not be thrashed out for food till the ninth year. And then the next words,

Until her fruits come in, ye shall eat of the old store.] Are not to be understood of the fruits of the ninth year, but of the fruits of the eighth, which were to be eaten in the ninth. Till then they were to live upon the old store; which served for two years, beside the sixth.

Ver. 23. The land shall not be sold for ever.] Having mentioned the selling of their land, (ver. 14—16.) he here again enacts it should not be sold for ever: which may be called the lex agraria of the Jews, whereby estates were preserved in the family to which they belonged at the division of the land by Joshua: for they could not be quite cut off, as the words are in the Hebrew, which we translate for ever; or, as it is in the margin, for cutting off; so that the seller and his heirs should be cut off from it, as Mr. Selden interprets it; or, as the LXX. εἰς βεβαίωσιν, by an alienation never to be rescinded: but all estates were at the jubilee to return to their first owners, or their heirs, though they had changed possessors a hundred times, by being sold so oft. And the same law held in donations, as much as in sales; as Maimonides observes. Yet this is to be understood only of absolute alienations, without any mention of time; for if any man sold, without fraud, an estate to his neighbour for sixty years, it was not to return to him, or his heirs, in the year of jubilee, which came before the expiration of that term; for in the jubilee, saith he, nothing returns but that which was sold for ever, (Halicoth Schemitta ve Jobel, cap. 11. sect. 2. and see Selden de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 24.)

For the land is mine.] I reserve to myself the supreme dominion in it, and propriety of it; and have disposed it to you on such terms as I thought fit.

For ye are strangers and sojourners with me.] These words suggest another sense of the foregoing; that their land was God's, as he dwelt in a special manner there in the sanctuary, which was his royal palace: and they were all his tenants, who held the land of him as long as he pleased; but were no more to him, than the proselytes were to them. The land was his, and not theirs; and they did but enjoy the use and the fruits of it, but had not the property. (See Mr. Mede, p. 157.)

Ver. 24. And in all the land of your possession, ye shall grant a redemption for the land.] If any man whose poverty had forced him to sell his land, grew afterward so rich, that he was able to redeem it before the year of jubilee, this law provides he should be permitted to do it, and the buyer could not refuse it. But then this was to be done honestly and truly: he was not to borrow money of another man to redeem it; no, nor sell other land to redeem that which he had sold before, which they looked upon as a fraud to the buyer. Therefore he had this right, only in case he was grown rich since the sale; otherwise he was to stay till the year of jubilee, when it returned to him for nothing. So Cunæus out of the same Maimonides, (lib. i. cap. 2.)

Ver. 25. If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession.] No man, if we may rely upon the same Maimonides, might sell his house or his field till the time of jubilee, unless poverty compelled him to it. For it was not lawful to sell it, that he might lay up the price of it in his coffer; or exercise merchandize; or buy goods, servants, or cattle; but only buy necessary provision with it. But if any man did transgress, and employ the money otherwise, the sale notwithstanding was held to be good.

And if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall be redeemed what his brother sold.] Here is a further enlargement of this liberty; that if any of his near relations would redeem the land he had sold (though he was not able to do it himself), it should be allowed: for the design of Moses in this law was, "Ne paucorum opulentia quandoque cæteros opprimeret," lest the wealth of a few should at any time oppress the rest.

Ver. 26. And if the man have none to redeem it, and himself be able to redeem it.] In the Hebrew it is, his hand hath attained and found sufficiency: which justifies the limitation the Jews put upon this, (as I observed, ver. 24.) that he should not have the right of redemption, unless he was grown able to repurchase it since the sale of it.

Ver. 27. Then let him count the years of the sale thereof, and restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it.] This was the manner of the redemption: they counted how many years were gone since the sale; and if there remained just so many more to the jubilee, then he paid the buyer half the price at which he purchased it, for its redemption. But if the number of years from the sale to the jubilee were not equal, then he deducted proportionable to the years he had enjoyed it since the purchase, and gave him as much as the years remaining till the jubilee were worth. And if he sold a field at first for a hundred pounds, suppose, and he that bought it sold it to another for two hundred, he was to redeem it, as Maimonides saith, according to what was first given for it, because it is said here, he shall restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it. In like manner, if a man sold a field for a hundred pounds, which in the hands of the buyer so improved, that it might be sold for two hundred, the redemption was to be according to what was first paid for it. But if he sold it for two hundred pounds, and it was grown so much worse that it was worth but a hundred, it was to be esteemed in the redemption according to the present value. His reason is, because "the condition of him that sold his inheritance was always to be bettered; and the condition of him that bought it to be made worse."

Ver. 28. But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that bought it, until the year of jubilee.] If he could not pay him the money it cost him, according to the forementioned proportion, nor any of his kindred redeem it for him, then he that bought it was to enjoy all the profits of it till the jubilee.

And in the jubilee he shall go out, and he shall return to his possession.] The purchaser was to quit his possession of the land; and he that sold it enjoy it again for nothing. And whosoever he was that possessed the land at the jubilee, though it had been sold never so often before it came to him, the jubilee ejected him, and restored the land to the first owner, or his posterity. For no man, as was before observed, could either by sale, or any other contract, transfer the full dominion of his land to another man; so that it should be his for ever.

Ver. 29. And if a man sell a dwelling-house in the walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold.] This verse and the next make a great difference between houses in walled cities, and lands in the country. If such houses were sold, men could not redeem them from the purchaser when they pleased, but must do it within the compass of a year, or else they were barred for ever; and the year of jubilee would not relieve them.

Within a full year may he redeem it.] He might redeem it the next day after he had sold it, if he pleased, paying the full price that was given for it: and if he that sold it was dead, his son might redeem it: or if he that bought it was dead, it might be redeemed from his son, if done within the year: but his kindred could not redeem it, nor might he borrow money to redeem it, nor redeem it by parcels; but he might sell some of his goods to redeem it. So Maimonides, in the forementioned treatise, (cap. 12.) where he saith, If a man sold a house in such a city, and the jubilee fell out in the year of sale, it did not restore the house to the seller; but continued his that bought it, unless within a year from the day it was sold it was redeemed.

Ver. 30. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house shall be established for ever to him that bought it.] The reasons for this law seem to be such as these; that by this means (as Menochius observes, lib. iii. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 11.) cities might be better filled with inhabitants; who were invited thither, when they had hope of a settlement there. And secondly, that men might not rashly and easily part with their houses, which they could never recover, after they had let one year slip, which was allowed for their redemption. And thirdly, tribes and families were not distinguished by houses they had in cities; from whence it was that the Levites might possess them, who otherwise are said to have no possession in the land of Canaan. And lastly, perhaps it was intended by this law, that proselytes, who were not of the Hebrew nation, and could have no fields or vineyards, might yet have something of their own stable and certain: and not be forced always to want a perpetual possession.

It shall not go out in the jubilee.] They say in the Ge-mara of Bava kama, that the houses in Jerusalem were not subject to this law; because that city, as they pretend, did not belong to any certain tribe. (See L'Empereur upon that book, cap. 7. p. 172.)

Ver. 31. But the houses in the villages, which have no walls round about them, shall be counted as the fields of the country, &c.] The quite contrary law is made for country-houses, which might be redeemed at any time; and if they were not, returned to their first owners at the jubilee. The reason of this difference is very plain; for the houses in walled cities were their own proper goods; but in the country they were accounted part of the land which was God's. And so these words are to be understood, they shall be counted as the fields in the country: that is, fall under the same law with the lands, (ver. 23.)

Ver. 32. Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites.] Of which we have an account, Numb. xxxv. 2. These are excepted from the foregoing law concerning houses in walled cities; as it here follows.

And the houses of the cities of their possession may the Levites redeem at any time.] Not any of their houses; but only those which they possessed in the forty-eight cities assigned to them for their habitations. If they purchased houses in any other places, they were subject to the same law with other men, (ver. 29.) Insomuch, that a Levite, who was heir to his mother, who was an Israelite, was to redeem as other Israelites did, and not after the manner of the Levites; for the Levites had a right different from other men only in the cities of their possessions; as Maimonides observes in the forecited book, (cap. 13.) But if an Israelite was heir to his mother, a Levite, he redeemed as the Levites did, though he were not of that tribe; because the right of their redemption "was tied to the places, and not to the persons;" as he there speaks.

Ver. 33. *And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession (*i. e. in the city of his possession), shall go out in the year of jubilee.] If he did not redeem it before, it was to come back to him for nothing in this year. But there is another translation in the margin, which the first words will bear, viz. If one of the Levites redeem them. Though he was not near of kin, (ver. 25.) yet any Levite might redeem any of these houses: however, they were to be restored to that tribe at the jubilee.

For the houses of the cities of the Levites.] It is plain by this, that in the foregoing words he speaks of the houses, and not of the cities themselves.

Are their possession among the children of Israel.] They were of the same nature with the land that other tribes had; which could not be alienated for ever. For they having no other possessions that could be sold, but houses, it was reason these houses should return to their owners at the jubilee, as other men's possessions did, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 34. But the field of the suburbs of their cities.] See Numb. xxxv. 4, 5.

May not be sold.] As their houses might be; but if any man bought them, the bargain was immediately void. The tradition among the Jews (as Maimonides says in the same place), was, that not be sold in this place, signifies not be changed; so as to turn a suburb into a field, or a field into a suburb; but fields, suburbs, and cities, were to continue perpetually in the same state.

For it is their perpetual possession.] Their fields were to be always in their own hands. And the reason why houses might be sold, when the fields could not, seems to be this: because the houses belonged to particular Levites, who might alienate them for a time, and not suffer much by it; but the fields of the suburbs were common to the whole body of the Levites, who would have been undone if they had wanted pasture for their flocks, which were all their substance. Some indeed fancy that these suburbs were enclosed, and every family of them had its several portion; but as there is no proof of this, so, had it been thus, such families could not, without great inconvenience, have wanted their lands for the feeding of their flocks.

Ver. 35. And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen to decay with thee.] In the Hebrew it is, When his hand faileth; so that he is not able by his labour to support himself and his family.

Then shalt thou relieve him.] By bestowing alms upon him (as the Jews interpret it), not by lending him money; though the following words seem to incline this way: (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6.)

Yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner.] By a stranger they understand a proselyte of righteousness, and by a sojourner a proselyte of the gate; as Mr. Selden there observes, out of Jarchi and Abarbinel, p. 694. They say Hyrcanus was the first that began ξενοτροφεῖν, to entertain strangers of other countries, by building hospitals for their reception.

That he may live with thee.] Have a comfortable subsistence by the relief of charitable people; for every Jew, they say, was bound to contribute something towards it; and this was to prevent their selling themselves, as some did, through extreme poverty, (ver. 39.)

Ver. 36. Take thou no usury of him, or increase.] Though these are promiscuously used, yet the next verse seems here to expound usury to signify that which is taken for money; and increase that which is taken for corn, fruits, or goods. They that would see more of these two words, nesek and tarbith, may consult Salmasius de Usuris, where he hath largely discoursed of them. I shall only further observe, that this precept follows the other of relieving poor people by alms very fitly; because it is as great a charity unto some to lend them money without usury, as it is to give freely unto others. (See notes on Exod. xxii. 25. Deut. xxiii. 19.)

But fear thy God.] Lest he that is so good to thee, should punish thee for thy inhumanity towards the poor; of whom he hath a care, as well as thee.

That thy brother may live with thee.] This is repeated, to shew that by these laws God intended to provide for the poor such a comfortable subsistence in their own country, that they might not be tempted to forsake it, and therewith perhaps forsake their religion.

Ver. 37. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase.] Some thought, if they lent money freely, they might receive more than they lent of other things; therefore, the latter clause of this verse was added, to prevent such oppressions as St. Jerome mentions; who says, some would lend a neighbour ten bushels, of corn, suppose, in winter, to receive fifteen bushels for it the next harvest.

Ver. 38. I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt.] Who have obliged you with far greater blessings than I command you to bestow upon others.

To give you the land of Canaan.] Under such covenants as have been mentioned.

And to be your God.] To preserve you in the possession of it in peace and plenty, if you keep these covenants, (ver. 18, 19.)

Ver. 39. And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee.] Some were sold by the court of judgment, when they had committed theft, and were not able to make satisfaction; of whom the Hebrews interpret that place, Exod. xxi. 2, &c. Others were sold by their parents, (ver. 7, 8. of that chapter.) But others sold themselves, being reduced to great poverty, notwithstanding the alms that had been bestowed upon them, and the money or goods that had been freely lent them. And of such the Hebrew doctors understand these words; and say, it was not lawful for a man to sell himself till his poverty was extreme, and he had nothing at all left, but must preserve his life by the price which was given for him. Thus Maimonides, in these words: "A man might not sell himself to lay up the money which was given for him; nor to buy goods; nor to pay his debts; but merely that he might get bread to eat. Neither was it lawful for him to sell himself, as long as he had so much as a garment left." See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7. where he observes, that the court of judgment might not sell a thief of their nation to any but to a Hebrew; not to a proselyte of either sort; much less to a mere gentile. But if a Hebrew sold him to a proselyte, or to a gentile (which he was admonished not to do), the bargain was good; but he was to be redeemed by his kindred, or by the people; as it here follows, ver. 48, 49. Which other people imitated, who derived their laws from Moses; particularly the ancient Indians (as Huetius observes out of Diodorus), whose philosophers commanded that none of their nation should submit themselves to servitude, (Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 6.)

Thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant.] As a slave, which they bought of other nations, or took in their wars; over whom they had an absolute dominion (as they had over their goods, or cattle), and might bequeath them and their children to their sons and posterity for ever, (ver. 45, 46.) or sell them and their children at their pleasure.

Ver. 40. But as a hired servant, and as a sojourner.] They were to treat him gently; as they did those who let out their service for wages, for a certain time, and then were at their own disposal again.

Shall he be with thee.] Some of the Jews have carried this very far in speculation. For thus they gloss upon this place in Jalkut: "Let him be with thee in meat and drink; so that thou do not eat bread of fine flour, and he of bran; nor thou drink old wine, and he new; nor thou lie on a soft bed, and he upon straw." But it is not likely that this was their practice.

And shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee.] Beyond which time it was not lawful to keep him in service: for in the very beginning of this year, all such servants were immediately dismissed. Which made the year of jubilee such a time of joy, that for nine days together, before it began, these servants kept a kind of Saturnalia, in prospect of their approaching happiness. For, as Maimonides saith in the latter end of the tenth chapter of Schemitta ve Jobel, from the beginning of the year until the day of atonement, "Servants were neither dismissed, nor yet served their masters; but they did eat, and drink, and made merry; wearing garlands on their heads. And when the day of atonement came, the Sanhedrin commanding the trumpet to be sounded, all servants immediately went whither they pleased; as lands were restored to their first owners."

Ver. 41. And then shall he depart from thee.] His master to whom he was sold might keep him till the jubilee: whereas he that was sold by the court of judgment might go free, if he pleased, in the seventh year of release, (Exod. xxi. 2.)

Both he and his children with him.] He that bought a servant of the court of judgment, was bound to maintain his wife and children, if he had any, with meat, drink, and clothes; and yet they were not bound to serve him: much less did they remain servants, when their father's and mother's servitude was at an end; as Mr. Selden observes in the forenamed place: and therefore it was much more reasonable in this case, that he and his children should go out together.

And shall return unto his own family.] From which he was gone, while he remained a servant.

And unto the possession of his fathers shall he return.] If any was befallen him since his servitude.

Ver. 42. For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt.] A good reason why they should not be treated like slaves; because they were all redeemed by God out of the slavery of Egypt into a state of perfect liberty.

They shall not be sold as bondmen.] Not publicly, and in the common place of sale, or in the street; but privately, and in a way of honour, (as the Jewish phrase is.) So Maimonides, alleged by Mr. Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 705. But the plainest sense is, they should not be used like slaves, while they continued in servitude; for though they had the use of them in all bodily employments, yet their bodies or persons were not theirs, and therefore they might not use them as they pleased. So it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 43. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour.] As Pharaoh did over all the Israelites, (Exod. i. 13, 14.) or as the Israelites were wont to do over their servants of other nations; but gently use their service in such employments, as would not be unworthy of them if they were freemen.

But shalt fear thy God.] Remembering that they were all slaves in Egypt, and delivered by his wonderful goodness; which was thankfully and reverently to be acknowledged.

Ver. 44. Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen.] If they would have any slaves, they were to be such of other nations, as were sold to them, or were taken by them in their wars. Whence the very name of mancipia came, as the Roman lawyers tell us, quasi manu capti: and the name of servus also, which signifies one who was saved, when he might have been killed.

Round about thee.] He doth not say, in the midst of thee; for they were bound to destroy the people of Canaan.

Of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids.] If they had need of their service. But it does not appear that they had any great number of them; nor had they any great occasion for them, being themselves so laborious, and breeding their children to look after their land and their cattle (in which their estates chiefly consisted), and being also so very numerous in a small country.

Ver. 45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy.] Whether they were perfect proselytes by circumcision, or only proselytes of the gate, (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 8.) their children were not exempted from being made slaves, if they sold them to the Hebrews.

And of the families that are with you, which they begat in your land.] If any of their family or kindred, as the LXX. translate it, had begat children in Judea, and would sell them, the Jews might make a purchase of them.

They shall be your possession.] Become your proper goods, and continue with you as your lands do, unless they have their liberty granted to them. And the first sort of proselytes obtained it three ways; either by purchasing it themselves, or by their friends; or by being dismissed by their master, by a writing under his hand; or in the case mentioned in Exod. xxi. 26. where the loss of an eye, or a tooth, by the master's severity, serve only for examples of other maims, which procured such a servant his liberty. But the second sort of proselytes did not obtain their liberty, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors, by this last means, but only by the two first. And the year of jubilee gave no servants of either sort their liberty.

Ver. 46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you.] To whom they might bequeath the very bodies of them and their children.

To inherit them for a possession.] That they might have the same power and dominion over them, that they had over their lands, goods, or cattle.

They shall be your bondmen for ever.] Not have the benefit of the year of jubilee, but be your slaves as long as they live; unless they, by any of the means beforementioned, obtained their liberty.

But over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule over one another with rigour.] As they did over the slaves beforenamed; whose masters (as the Hebrew doctors say) were not bound to find them food and raiment; and, besides, might treat them with the greatest severity, provided they did not strike out an eye, &c.

Ver. 47. If a sojourner or stranger.] The Chaldee interprets these words, an uncircumcised proselyte. And so Maimonides says, they signify one who hath undertaken the precepts of the sons of Noah; whom they also call, in their books, the pious among the gentiles. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 3. p. 153.)

Wax rich by thee.] As many of them did by trading, though they could not purchase land.

And thy brother that dwelleth by him waxeth poor.] Which was a case, Moses supposes before, (ver. 35.) might happen.

And sell himself unto the stranger and sojourner by thee.] So I observed before (ver. 39.) they might do, though they were admonished not to do it; and the bargain held good, though they sold themselves to a gentile. So Onkelos here translates it, If thy brother sell himself to an Aramite, i. e. to an idolater; for idolatry was thought to have sprung first from them: Terah and Nahor being Aramites, who were the first idolaters mentioned in the holy Scripture.

Or to the stock of the stranger's family.] To one that sprung out of the family of a proselyte; who, though now incorporated into the Jewish nation, yet, being originally of a stranger's stock, was not to have the privilege to keep a Hebrew sold to him from the benefit of redemption.

Ver. 48. After that he is sold.] And actually in the possession of a stranger.

He may be redeemed, &c.] The Hebrews understand this, as if some of his kindred were bound to redeem him; or, if they did not, he was to be redeemed at the charge of the country; and that, though he sold himself a second time, after he had been redeemed. But if he sold himself a third time, they looked upon him as unworthy of redemption, unless it were merely to save his life. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7.) But the fifty-fourth verse seems to suggest, that they were not bound to redeem him; though they might, if they pleased, and his master could not refuse it.

One of his brethren may redeem him.] This Redeemer (saith R. Bechai) is the Messiah, the Son of David, of the tribe of Judah: which I mention to shew, that the Jews thought there was something more Divine couched under this law of the jubilee, (as I observed, ver. 10.) than the very letter of it imported. Though the truth is, they wretchedly mistook the business of the Messiah: for the same R. Bechai (speaking of this section of the law) saith, "It contains a sign and a hope to Israel of redemption from the captivity of the four monarchies;" as if the Messiah should have nothing to do, but to put them in possession of their own country, and to make them lords of the world.

Ver. 49. Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, &c.] Here the persons are named by whom his redemption might be made; which, in short, was by any man of his family.

Or, if he be able, he may redeem himself.] If, after his sale, an estate fell to him, whereby he became able to redeem his liberty.

Ver. 50. And he shall reckon with him that bought him, from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubilee, &c.] That no injury might be done to his master, they were to compute how long he had served him, and how long he had still to serve, and what price was paid for him; and then, according to the number of years gone and to come, he was to make his demands: which is the meaning of the following words, And the price of his sale shall be according to the number of years.

According to the time of a hired servant shall it be with him.] The labour and service that he had done him was to be valued, as they would do that of a hireling (who wrought for so much by the day or the year), and deducting that from the price which was given for him, the remainder was the price of this redemption.

Ver. 51. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption.] If he had served but a few years, and there were many to come before the jubilee; then there was less to be deducted from what his master gave for him, and the price of his redemption was higher. But if there remained but few years unto the year of jubilee (as it follows in the next verse), then less was to be given for his redemption, because he had had his service a long time.

Ver. 53. And as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him.] His master was to treat him as a hired servant, who let out his service for wages by the year; and that both with respect to the price of his redemption, and to his usage while he remained in his service; as appears by the next words.

And the other shall not rule with rigour over him.] Use him harshly and severely; for one Israelite was not permitted to use another in that manner, (ver. 43.) and therefore much less was it to be suffered from a stranger.

In thy sight.] If they observed any such rigorous usage, they were to endeavour to get it remedied by the authority of the magistrate.

Ver. 54. And he be not redeemed in these years, then he shall go out in the year of jubilee.] If neither his kindred nor country redeemed him, nor he was able to redeem himself, (ver. 49.) from the time he was sold to the year of jubilee, he was to stay till then; when he went out, as others did, without paying any thing for his liberty. By which it is evident, that he had not the benefit of the seventh year of release, as Hebrew servants had who served Hebrew masters. For it had been unequal, if Hebrews sold to proselytes had been discharged from their service so soon, when the children of proselytes sold to Hebrews (ver. 45.) were to be their inheritance for ever. It was more reasonable (and therefore so here enacted), that the Hebrews sold to proselytes should not be free till the year of jubilee, unless they were redeemed by themselves or their friends. By which law also they were made more careful not to sell themselves to strangers.

He and his children with him.] It seems a proselyte was bound, when he bought a Hebrew servant, to maintain his family while he served him; as the Hebrews were bound to do, when they bought one of their own nation, (ver. 31.)

Ver. 55. For unto me the children of Israel are servants; they are my servants, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt.] He would not have them serve with rigour, nor beyond the year of jubilee, because they were his servants by a peculiar title, being redeemed by him from the Egyptian bondage, where they were held a long time in cruel servitude, (ver. 38.)

I am the Lord your God.] Your sovereign, who will be ever kind to you, while you serve and obey me.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. YE shall make you no idols.] This precept hath been often mentioned; but being now to enforce all his precepts by the most solemn promises and threatenings, he repeats the principal thing upon which all depended, which was, that they should keep close to the worship of him, the only God, and abhor all idolatry, which he knew would corrupt their manners.

The Hebrew word elilim hath been observed before, (chap. xix. 4.) to express contempt; signifying the idols (as we translate it) which the heathen worshipped, to be mere empty vanities, things of nought, as we speak; and therefore to be rejected with disdain, rather than any way regarded.

Nor graven image.] The Hebrew word pesel signifies the image of any thing hewn out of wood or stone: (see Exod. xx. 4.) These images the gentiles did not worship, till they were dedicated and consecrated with certain rites and ceremonies (which were very various, according to the difference of the deities, and the superstitions of several countries), by which consecration they imagined their gods were invited to be present in these images and statues; otherwise they were not so stupid, as to worship wood and stone.

Neither rear up a standing image.] The Hebrew word matsebah, is translated by the LXX. στύλην, a pillar, as we also translate it in the margin. And if we translate it statue, or standing image, we are not to understand by it the figure of a man, or of any other creature; but, as the Hebrews seem rightly to take it, for any work, an altar for instance, which is erected and set up for sacred assemblies to be held thereat, though they be to the true God. So Maimonides, (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6.) who saith, this was the custom among idolaters, to erect such statues to their gods. And so Pausanias saith (in his Achaica), that in ancient time among the Greeks, universally, ἀντὶ ἀγαλμάτων εἶχον ἀργοὶ λίθοι τιμὰς θεῶν, rude stones, instead of images, had Divine honours paid to them. (See Maimonides de cultu Stell. et Plan. cap. 6. sect. 8.) These were the most ancient monuments of all other; and being plain and simple, might be thought to be less tempting and inviting, than those images which had the figure of men, or other creatures; yet, even these God forbids to his people, because he would have no representation of him whatsoever, though it might seem to have no danger in it. These were they which the Greeks called Βαιτύλια. (See upon Gen. xxviii. 19. and Selden de Diis Syris, Syntag. 2. cap. 1.)

Neither set up any image of stone in your land.] There was greater reason they should not set up Eben Maschkith, which signifies carved or figured stones that had pictures cut in it, as the Hebrews understand it. (See Maimonides in the place beforenamed, and Dionys. Vossius's notes upon him.) And Mr. Selden observes, also, it was unlawful to set up these in their land (as Moses here speaks), though it were without the temple; and it was no more permitted to a proselyte than to an Israelite. If any man did make such statues he was beaten.

Possibly this may signify such images as were common among the Egyptians in aftertimes; which were not representations of their gods, but were full of symbols and hieroglyphics, expressing some of the perfections of their gods. These God would as little allow among his people as any of the former: such caution he used to prevent this sort of idolatry, by image-worship.

To bow down unto it.] Though they did not worship it, but only worship God before it.

I am the Lord your God.] Who admit of no such things where I am worshipped, (Exod. xx. 4.)

Ver. 2. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary, &c.] See chap. xix. 30. where there is the same precept: which seems to be here repeated, because, if they kept his sabbaths, they would preserve them from idolatry, being appointed for the worship of the Creator of all things; especially if they had such a sense of his Divine majesty as wrought reverence in them, even to his sanctuary.

Ver. 3. If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them.] If the regard you have to my majesty make you obedient to my laws.

Ver. 4. Then will I give you rain in due season.] Here follow the promises of all things that men naturally most desire for their happy living here in this world. And first he assures them they should have fruitful seasons, which depended upon rain in due time, (Jerem. v. 24.) For Canaan was not a country like Egypt, which was watered and made fertile by the overflowing of their river; but without rain was quite barren.

And the land shall yield her increase.] Corn for the use of men; and grass for the cattle.

And the trees of the field shall yield their fruit.] Which was very various every one knows, such as figs, pomegranates, dates, apples, &c. which he promises they should never want.

Ver. 5. And your thrashing shall reach unto the vintage, &c.] This is a promise of such plenty of corn, that before they could have reaped it all, and thrashed it out, the vintage would be ready, and call for their labour about it; and before they could have pressed out their wine, it would be time to sow again: as much as to say, they should have such abundance, that they should have scarce time enough to receive and lay up one blessing before another came upon them.

And ye shall eat your bread to the full.] Have no want of any sort of provision (which is comprehended under the name of bread), but as much as you can desire: which promise may seem to have a peculiar regard to the command lately given, chap. xxv. 4. 11. though there he took care to secure them by a special promise, that they should not want in those years, (ver. 20, 21.) and therefore much less in any other.

And dwell in your land safely.] Plenty would have been little satisfaction to them, if they had been in danger to lose it, or to be disturbed in it; and therefore he promises to defend and protect them in the secure enjoyment of it. (See chap. xxv. 18, 19.)

Ver. 6. And I will give peace in your land.] There shall be no insurrections or seditions in your country, which are wont to arise from poverty and discontent: for this seems to relate to peace among themselves; as the latter end of the verse, to freedom from the desolations their enemies might make among them.

And ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid.] It is a promise to preserve them from housebreakers and robbers.

And I will rid evil beasts out of the land.] Which (as it will appear from ver. 22.) made lamentable havoc when they increased, and were let loose upon them: but these God promises to extirpate, if they would be obedient, either by hindering their breed, or making them devour one another, or driving them out of their country.

Neither shall the sword go through your land.] Their enemies should not be able to penetrate their country, to make any ravage there.

Ver. 7. And ye shall chase your enemies, and they shall fall before you by the sword.] This supposes their neighbours might invade their country, but should fail in their attempt, and be driven away with shame.

Ver. 8. And five of you shall chase a hundred, and a hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight.] That is, a few shall be too hard for a great multitude; as it proved in the conquest of Canaan: insomuch that Joshua saith, (chap. xxiii. 10.) One man of you shall chase a thousand. Which was fulfilled in the days of Gideon, who, with three hundred men, put to flight a vast army, (Judg. vii. 22.)

And your enemies shall fall before you by the sword.] Which commonly made a greater slaughter in their flight than was made in the battle.

Ver. 9. For I will have respect unto you.] The reason of which great success (as well as of the plenty beforementioned), he would make them sensible, was God's great kindness and favour towards them, as the reward of their obedience. This Joshua most thankfully acknowledges, chap. xxiii. 9.

And make you fruitful, and multiply you.] Make you a populous, and consequently a powerful nation.

And establish my covenant with you.] Keep it inviolably, and most certainly perform it: (see Gen. vi. 18.)

Ver. 10. And ye shall eat old store.] Have a great deal of old corn left when the new is come in.

And bring forth the old because of the new.] Have so much of it left, as to want room for it when the new is to be laid up.

Ver. 11. And I will set my tabernacle amongst you.] This is the great promise of all, that his tabernacle, wherein he dwelt among them, should remain and abide with them: for it was set already among them; but now he promises it should be fixed: that is, his Divine presence should continue with them.

And my soul shall not abhor you.] I will not cast you off, because of your offences; for which I have appointed an expiation.

Ver. 12. And I will walk among you.] Conduct you from place to place, all the time you are in this wilderness. For he dwelling in the tabernacle, in the cloud of glory which covered it; when that cloud was taken up, the ark presently moved to go before them, and led them to the next station, where they should pitch their tents, Numb. x. 11, 12. (See Exod. xxv. 8.) This is given as the reason why they should keep their camp from all impurities: (see Deut. xxiii. 12—14.)

And I will be your God, and ye shall be my people.] Bring you to the land of Canaan; and there continue with you, and bless you, as my peculiar people.

Ver. 13. I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt.] I will not leave my own work imperfect; but as I delivered you from the Egyptian slavery, so I will continue to preserve your liberty and happiness.

That ye should not be their bondmen.] Remain any longer their slaves, as they intended to make you for ever.

And I have broken the bands of your yoke.] When you could not deliver yourselves, I set you free from the heavy burdens which oppressed you.

And made you go upright.] They were so loaded with insupportable burdens in Egypt, that they could not look up, but hung down their heads with heaviness: till God, by setting them free, made them go out from thence, not with dejected, but with cheerful countenances. For that is the meaning of making them go upright: as freemen, not bowed down with oppression, but lifting up their heads for joy at their deliverance: (see Exod. xiv. 8.)

Ver. 14. But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments.] After the promise of these extraordinary blessings, as the reward of their obedience, he threatens them with as extraordinary plagues and calamities, if they were disobedient. And as nothing moves us more powerfully than hope of some good, or fear of some evil; so there are no greater blessings in this world than those which God's promises gave them hope to enjoy, nor greater evils than those of which his threatenings put them in fear. But such is the Divine goodness, he always offers mercy before he proceeds to judgment, and mingles judgment with mercy, before he proceeds in rigour of justice. Which will appear in the following threatenings.

Ver. 15. And if ye despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments.] They were not thus wicked at the first; but disobedience to God's commands (mentioned in the foregoing verse) proceeded to a contemptuous neglect of them; and that in time to an abhorrence of them.

So that ye will not do all my commandments.] Though often admonished by his prophets; whose messages they not only rejected, but slighted and despised.

But that ye break my covenant.] By forsaking him, and falling to idolatry. For that was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should have no other God, but him alone.

Ver. 16. I also will do this unto you.] I will alter the method of my providence towards you.

I will even appoint over you.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, upon you: causing the following diseases to seize upon them (as the phrase signifies) and arrest them; that they might feel the heavy displeasure of Him, whose laws they set at nought.

Terror, consumption, and the burning ague.] It is not certain what diseases are comprehended under these words; especially the first, behalah, which we translate terror. But, coming from a word importing haste and precipitancy, I take it to signify the falling sickness; whereby people are so suddenly surprised, that they sometimes fall into the fire by which they sit.

The other two words probably are rightly translated. For the next, sachepheth is by Kimchi and a great many others understood to signify a consumption, or a hectic fever; though R. Solomon and some others seem to take it for a dropsy; for he says it is a disease that puffs up the flesh, or (as David de Pomis) makes it to break out in blotches. (See Bochart in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 18.) As for the last word, chaddachat, it coming from a word denoting great heat, may well be translated a burning fever.

That shall consume the eyes.] Make you look ghastly.

And cause sorrow of heart.] Take away all the comfort of life.

And ye shall sow your seed, but your enemies shall eat it.] Next to bodily sickness, he threatens them with the incursions of their enemies; which was a higher punishment than the former, according to that of David, it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord than into the hands of men.

Here also it is observable, he doth not threaten the worst that their enemies might do to them; but first, that they should carry away their harvest, and make a scarcity among them; and in the next verse, speaks of delivering them to be slain by them.

Ver. 17. And I will set my face against you.] Be extremely angry with you. (See chap. xvii. 10.)

And ye shall be slain before your enemies.] The neighbouring nations oft-times made great slaughter of them, and conquered them; as we find in the book of Judges, and in the beginning of the first book of Samuel.

They that hate you shall reign over you.] And grievously oppressed them, (Judges iv. 3. vi. 2, &c.) This made them very contemptible; and was a just punishment of their contempt of God's laws.

And ye shall flee when none pursueth you.] Lose all your courage; directly opposite to the promise, ver. 7, 8.

Ver. 18. And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me.] If by these sore punishments they were not reclaimed from their idolatrous practices, he threatens to send greater.

Then will I punish you seven times more for your sins.] The number seven is used for any indefinite multitude, and therefore here signifies a great increase of their plagues; which, by their continued provocations, became more and more grievous than in former ages.

Ver. 19. And I will break the pride of your power.] That power wherein you glory. Which some understand of the sanctuary; which in the days of Eli was forsaken of the ark of God's strength (as the Psalmist calls it), 1 Sam. iv. 10, 11. But it seems rather to relate to their numerous forces, which at the first were every where victorious; but, after sundry defeats in foregoing times, were in the days of Saul reduced to such straits, that they hid themselves in caves, and pits, and thickets, &c. and there was not a sword or a spear to be found in any of their hands (save Saul's and Jonathan's), when they should have fought with their enemies, (1 Sam. xiii. 6, 7. 22.)

And I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass.] The one, he means, should afford no rain, and the other, for want of moisture, bring forth no fruit; which must needs make a sore famine among them.

Ver. 20. And your strength shall be spent in vain, &c.] This is a further description of that calamity; when, after all their labour in ploughing and sowing their land, or digging and dunging their trees, they brought forth nothing for their sustenance. We read in Scripture of such famines, wherein man and beast were ready to perish; particularly 1 Kings xvii. 1. 12. xviii. 15. 2 Kings viii. 1.

Ver. 21. And if ye walk contrary unto me.] Go on in your idolatrous courses, directly contrary to my commands, (ver. 1.)

And will not hearken unto me.] Be obedient to the admonitions of his prophets, whom he sent to call them to repentance.

I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins.] As their sins increased, so did their plagues: for these that follow are more dreadful than the foregoing. And it was a high aggravation of their sins, that they would take no warning by the severe punishments which God inflicted upon their forefathers. This augmented his plagues upon succeeding generations; which, as Dr. Jackson speaks, usually run by the scale of sevens; so that if we call the literal meaning to a strict arithmetical account, these later plagues were nine-and-forty times heavier than the former. But it is most likely, a certain number is put for an uncertain; yet denoting a very great increase of their punishments, beyond what had been in preceding times.

It ought to be observed, that there is in the margin another rendering of the first words of this verse (If ye walk contrary to me), which some follow; If ye walk at all adventures with me; that is, live carelessly, as if you had no regard at all to me; I will have as little regard to you, or concern for you. But the ancient translations go the other way.

Ver. 22. I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, &c.] If the terrible famine would not work upon their stubborn hearts, no more than the forenamed sicknesses and wars, (ver. 16, 17. 19, 20.) then he threatens they and their cattle should be devoured by wild beasts; the principal of which were lions, unto which the depopulation and devastation of countries are ascribed in Scripture; particularly in the prophet Jeremiah, (chap. ii. 15. iv. 7.) where the Assyrians and Nebuchadnezzar are therefore compared to lions, because by those fierce beasts countries were sometimes laid desolate; man and beast being destroyed by them. We read of no other that killed the people planted in Samaria by the king of Assyria, instead of the Israelites, whom they carried away captive, (2 Kings xvii. 25.) And God threatened to destroy the remnant of Moab, by the same means, (Isai. xv. 9.) But there were other wild beasts also to do this execution, (Jer. v. 6.) As bears, who killed two-and-forty children at one time, (2 Kings ii. 24.) Serpents and cockatrices, (Jer. viii. 17.) And in general, that prophet threatens the destruction of Judea by such creatures, (Jer. xv. 3.) Nor are examples wanting in other histories of such calamities; one monument of which continues still in the church. For the solemn prayers in Rogation week were first instituted (as Sidonius relates), by Mamertus bishop of Vienne, in France, for this reason among others, that wolves and other wild beasts did very great mischief in those parts. (See Sirmondus, in lib. vii. Epist. 1.) Nay, some countries have been so infested with smaller creatures, particularly Spain, by conies, that they left no thing untouched; being noxious not only to roots and seeds, but subverting whole towns, which were undermined by them. And in the neighbouring islands, called Baleares, they were so plagued with them, that they were forced to petition Augustus to send soldiers to defend them from these little animals. (See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

And your highways shall be desolate.] For travellers would not venture into the highways, for fear of the wild beasts, and because of the scarcity of people to give them entertainment. It is observable, that this plague is directly opposite to the blessing promised unto their obedience, (ver. 6.) where he saith, I will rid evil beasts out of the land; which was never overrun with them till it was overspread with wickedness.

Ver. 23. If ye will not be reformed by me, by these things.] He would have them observe his hand in all these punishments; by which he intended their reformation.

But will walk contrary unto me.] See ver. 21.

Ver. 24. Then will I also walk contrary unto you.] Serve you in your kind, and still make your plagues more grievous, as your stubbornness grows more obstinate. To what was said before of this matter, I shall add the interpretation of Maimonides, in his More Nevoch. (par. iii. cap. 36.) where he thus glosses on this place: "If, when I inflict upon you these punishments, you believe them to be accidental things, mere chances (so he understands the word keri, which we translate contrary), then will I deal with you according to your opinion, and lay more heavy punishments upon you: for because they believed these plagues happened by accident, which were the consequents of their false opinions and evil works, therefore they did not reform them; as Jeremiah saith, (chap. v. 3.) Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved." Thus he.

And will punish you yet seven times for your sins.] If we should follow the literal exposition mentioned ver. 21. then those plagues there threatened being seven times multiplied, would make the plagues threatened in this verse, for their multiplied transgressions, three hundred and forty-three times greater than the first, ver. 18. But the meaning is only, that they should still grow more numerous and more destructive.

Ver. 25. And I will bring a sword upon you.] This seems to be no new plague, having been before threatened, ver. 17. Therefore the meaning is, that he would send three sore judgments upon them, all at the same time, viz. war, pestilence, and famine; which are contained in this and the next verse. Of war and famine at once, see Jer. xiv. 18. and xvi. 4. Of pestilence added to them, together with captivity, chap. xv. 2—4. and xliv. 12, 13. and see Ezek. vi. 11, 12. and still worse, Ezek. xiv. 21.

That shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant.] My quarrel with you for the breach of that covenant which you solemnly made with me, (Exod. xxiv. 3. 8. and xxxiv. 10—12, &c.)

And when you are gathered together within your cities.] Thinking there to defend yourselves against your enemies, by impregnable fortifications.

I will send the pestilence among you.] To destroy the soldiers in your garrison.

And ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy.] Forced to surrender, because you have no men left to defend the place.

Ver. 26. And when I have broken the staff of bread.] Taken away its power to nourish you (as Bochart expounds it), or rather, taken bread itself from you, which is the support of life by a sore famine, (ver. 10.) If they either wanted corn to make bread, or their corn had no heart in it (as we speak), either way they would be starved.

Ten women shall bake your bread in one oven.] That is, there shall be such scarcity, that a small oven shall be sufficient to bake bread for ten families, i. e. for a great many, as the number ten in Scripture signifies, (1 Sam. i. 8. Job xix. 3.)

And they shall deliver you again your bread by weight.] Distribute to every one in the family a certain quantity; not enough to satisfy them, but only (as we speak) to keep body and soul together. So it follows:

And ye shall eat, and not be satisfied.] Never have enough to satisfy their hunger; but, by eating, made to crave the more to eat: so Pellicanus glosses, who thus concludes his notes on these verses, Hæc sunt arma Dei contra insensatos, &c. "These are the weapons of God against stupid wretches; which no wicked man can evade, when God in anger begins to fall upon them. Let no man, though never so great and rich, hope to be safe from the hand of the Lord, who can kill kings by worms and lice when he pleaseth."

Ver. 27. And if you will not for all this hearken unto me,

but walk contrary to me.] If all these plagues have no better effect upon you than the former. (See ver. 21. 23, 24.)

Ver. 28. Then will I also walk contrary to you in fury.] His indignation rises proportionable to their offences: for now he not only saith he will set his face against them, (as he speaks, ver. 17.) but proceed against them, in fury; by such punishments as should quite ruin them.

And I, even I will chastise.] The very manner of speech expresses anger and indignation: being as if he had said, I will make you know who it is that you have despised, (ver. 15.) The word jissarti also, which we render chastise, imports smarter punishments than those expressed by hickethi, I will smite, or punish you, (ver. 24.)

Seven times for your sins.] If we should by a literal account multiply the number of plagues mentioned, ver. 24. seven times, the threatening here would amount to this: that their rebellion, not amended by so many plagues, but continued still from age to age, (notwithstanding all the corrections inflicted on them for their reformation, ver. 23.) should in conclusion be punished one thousand one hundred ninety-seven times more severely than at first, (ver. 18.) But the simple sense is, that their obstinate contempt of his laws, should be punished with new and more grievous plagues. Which was fulfilled, as our Dr. Jackson observes, (book i. on the Creed, chap. 22.) in their captivity, in the days of Manasseh, Jehoiachim, and Zedekiah: and again in the time of Ptolemy, the first under Antiochus Epiphanes. For these latter calamities were at least seven times greater (both for extent and durance) than the former persecutions, which they suffered from the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Syrians. By all which, and by what follows, it plainly appears, that these threatenings were a kind of prediction. For Moses evidently foresaw they would not prove so obedient as he desired, (Deut. xxxi. 27, 29.) and consequently that these threatenings, in case of disobedience, would turn into prophecies. Unto every one of which their history exactly answers; as the book of Deuteronomy will give me occasion to shew more fully.

Ver. 29. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat.] This is the very utmost calamity that could come upon a people: and yet (as Conradus Pellicanus observes) it is put before the throwing down of their high places and images, &c. As if the devouring of their children (such was their incredible lust after idols) would seem a less evil to them, than the loss of their images.

This was fulfilled among the Israelites in the siege of Samaria, (2 Kings vi. 29.) and among the Jews in the siege of Jerusalem before the Babylonian captivity, (Lament. iv. 10.) and in the last siege by Titus, as Josephus relates, (lib. vii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 8.)

Ver. 30. And I will destroy your high places.] Where they were wont to worship their idols, according to the manner of the heathen; who built temples, and altars, and offered sacrifices to their gods, upon mountains and high hills; especially such as were shaded with trees. Insomuch, that the Indians in Philostratus call the high mountain Caucasus, Θεῶν οἶκον, the house of the gods. And the ancient Persians, (as Herodotus saith in his Clio, cap. 131.) ἐπὶ τὰ ὑψηλότατα τῶν ὀρέων ἀναβαίνοντες, going up to the top of the highest mountains, there offered sacrifices unto Jupiter; calling the whole circle of the heavens by that name. And in the island Naxus the highest mountain was also consecrated to him; as from his worship on Mount Athos he is called Ἄθως in Hesychius. They that would see more of this matter, may look into Cuperus's Apotheosis Homeri, p. 15, 16, &c. And the reason of their choosing these places for their worship was, because they thought their sacrifices would be more acceptable there than in valleys. For, as Lucian himself saith, they thought themselves in such high places to be nearer to their gods, and so should more easily obtain audience, Ὅτι τῶν εὐχωλέων ἀγχόθεν ἐπαΐουσι οἱ Θεοί. (Lib. de Dea Syr.) and Tacitus saith the same in the last book of his Annals.

How much the Israelites were inclined to follow the nations of the world in this, appears too plainly by their history; which shews that high places were frequented in the reigns of their good kings, as well as of their bad. Yea, they were so fond of them, that when they could not go to them, they offered upon the tops of their houses, (Jer. xix. 13. xxxii. 29. Zeph. i. 5.)

And cut down your images.] The Hebrew word chammanecem, which we translate your images, properly signifies temples erected for the worship of the sun, as Aben Ezra says upon this place. For it is certain that the Hebrews call the sun Chammæ; from whence comes the word Chamman, the temple of the sun: whom the ancient Phœnicians took to be the Lord of Heaven. So Sanchoniathon, Τοῦτον γὰρ (speaking of the sun) Θεὸν ἐνόμιζον μόνον οὐρανοῦ Κύριον. Though it is very probable, that, as superstition increased, the name of Chammanim was given to other temples, as well as those of the sun. (See Bochart in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 17.) Others take this word to signify what the Greeks call Πυραθεῖα and Πυρεῖα, temples of the fire; which being worshipped by the eastern people, temples were erected in honour of it. But this is not much different from the former: the Persians worshipped the sun in the fire, which was the symbol and representative of the sun: (see Selden Syntagma ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 8.)

And cast your carcasses upon the carcasses of your idols.] Which were both burnt together, as some imagine. However, this expresses the utmost contempt both of them and of their idols; who were alike detestable. Their fondness of them also when they were alive seems to be represented by throwing them upon them when they were dead. And the Hebrew word gillulim (which we barely translate idols), importing something belonging to the dunghill, is taken by some to signify the images of Baal-peor; who was worshipped, as the Jews say, after a most beastly manner. These idols, whatsoever they were, though dressed up finely, yet were no better than dead carcasses, without any life or soul in them. And we might think (if that superstition were so old) that Moses alludes to the little images of Isis, which were made of plaster and clay, and are found frequently in the sepulchres of Egyptians at this day. Unto which Christoph. Arnoldus (in his epistle to Wagenseil) thinks the Talmudists allude, when they say that Pharaoh's daughter, becoming a proselyte to the Jewish religion, washed herself in the river Megullile, from these dunghill idols (as some render it) of her father's house, (Excerp. Gemaræ in Sota, cap. 1. sect. 40.) The Dutch interpreters translate it dreck-goden, not merely for the matter (as Arnoldus thinks), but also for the form of a beetle, which lives in dung: for so they represented Isis, as Plutarch tells us in his book de Isid. et Osir. (See Wagenseil Sota, p. 1176.)

And my soul shall abhor you.] As so offensive to me, that I can bear with you no longer. This is directly opposite to his promise, if they would be obedient, ver. 11. My soul shall not abhor you.

Ver. 31. And I will make your cities waste.] Their walls being thrown down, and their houses burnt.

And bring your sanctuaries unto desolation.] They had but one sanctuary, and therefore some think their synagogues are comprehended under this name; for they are sometimes called sanctuaries, as I observed before. But the sanctuary, properly so called, having several parts, which were all holy, Moses may be thought to speak of it here in the plural number. As Jeremiah represents the Jews, saying, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these;" (chap. vii. 4.) that is, both these courts wherein we stand, as well as that of the priests, and the most holy place, are all the Lord's temple. Or the word your is to be applied to such places of worship as they themselves had consecrated, in opposition to God's sanctuary.

And I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours.] This seems to determine the meaning of sanctuaries to God's own house, where sweet odours of incense, made of several sweet spices, were daily offered unto him: which being a representation of their prayers sent up to him, he here declares that he will not be appeased by them, nor by any sacrifices they could offer to him, but utterly reject them.

Ver. 32. And I will bring the land into desolation.] The people being carried captive, or forced to flee into strange countries, (ver. 33.)

And your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it.] They that possess this country, out of which you are expelled, shall be amazed when they reflect upon the calamities that are fallen upon you: which Jeremiah describes as very dreadful, (chap. vii. 20.) and often mentions the astonishment wherewith they were struck, who beheld them, (chap. xviii. 16. xix. 8. xxv. 9. 11.) and see 2 Chron. xxix. 8, 9. which shews this began before Jeremiah's time.

Ver. 33. And I will scatter you among the heathen.] Some fled into one strange country, and others into another, according as they could find means and opportunity; insomuch, that there were no known places where they were not dispersed. So Jeremiah threatens, chap. xiii. 24. xv. 4.

And I will draw a sword after you.] So Jeremiah threatens those that would go into Egypt for safety; that "the sword which they feared should overtake them there," (chap. xlii. 16—18.)

And your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste.] For they that were left there, and their enemies to whom the country was given, were not enough to cultivate the land and build their cities. By all this, as well as by what follows, it appears that here is a plain prediction of the miseries that came upon Israel, by Tiglath-Pileser and Salmanasar; and upon Judah by Nebuchadnezzar; who laid their cities waste, destroyed the sanctuaries, despoiled them of their goods, drove them into strange countries, and, as it here follows, made their land keep its sabbaths.

Ver. 34. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemy's land, &c.] This is a most bitter reproach to them for their ingratitude to God, and inhumanity to their brethren, in not keeping the sabbatical year, mentioned in the foregoing chapter. Dr. Hammond hath another notion of the word, which we translate enjoy: (see Note g. upon Psal. cii. p. 504.)

Ver. 35. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest.] Lie untilled, as it ought to have done every seventh year. And it lay thus seventy years; because, as some think, they had neglected to keep so many sabbatical years: which we cannot think to be true, without supposing that they kept none for half the time, from their entrance into Canaan, till they were expelled out of it by the captivity of Babylon.

Because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it.] "For in those four hundred and ninety years (says Procopius Gazæus), when they were under the government of kings, there were seventy years to be kept as sabbaths: which, that the land might enjoy its sabbaths, were spent in the captivity of Babylon." We do not expressly read, indeed, of this profane neglect, while they dwelt in their land; but Jeremiah complains, that they did not, in his time, give their servants liberty in the seventh year, (chap. xxxiv. 17.) and he gives this as one reason why God delivered them up to slavery, (for so I understand those words, Lam. i. 3. "Judah is gone into captivity, because of affliction, and because of great servitude.") And from thence we may conclude, that the same covetous humour (and distrust of God's providence) made them not suffer their land to rest in that year; especially since the author of the second book of Chronicles expressly mentions this as a reason of their captivity, to fulfil the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah the prophet, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbaths, to fulfil threescore and ten years, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 21.) Now their punishment in this was made the more remarkable, if it be true, that both the kingdom of Samaria and the kingdom of Judah were destroyed in a sabbatical year; and that immediately after a jubilee, the city and temple were destroyed by Titus, according to Scaliger's computation. And so I observed before Maimonides makes account, (chap. xxv. 8.) that the year when they were carried captive to Babylon, and the first temple destroyed, was in the expiration of a sabbatical year, (Schemitta ve Jobel, cap. 10. sect. 3.)

Ver. 36. And upon them that are left alive of you.] This imports that the body of the people should be destroyed.

I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies.] Where their spirits sunk under their present miseries.

And the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them.] And yet they were condemned to live in continual dread of more miseries. For the Hebrew word we translate faintness signifies softness, which could not support the weight of their affliction. And this last phrase imports such a timorousness as should make their life always uneasy to them, and such a cowardice as should render them vile and despicable. And so they are noted at this day to be mean-spirited and faint-hearted: it being scarce ever heard, that a Jew listed himself for a soldier, or engaged in the defence of the country where he lives.

And they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword, and fall when none pursueth.] Fancy they hear the sound of trumpets or clashing of arms; which made them start and run away, nay, fall into a swoon, when there was no danger.

Such terrors the heathen themselves have observed, in men of an evil conscience, who are afraid of their own shadow, as they say of Orestes.

Ver. 37. And they shall fall one upon another.] As people are wont to do, when they make too much haste, and run confusedly; or the foremost hinder the flight of those that follow, (Jerem. xlvi. 16.)

As it were before a sword, &c.] For fear of the sword; as this Hebrew phrase certainly signifies, and is so translated in the margin of our Bibles, Isa. xxi. 15. and xxxi. 8. (See Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 8.)

And ye shall have no power to stand before your enemies.] Being so timorous as to flee when there were none (as it goes before), they could not stand before them when they appeared.

Ver. 38. And ye shall perish among the heathen.] Die with grief, or by diseases, poverty, oppression, and hard usage.

And the land of your enemies shall eat you up.] Insomuch, that the ten tribes never returned to their own land: but either perished by hunger and bad accommodations; or were swallowed up (as we say) into the body of another nation.

Ver. 39. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquities, in their enemy's land.] With grief and sorrow, and sad reflections upon the miseries into which their sins, and the sins of their fathers, had thrown them: insomuch that death was more acceptable to them than life, (Jerem. viii. 3.)

And also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them.] Especially those of Manasseh king of Judah, whose wickedness was so great, that the zealous reformation which his grandchild made could not turn away "the fierceness of God's great wrath against them," (2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27.)

Ver. 40. If they shall confess their iniquity, &c.] Though Moses had been above three times as long in recounting the plagues, which he either foresaw, or feared would come upon them for their sins, than in the blessings which he promised should follow their obedience: yet he plainly shews, that the blessings would have far excelled the curses, had not their disobedience hindered. For after all these dreadful calamities were come upon them, he concludes with a most gracious promise, that God would restore them to their own land, from whence they were expelled, if they truly repented of those sins which were the cause of it.

He means, by confessing their iniquities, and the iniquities of their fathers, &c. acknowledging them with such unfeigned sorrow as wrought repentance; without which he gave them no hope of deliverance. And it is well observed by a great divine of our own, that if, without confession of their fathers' iniquities, they could not be absolved from their own, their fathers' iniquity not repented of was their own, and so was the punishment due unto it.

And that they have walked contrary to me.] Both they and their forefathers; whose ways had been so contrary to God's laws, that, if they sincerely confessed it, God expected they should take the quite contrary course, and observe those precepts carefully which their fathers had violated.

Ver. 41. And that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies.] Be sensible that all the miseries they have endured came not by chance, but were the just punishment I sent upon them for their sins: particularly that it was by my order that they were carried captive into a strange land.

If then their uncircumcised heart be humbled.] By an uncircumcised heart seems to be meant a heathenish temper of mind, insensible of God; which made them stubborn and refractory; and, therefore, this phrase is the same with a hard heart: for which there was no cure, but such remarkable judgments, as evidently carried in them the marks of a Divine hand: which when they saw, and submitted to it, he gives them hope of deliverance.

And they accept of the punishment of their iniquity.] Patiently bear it, as their just desert; and acknowledge they do not deserve to be delivered from it.

Ver. 42. Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham.] See Exod. iii. 6. He promises to restore them to their own land; according to the covenant made with their forefathers, that he would give it them for an everlasting possession. For to remember a covenant, or promise, in Scripture language, is to perform it, and make it good. Accordingly we find the forenamed confession made by Daniel, (chap. ix.) and he makes it in the name of all the people; among whom, no doubt, there were many that heartily joined with him: and then followed their wonderful restoration in the reign of Cyrus; of which we read, Ezra i. &c.

And I will remember the land.] Repeople it with its former inhabitants, &c. See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23. where this immediately follows the relation he had made of the land being laid desolate.

Ver. 43. The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, &c.] This verse is very obscure; unless we take it to speak of a new expulsion out of their land, after their reduction to it. And then the next words,

And they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity.] Must be interpreted, after they had accepted, or though they had accepted, &c. This made their sin the more provoking; that they offended God again, when he had so graciously forgiven them, and delivered them from a dismal captivity.

Because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes.] Returned to the very same wicked disposition for which they had been formerly expelled, (ver. 15.) This was fulfilled by degrees, by the successors of Alexander, and at last by the Romans.

Ver. 44. And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies.] He would not have them utterly despair of mercy, even after a new banishment, which hath now continued many ages. For this promise is not yet fulfilled; as Dr. Jackson observes, book i. on the Creed, chap. 31. sect. 9.

I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly.] As we see at this very day they are not destroyed utterly, but remain a great body in several countries; after above sixteen hundred years' expulsion from their own land.

And to break my covenant with them.] Never more to own them for my people.

For I am the Lord their God.] I still continue to have a peculiar right to their obedience, as they have to my kindness, if they will return to their duty.

Ver. 45. And I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors, &c.] The meaning cannot be, that God would be so gracious for their sakes who were so very wicked; but, as the words in the Hebrew are, he would for them (i. e. for their good and advantage) remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom he had brought forth out of the land of Egypt; that is, once more deliver them from their miserable condition, and restore them to his favour, that he may be their God. And that great man (now mentioned on the foregoing verse) observes, "That the continuation of their plagues seems so much interrupted, and the plagues themselves so much mitigated, in the last age (since the gospel hath been again revealed), as if their misery were almost expired, and the day of their redemption drawing nigh." But then they must first confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, (as Moses speaks before, ver. 40.) with their trespass which they trespassed in crucifying Christ the Lord, and accept the punishment of their iniquity, acknowledging that so horrid a crime deserved so long and so heavy a punishment. For every child (as he observes in another place, book xi. p. 3750.) is born, as it were, heir to his father's sins, and to their plagues; unless he renounce them by taking their guilt upon him, and such hearty confession as this law prescribes, and patient submission of himself to God's correction.

Ver. 46. These are the statutes, and judgments, and laws, which the Lord made between him and the children of Israel.] This may be thought to refer either to all the foregoing book of laws, or to what is said in this chapter. Menochius thus expounds it: These are the punishments which God threatened to the breakers of his laws. But it is more reasonable to take in the whole, in this manner, These are the statutes, and judgments, and laws (together with the promises and threatenings annexed to them), which the Lord made between him and Israel.

In Mount Sinai.] See chap. xxv. 1.

By the hand of Moses.] By the ministry of Moses, who delivered these laws from God's own mouth.

It is obvious to observe, that, instead of these are the laws which the Lord made between him and the children of Israel, Onkelos, the famous Chaldee interpreter, hath, between his Word and the children of Israel. Which Theodoric Hackspan produces, among other places, to prove, that in those paraphrasts the Word of the Lord signifies no more than αὐτὸς, himself. Which, though it be true in some places, yet in others, as I have observed before, it cannot have that signification; particularly in Psal. cx. 1. where the Hebrew words are, The Lord said unto my Lord; which are thus expounded by Jonathan, The Lord said unto his Word: where it can signify nothing, but another Divine person. And so Onkelos might intend it here; that the Lord made all these laws between his eternal Word and them.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Some religious people, it is possible, were touched with such a sense of what Moses had now delivered, in the foregoing promises and threats, that they thought of giving themselves wholly unto God, or of vowing some of their goods to him: and therefore he gives Moses further directions for the regulating of such vows.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow.] And, first, if any man vowed himself, or his children, wholly to the service of God in the tabernacle, he directs what was to be done in that case. Which he calls a singular, or extraordinary vow; and by Philo is called εὐχὴ μεγάλη, the great vow: it being a wonderful piece of devotion (as the word japhli in the Hebrew imports), because men were desirous to help God's priests in the meanest ministry; such as bringing in wood, carrying out ashes, sweeping away the dust, and such-like.

The persons shall be for the Lord by thy estimation.] The meaning would have been more plain, if the words had been translated just as thy lie in the Hebrew, According to thy estimation, the person shall be for the Lord. For this immediately suggests to one's thoughts, that the service of the persons themselves thus devoted, was not to be employed in the tabernacle; but a value set upon them by the priest, and that to be employed for the Lord, i. e. for holy uses; for repairing the sanctuary, suppose, or any thing belonging to it. The reason why God would not accept the persons themselves, as they desired, but the value of them, for his service, seems to be, because there was a sufficient number of persons peculiarly designed for all the work of the tabernacle; which he would not have encumbered by more attendants there than were needful.

Ver. 3. And thy estimation shall be.] That the priest might not either overvalue, or undervalue any person, the rates are here set down which he should demand for their redemption.

Of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old.] For at twenty years of age (saith Procopius Gazæus) men begin to be fit for business, and continue so till sixty; when it is time to leave it off.

Thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver.] That this one rule should serve for all men, though of different qualities, Philo thinks was fit for several reasons, which he gives in his book of Special Laws: the principal is, because God regarded only the vow, the value of which was equal, whosoever made it, whether a great man or a poor.

After the shekel of the sanctuary.] See Exod. xxx. 13.

Ver. 4. And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels.] Women could not be so serviceable as men, and therefore were valued at a less rate: for all that they could do was, to spin, or weave, or make garments, or wash for the priests and Levites.

Ver. 5. And if it be from five years old even unto twenty years old.] It appears by this, that, though a child of five years old could not make a vow, yet his parents might solemnly devote one of that age to God; and it did oblige them to pay what is here required for the use of the sanctuary.

Thy estimation shall be of the male twenty shekels, and for the female ten shekels.] Less is required than for those above twenty, because their life was more uncertain; and they were less capable to do any service, before they came to their full growth.

Ver. 6. And if it be from a month old even unto five years old, &c.] Before a child was a month old, it seems, it was not capable to be devoted to God; but then it might. And still less was demanded as the value of them; because children so small were very weak and imperfect, and the price therefore set accordingly. But the words may be understood, not of children that were a month old, but that were in the first month of their life: and Samuel we find was devoted to God before he was born.

Ver. 7. And from sixty years old and above, if it be a male, then thy estimation shall be fifteen shekels, &c.] They are valued much less after sixty than before, (ver. 3.) because their service then was little worth, and their life likely to be short.

And for a female ten shekels.] The Hebrews think it observable, that in their youth (ver. 3, 4.) males were valued almost double to females; but now, in old age, they are made almost of equal value: for old women continue very serviceable in many things, when old men are not; whence they have a saying, An old woman in a house is a treasure in a house.

Ver. 8. And if he be poorer than thy estimation.] If he be not able to pay according to the forenamed rates.

Then he shall present himself before the priest.] Who was then in attendance at the tabernacle; for he doth not speak of the high-priest, but of the lower.

And the priest shall value him.] According to the best information he could get of his ability; as it here follows.

According to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him.] He was to examine his condition; and accordingly set such a rate upon him as he might be able to pay, without undoing his family.

Ver. 9. And if it be a beast.] Now he proceeds to the second case; which was, when any man vowed to give God a beast of some sort or other.

Whereof men bring an offering unto the Lord.] And first he mentions clean beasts, such as God accepted at his altar; as these are explained by the opposite unclean beast, (ver. 11.)

All that any man gives of such unto the Lord.] Whether to be sacrificed or not.

Shall be holy.] Set apart for God's service, according to the nature of his vow; to be offered at the altar, if he so expressed it; or to be given to the priests and Levites, if that was his desire; or to be sold for the service of the tabernacle, if it was left at large.

Ver. 10. He shall not alter it, nor change it.] Some think these words, alter and change, are two expressions of the same thing. But the first word may signify, that he should not alter it for any other beast, or thing; and the second, that he should not change it for any beast of the same kind: but that very beast which was vowed, was to be given to the uses intended; and no other accepted in his stead, though it were really better.

A good for a bad, or a bad for a good.] If men had been left to their liberty, either to give unto God the beast they had vowed, or another in its room, they might have given a bad instead of a good, as Maimonides observes, which had been a great profaneness. But supposing those that were truly religious would have brought a good instead of a bad (that is, one much fatter and more valuable), God would not suffer it, because he would preserve a reverence to things once consecrated, which he would not should return to common uses, though a better thing was substituted in its room. If any man did change what he had vowed, though it were for the better, he was to be beaten, as Maimonides saith in his treatise on this subject, (cap. 1.)

And if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy.] The man was to be beaten, and both the one and the other beast was to become God's. Which the Jews understand thus (as Maimonides tells us in the same treatise), that if he changed the beast he vowed twice or thrice, nay, a thousand times, they all became holy; and he was also to suffer the punishment of stripes for every one of them.

Ver. 11. But if it be an unclean beast, of which they do not offer a sacrifice unto the Lord.] Some comprehend under this, such beasts as, though in themselves clean, yet had some blemish in them, which rendered them unfit for sacrifice. But, as they could not be offered in sacrifice, so one would think it was not lawful to vow them either to that or any other holy use.

Then he shall present the beast before the priest.] That he might consider the worth of it.

Ver. 12. And the priest shall value it, whether it be good or bad.] Of a great price or a small. He was not allowed to exchange it for a clean beast; both because it was dedicated to God, and because that exchange might have been a great damage to the priest: many unclean beasts being of greater value than some clean; a horse or a camel, for instance, of greater price than a sheep or a goat.

As thou valuest it, who art the priest, so shall it be.] He directs his speech to the priest, to awaken his conscience, to attend and make upright judgment; because that was to be the value of it, which the priest determined it to be worth.

Ver. 13. But if he will at all redeem it.] It was in the man's choice, either to leave the beast with the priest, or to pay him the money at which he had rated it.

Then he shall add a fifth part thereof unto thy estimation.] If he chose the latter, it was a sign he thought it worth more than the price which the priest had set upon it, who could not understand the value of it so well as himself. And every man, as Maimonides observes, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.) regarding his own advantage, and inclining naturally to save what he can; if a beast were not rated at its just value, he that had vowed it would be disposed rather to redeem the beast than let the priest have it. Which is the reason that God orders he should in this case pay a fifth part more than the priest set upon it, that he might be sure to give the full value.

Both this and the foregoing law was to preserve that from being vile and cheap, which bare the name of God (as he there speaks), and was consecrated to his uses.

Ver. 14. And when a man shall sanctify his house to be holy unto the Lord.] By vowing it to God's service; for of such sanctifying he speaks in this chapter: and this is the third case about vows; which commonly consisted in promising to God some part of their estates, either to serve for sacrifices, or to be kept for some sacred uses: whence came those vast treasures which were in the house of God, mentioned 1 Chron. xxvi. 26—28. for they were chiefly oblations of part of the spoils taken from their enemies, which David, and Saul, and Abner, and Joab had dedicated: together with the oblations of such persons as Samuel the seer, who is there said to have dedicated a great deal to maintain the house of the Lord.

Then the priest shall estimate it, whether it be good or bad, &c.] He makes the same law in this case which he had done about unclean beasts; that the priest should consider the worth of it, and accordingly set the price, having respect to the condition of the house, whether it was great or little, old or new, &c.

As the priest shall estimate it, so shall it stand.] That was to be the fixed price; which no man was to attempt to alter.

Ver. 15. And if he that sanctified it will redeem his house.] If he that vowed it to God, chose afterward rather to pay the price himself than part with the house, he was to submit to the law made in the foregoing case; which was, to add a fifth part to the rate set upon it. For there was another reason why many might make this choice, (besides that mentioned in ver. 13.) because, if they did not redeem it, the house could never return to them again; no, not at the jubilee. For it is probable, that the law concerning lands (which immediately follows) was the rule for houses also, which were valued according to their distance from the year of jubilee, at a higher or lower price, as lands were, (ver. 18. 22, 23.)

Then shall he add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation, and it shall be his.] "He that gave us the law, (saith Maimonides in his treatise on this subject, cap. ult.) knows the most intimate sense of all men's souls, and penetrates into the most secret recesses and lurking-places of human desires: and he seeing that their love of riches would make them very saving; so that, if out of a religious motion they had consecrated any thing to him, they would be prone to repent of it; he therefore ordained, that if any man had a mind to redeem what he had consecrated, he should add a fifth part to its just value;" that is, pay well for it.

Ver. 16. And if a man shall sanctify unto the Lord.] By a vow; after the same manner that some did a house, (ver. 14.)

Some part of a field.] This seems to signify, that it was not lawful for a man to vow his own field; that is, all his estate: because God would have no man's family undone and made beggars to enrich his sanctuary.

Of his possession.] Not purchased by him, but descended to him as an inheritance from his ancestors.

Then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof.] It shall be valued according to the quantity of seed which is required to sow it.

An omer of barley-seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver.] So much land as an omer of barley would sow, was to be rated at fifty shekels, and so proportionably; so much as would take up two omers at a hundred, or half an omer at five-and-twenty. Menochius thinks it was to be rated so much yearly; but there is not the least intimation of this in the text; and his only reason for it is this of Abulensis, that it would have been too little to give for a piece of land to be held forty-nine years. (See lib. ii. de Republ. Hebræor. cap. 19. Quæst. 7.) Which is of no force at all; for it is plain God designed a moderate rate should be set upon all things which men vowed to him; whereby men were not discouraged to vow. And this yearly rent had been excessive and oppressive: for a piece of land, which an omer of barley (i. e. about a pottle of our measure) would sow, could yield no great crop, and consequently could not be of a considerable value; barley also being much cheaper than wheat. Concerning an omer, see Exod. xvi. 36.

Ver. 17. If he sanctify his field from the year of jubilee.] Make this vow immediately after the jubilee, or in that year.

According to thy estimation.] Beforementioned, of fifty shekels for an omer of barley.

It shall stand.] It shall be so rated, and nothing abated.

Ver. 18. But if he sanctify his field after the jubilee.] Some years after.

Then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain, even unto the year of jubilee, &c.] The priest was to compute how many years were gone since the last jubilee, and how many yet remained till the next; and accordingly to deduct from the rate of fifty shekels beforementioned, either more or less, as the years yet to come were more or fewer.

Ver. 19. If he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then shall he add the fifth part, &c.] The very same rule is given in this case, as in those of unclean beasts and houses, ver. 13. 15.

Ver. 20. And if he will not redeem the field.] When the priest hath set his value upon it, and tells him he may have it again at such a rate, if he pleases, and he refuses the offer.

Or if he have sold the field to another man.] That is, if the priest, upon his refusal, have sold it to another man; and afterward he that vowed it hath a mind to it himself, and would give the price at which he might have had it.

It shall not be redeemed any more.] He was then excluded from all benefit of redemption.

Ver. 21. But the field when it goeth out in the jubilee.] Out of the possession of him to whom the priest sold it.

Shall be wholly unto the Lord.] Shall not return to him that vowed it, but continue God's portion.

As a field devoted.] Being solemnly consecrated to the Divine service.

The possession thereof shall be the priests'.] Who were to have the inheritance of it for their better support. But they might sell it; nay (Menochius thinks), were bound to sell it to some of the kindred of him that devoted it, or to some of his tribe; for otherwise lands would go out of the tribe to which they belonged; and besides, the priests were to have no inheritance in the land, (Numb. xviii. 20.) See him, lib. ii. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 19. and his Annotations upon this place. But these seem not to be solid reasons why the priests should not enjoy this land themselves: for though they were not to have any inheritance in the division of the land of Canaan, yet if any fell to them by the means now mentioned (which was but very seldom, since men were very careful to preserve their inheritances), God doth here bestow such land upon his priests; who might possess it if they pleased, because they had it in God's right; or else sell it, (ver. 20.) and keep the money to their own use.

Ver. 22. And if a man sanctify unto the Lord a field which he hath bought.] And consequently could enjoy only till the year of jubilee; when it was to return to the family of whom he purchased it.

Which is not of the fields of his possession.] No part of his paternal inheritance, (as that mentioned ver. 16.) but bought of the priests, to whom it was fallen by a vow; or of him to whom the priests had sold it.

Ver. 23. Then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation.] Set a value upon it, according to his judgment.

Even unto the year of jubilee.] With respect to the number of years, between the time of the vow and the year of jubilee.

And he shall give thy estimation in that day.] Presently pay the price that the priest hath set upon it, without the addition of the fifth part (as Menochius well observes in the place beforementioned), which he, who redeemed his paternal inheritance, was bound to pay over and above the price at which the priest esteemed it, (ver. 19.) For this was not so much worth as that, being but for a term of years, till the jubilee.

As a holy thing unto the Lord.] As a thing devoted unto God, instead of the land, which was redeemed with this money.

Ver. 24. In the year of jubilee the field shall return unto him of whom it was bought, &c.] Not unto him who bought the field, and then vowed it to God, but unto the hereditary owner; which is the meaning of the next words, even unto him to whom the possession of the land did belong.

Ver. 25. All thy estimations shall be according to the shekel of the sanctuary, &c.] Full weight, according to the standard kept in the sanctuary: (see Exod. xxx. 13. and chap. xix. of this book, ver. 36.)

Ver. 26. Only the firstling of the beasts, which shall be the Lord's firstling, no man shall sanctify it.] By vowing it to be a whole burnt-offering, or a peace-offering unto the Lord; as Maimonides expounds it. The reason was, because no man could lawfully vow that which was not his own, as the firstlings were not; they being the Lord's already, as it follows in the end of this verse.

The same reason held (as Maimonides likewise observes) in all things belonging to God, as tenths. Yet they devised ingeniously enough (as he speaks) a way to give these firstlings to God by a new obligation, and yet not offend, as they imagined, against this law; for they interpret these words of firstlings already brought forth: no man might sanctify such; but while they were in the womb, they might; saying, "I vow that lamb (suppose) which my ewe goes with to be a whole burnt-offering to God, if it be a male:" but they could not vow it for a peace-offering, because no man could alter any thing for his own profit.

Whether it be ox, or sheep.] Under these two are comprehended all other kind of creatures, whose firstlings belonged to God.

It is the Lord's.] Num. iii. 13. viii. 17. For this reason no man was to presume to vow such things; it being a kind of mockery to make a present of that to another which was his own before. (See Mr. Mede concerning this verse, p. 512.)

Ver. 27. And if it be of an unclean beast.] Most understand this of the firstling of an unclean beast. Against which there is this objection, that such things were before ordered to be redeemed, not with money, but with a lamb, (Exod. xiii. 13.) Therefore it seems more reasonable, to understand this of the firstlings of such an unclean beast, which a man hath redeemed, (ver. 13.) but afterward devoted to God; which he might do; for, after the redemption, it was become his own again.

Then he shall redeem it according to thy estimation.] At the rate thou shalt set upon it.

And shall add a fifth part of it thereto.] As was ordained before in the like case, (ver. 11.)

Or if it be not redeemed, then it shall be sold according to thy estimation.] Any other man might buy it, at that rate the priest had set upon it; and the money was applied to holy uses.

Ver. 28. Notwithstanding, no devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord.] Nothing that was devoted by that sort of vow, which was called cherem (as the word is here in the Hebrew), with a curse (as the word implies) upon themselves and others, if the thing was not employed according to their vow.

Of all that he hath, both of man and beast, &c.] All manner of things which might be sanctified to the Lord, by the forementioned simple vow, might be thus devoted and consecrated to him by a cherem, i. e. beasts and houses, and lands, and even men themselves, as far as they had power over them; for that is meant by those words, all that a man hath. (See the next verse.)

Shall be sold or redeemed.] For this was the peculiar nature of this sort of vow; that the thing devoted by it should remain irreversibly and unalterably to the use unto which it was devoted; for the person was accursed that applied it to any other use than that to which it was consecrated.

Every devoted thing.] Of this kind.

Is most holy to the Lord.] Other things devoted by a simple vow were holy, (ver. 9, 10, &c.) but these were most holy, so that none might touch them but the priests; and they were so strictly applied to the Divine service, that they could not be alienated, either by sale, or redemption, or commutation, or donation, or any other way. (See Mede, p. 160.)

Ver. 29. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death.] Some learned men have, from these words, asserted, that parents and masters among the Jews had such a power over their children and servants, that they might devote them to death, and so kill them; only the sentence of the priest was to concur, to whom every devoted thing fell as his portion. This is maintained by Ludov. Capellus, and confuted by Mr. Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplin. Hebr. cap. 6. where he judiciously observes, that this power would have too much entrenched upon the sixth commandment, if private men might have, at their pleasure, thus disposed of their children and slaves. And, in the next chapter, he explains the sense of this verse; and proves, indeed, that there may be a cherem (minha-adam) of men, or from among men, as well as of beasts; but this word hath four several senses among the Hebrews. First, it signifies the sacred gift itself, which was devoted to God, or to holy uses; and so it signifies in the foregoing ver. 28. Secondly, it signifies that which was devoted to perdition and utter destruction, either by the right of war, or upon the account of capital enmities: an example of which we have in Jericho, Josh. vi. 17. where the whole city was a cherem (devoted to destruction), as a punishment to their enemies; yet so, that the metals were made a cherem

of the first sort; that is, sacred to the Lord and his holy uses. And thus the great Sanhedrin (called in Scripture the whole congregation) might devote those to be a cherem, who, going to the wars, did not obey orders, and perform the charge laid upon them. An example of which we have, Judges xxi. 5. 1 Sam. xiv. 24. I omit the other two for brevity's sake, (of which there are examples, Josh. vi. 26. Ezra x. 8. Acts xxiii. 12.14.21. see Selden, ib. cap. 7, 8.) because the cherem here mentioned by Moses is of this second sort: for it is evident that the cherem of the first sort, mentioned ver. 28. was of such things, over which they had an entire power, to dispose of them as they pleased. And therefore those words, both of man and beast, the Hebrews understand of their slaves, whether men or women (who were Canaanites, or gentiles, not others), who were in their power as much as their beasts, to give away or to sell. But to take away their life, or to give them to be slain, was not in their power; but all the effect of this cherem was, that the whole right which they had to the service of such slaves, was transferred by him that devoted them to the service of the priests and sacred uses. (See Selden in that book, cap. 9. p. 518, &c.) But though they might not devote their servants to death, yet they might their enemies, before they went out to war with them; and such of their own people also as did not observe the military laws. An example of which we have, Numb. xxi. 2. Upon which account also, the inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead were slain, (Judges xxi. 9, 10.) for violating the solemn public cherem, pronounced against those that came not up to Mizpeh, (ver. 5.) And this is the cherem spoken of in this verse. (See Selden, cap. 10.) For as for the cherem, whereby a man was excommunicated, it only loaded him with many curses, and made him execrable, so that no man might come near him; but did not touch his life, as he there shews, p. 520.

Ver. 30. All the tithe of the land, &c. is the Lord's.] By an ancient right before the law of Moses was delivered: for this is the first time we find any mention of a law about tithes: for which he giving no reason, it is a sign this was a pious usage all the world over; and therefore, being no new thing, but what all nations practised, the Jews could not think it burdensome to them; unless they would be wholly irreligious, and not acknowledge God to be the author and fountain of all the plenty and happiness they enjoyed: which was the intention of paying tithes; as the gentiles anciently did, and the Jews themselves, after victory over their enemies. For which there being no precept that appears, what can we think, but that natural reason, and the common custom of mankind (founded, perhaps, upon some direction given to our first parents from above), taught them to make this acknowledgment to God, as the author of their successes and safety, as well as of all plenty and prosperity. (See Gen. xiv. 19. xxviii. 22.)

Whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the trees.] By the seed of the land is meant corn (as Rasi expounds it), and by the fruit of the trees, wine and oil. For thus they are reckoned up in other places, (Numb. xviii. 12.) where he gives the priest the first-fruits of the wine, and oil, and wheat. And the like we read in Deut xviii. 3, 4. and in Deut. xiv. 23. they are commanded to eat before God, the tithe of their corn, of their wine, and their oil. Under which last is comprehended the fruit of all other trees; as under the word seed in this place seems to be comprehended all manner of herbs, as well as corn. For so the pharisees understood it; and our Saviour doth not disallow it.

It is holy unto the Lord.] God, having declared his right in the tithe, in the beginning of the verse, here commands that it be reserved to him as his portion: which he afterward conferred and settled upon the Levites by a special donation, (Numb. xviii. 21.)

Ver. 31. And if a man will at all redeem aught of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof.] Mr. Selden, in his History of the Tithes, (chap. ii.) speaking of the second tithe, mentioned Deut. xiv. 23. which was to be spent at Jerusalem (either in kind, or else, if it were too far thither, by turning it into money, and therewith to buy provision to make feasts), saith, that to this tithe do the Jews apply that of Lev. xxvii. 30, 31. But for this he quotes only R. S. Jarchi: who, though he was a great Talmudist, yet must not be thought to understand the sense of all their doctors. Aben Ezra, it is plain (to name no more), takes it otherwise; making Moses to speak of such a tithe as Abraham gave Melchisedec, and Jacob vowed to God. Lyra, I might add, a converted Jew, agrees with him. And there is great reason for it; no such thing as a second tithe being as yet ordained: and when they were commanded, and the changing of them into money allowed, there is not a word said of adding a fifth part, (see Deut. xiv. 24, 25.) which is sufficient to shew that Moses, in these two verses, speaks of the first tithe, which was paid to the Levites, by a law made some time after this; which transferred the right that God had in the tithe of the land unto them: which, if any man had a mind to redeem, and not pay it in kind, God allows him so to do; because the tithe was not more holy than things vowed to God, spoken of before: but then he was to do as in the case of such things, (ver. 13.) add a fifth part, over and above, to what such a portion of tithe was esteemed to be worth. The reason of which was, as Mr. Calvin well observes, not that the priest should get more than his due, by the man who desired to redeem his tithe, but that the man might not make a gain of the priest. For it is seldom seen that a husbandman desires to pay money rather than his tithe; unless he propound some considerable advantage to himself.

Ver. 32. And concerning the tithe of the herd and of the flock.] Every one knows, that by the tithe of the herd here is meant calves, and by the flock is to be understood lambs and kids, (Lev. i. 2.) For this was the tithe of those young ones that were brought forth that year; the same cattle not being again tithed every year. And he speaks of clean beasts, which were allowed in sacrifice; for tithe was not paid of other beasts; but their first-born only was the Lord's. This tithe was paid to God every year, as an eucharistical sacrifice, for all the benefits they received from God by their cattle.

Even of whatsoever passeth under the rod.] This expresses the manner of this tithing, which, if we will believe the Jews, was thus: they were all brought into a sheep-cot (saith Maimonides, in his Treatise of First-born, cap. vii. in the beginning), in which there was but one gate or door, and that so narrow as to suffer no more than one to come out at once. Their dams being placed without, and the gate opened, the young ones were invited by their bleatings to press to get out to them; and as they passed by, one by one, a man who stood at the gate with a rod, coloured with ochre, told them in order; and when the tenth came out, whether it was male or female, sound or not, he marked it with his rod, and said, Let this be holy in the name of the tenth. And this account R. Solomon and others give of this matter; of which notion they are so fond, that R. Bechai (upon Numb. xvii.) makes Jacob (who vowed tithe of all that God should give him) to have decimated his children on this manner, beginning at Benjamin and stopping at Levi, who was the tenth according to that reckoning, and hath some pretty conceits about it. But Bochartus thinks Moses doth not speak here of the rod of the tithes, but of the shepherd's crook; and so doth Aben Ezra, the Syriac, and the Vulgar: for the flock passed under his rod as oft as he numbered them, which was every morning and evening (if he was a good shepherd), especially in the evening. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 499.) Of this Jeremiah speaks, (chap. xxxiii. 13.) and Ezekiel alludes to it, when he saith, (chap. xx. 37.) I will cause you to pass under the rod. Where Kimchi notes it is the same phrase with this in Leviticus, and as much as to say, "As he that telleth his sheep holdeth a rod in his hand, and telleth them one by one, and brings out the tenth for the tithe; so will I number you, and the sinners shall perish," &c.

The tenth shall be holy unto the Lord.] That is, saith Maimonides (in his forenamed treatise called Bechoroth), the fat and the blood of them was offered at the altar; and then the owners eat the flesh any where in Jerusalem, as they did the lesser holy things. For the priests had no portion of them, but all belonged to the owner, as did the paschal lamb. If there was any blemish in them, whether before or after the tithing, then they might be eaten in any place. And so Bartenora, (as Dr. Outram observes, lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 11.) "we do not find in the whole law that any part of these tenths was given to the priests." So a great many other of their doctors, who observe that Moses doth not reckon these among the twenty-four gifts (for so many they make the whole number of them) which were bestowed upon the priesthood. But as there is nothing else in Scripture to warrant this, which no where prescribes how these tenths should be employed, but only declares that they are holy to the Lord; so this very phrase, I should think, sufficiently signifies that they belonged to the Lord's ministers; and if not entirely to the priests, much less entirely to the owners of them (before they were the Lord's); but if they were to eat them at Jerusalem, as the Jews imagine, the Levites sure were to have their share, and the stranger and other poor people, as they were to have in their second tithe of corn, wherewith they made feasts there, (Deut. xiv. 27—29.)

Ver. 33. He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it.] It is not easy to give an account why God required so punctually the tenth calf, goat, or lamb; that though it were never so lean or blemished, he would not suffer it to be exchanged for the better, unless it were to avoid all disputes, strife, and contention. There are those, indeed, that think the reason was; because in those ages this was looked upon as so sacred a number, that it mystically denoted God, whose Divine perfections, providence, and bounty, they were thought to acknowledge, who gave the tenth to him; which was not to be altered and changed no more than he himself can be.

If he change it at all, then both shall be holy.] As it was in beasts avowed to God, (ver. 9, 10.)

It shall not be redeemed.] Nor might they sell it, no more than suffer it to be redeemed. If they did, he that sold it or bought it got nothing (as Maimonides speaks); and besides, the seller was to be scourged, as he that sold the cherems given to the priest, ver. 28. (Bechoroth, cap. 6. sect. 5.)

Ver. 34. These are the commandments which the Lord commanded Moses, for the children of Israel, in Mount Sinai.] That is, these moreover were added to the foregoing commandments, before they removed from the wilderness of Mount Sinai. (See chap. xxv. 1. xxvi. ult.) For having said before, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, these are the statutes, and judgments, and laws which the Lord made, &c. which respect all that preceded in this book, the commandments here spoken of can relate to nothing more but the laws delivered in this chapter about vows, and devoted things, and tithes.

Which laws ought not to be passed over, without serious consideration how far we may be concerned in them. And therefore to make what I have noted about them more useful to us in these days, I desire the reader to observe, that the very same pious inclinations have ever been in all good Christians, which Moses here supposes (in the former part of this chapter) would be in the Jews, to devote some part of their goods, their houses, or lands to the service of God; which became sacred things, and were to be employed to no other use but that. The very first Christians had so much of this spirit in them, that they sold all their possessions, and goods, and let every one that needed have a share of them; (Acts ii. 45. iv. 35.) because the whole number of believers attended to nothing else but the service of Christ; and the apostles also were to be furnished with means to go and propagate the gospel in all the world. Where, as soon as the Christian religion prevailed in any place, immediately there were the like voluntary oblations made, in such a proportion, as served not only for the support of the service of God in that church, but helped to maintain the Christians at Jerusalem, who had been brought low by parting with their estates to further the first preaching of the gospel. This we find in a great number of places; but it may suffice to say, that the feasts of charity were maintained out of these oblations.

By which it is apparent, that they took themselves to have the very same obligations upon them in this matter, which the Jews formerly had; and therefore it is no wonder that tithes came in time to be devoted for the maintenance of God's ministers. For it is senseless to imagine, that the gospel, which constrained them to give up themselves to God, should not constrain them, with the same freedom of mind, to give some of their goods (as Moses here supposes the Jews would do) for the maintenance of his service. And it is as unreasonable to think it did not move them to give the ministers of God as honourable a maintenance, as had been allowed under the law of Moses.

Which required, besides the tenth here mentioned, another tithe of the remainder to be spent in sacrifices at Jerusalem, of which the Levites had their share, as I observed from Deut. xiv. 22. 28. To which, if we add the first-born, with all sin-offerings, and the priest's share of peace-offerings, and the skins of the sacrifices (which alone made a good revenue, as Philo observes), and likewise all such consecrations as are mentioned in this chapter, the Levites' cities and suburbs, it will easily appear it could not be so little as a fifth part of the fruit of the land which came to their share.

Now the reason we find no such certain rate determined by the gospel, as was by this law, is, because there was no need of it; and for the same reason there was none, for a good while, settled by the church; all the revenues belonging to it, which served for all sorts of pious uses, arising from the devotion and oblations of the people, which were more than enough for God's service. This was visible in the beginning of our religion, when the first Christians far outdid any thing that had been done under the law. And they could not imagine, that they who succeeded them would fall so short as not to offer sufficient for God's service; though not so much as they had done, because there could not be the same necessity. And so Mr. Selden himself observes, that this reason is given by Agobardus, why nothing was decreed in councils, or publicly promulgated by the fathers in the first ages, concerning giving of their goods, and adorning churches; because there was no necessity of it: the religious devotion, the love of Christians to such things ultro æstuante, being very fervent, and abounding of its own accord.

And when love began to wax cold, so that they found it needful to make laws about such things, they could not think fit to order less for the settled maintenance of God's service than the tenth (besides all voluntary oblations), which had been the part most eminently limited under the law of nature, long before the law of Moses. See Irenæus, lib. iv. cap. 34. where he saith, Christians, having greater hopes, could not give less than they did in former times, when their hope was lower.

I shall add but one observation more, from an excellent person of our own church, (Mr. Thorndike, in his Rights of the Church, &c. p. 219.) that as all such consecrations, as here are mentioned by Moses, tended to communion with God, by the participation of sacrifices offered to him, which were maintained by such contributions; so whatsoever is devoted by Christians unto such holy uses, as to build and repair churches, to maintain holy assemblies, and to support those who minister God's ordinances, or enable the poor to attend upon them, hath the like intention to obtain an interest in the sacrifice of Christ, represented in the eucharist; which is the chief part of the service rendered to God in the church. This is notably exemplified in the account which Tertullian gives of Marcion the heretic, (lib. de Præscriptionibus, cap. 30.) who, when he first embraced the faith of Christ, and was received into the church, pecuniam Catholicæ Ecclesiæ contulit, contributed a sum of money to the church; which money, when he fell off from the Christian truth to his own heresy, was straightway thrown out together with him. This both demonstrates that they continued, in those days, to bring offerings into the treasury of the church; and that the intention of them was, that they might have communion with the church in all its services; for when men fell off from Christianity they cast out their offerings, in token they had no communication with them.

I end all with the words of Conradus Pellicanus upon the thirtieth verse of this chapter; which will shew the sense of the first reformers in this matter. "All the tithe is the Lord's, and remains so for ever, &c. and therefore tithes are to be paid by Divine and natural right, and religiously expended, according to his appointment, &c. And if tithes should not be sufficient for the maintenance of those who ought to be sustained in the church, at the public charge, the ninths, or the eighths, ought of necessity to be raised by the judgment and consent of the church; for the law of charity dictates this, and the excellent, irreprehensible ordinance of God: which charity binds more strongly in the evangelical law than in the Mosaical; inasmuch as the church ought to be more perfect than the synagogue; and charity than fear."

NUMBERS.

CHAP. I.

THIS Book is called by the name of NUMBERS in our language; because it begins with an account of the numbering of the people in the beginning of the second year after they came out of Egypt; though it contains a great many things besides that; particularly, another numbering of them (chap. xxvi) towards the conclusion of their travels in the wilderness: for this book comprehends a history of about thirty-eight years, though most of the things related in it fell out in the first and in the last of these years; and it doth not appear when those things were done, which we read of about the middle of the book, from the fifteenth to the twentieth chapter.

Ver. 1. And the Lord spake unto Moses.] Who undertook nothing without order from God.

In the wilderness of Sinai.] Where they had continued near a full year (as appears by comparing Exod. xix. 1. with this place), and shortly after this removed from it, (chap. x. 11.)

In the tabernacle of the congregation.] From whence the Lord delivered those laws which we read in the foregoing book, (see on Lev. i. 1.) and now seems to have admitted him into the tabernacle, whereas before he only spake to him out of it.

On the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt.] All that is related in the foregoing book, seems to have passed in the first month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, in the beginning of which the tabernacle was set up, (Exod. xl. 2. 17.) and in the middle of it the Passover was kept; as appears by this book, (chap. ix. 1; 2, &c.)

Ver. 2. Take ye the sum.] There had been a muster, as we may call it, of the people, before the tabernacle was erected, (Exod. xxx. 12.) and consequently some months before this; for it was in order to a contribution, which every one was to make towards that holy work, (Exod. xxxviii. 26.) whereas this was for the better disposing of their camps about the tabernacle now that it was set up; and for their more regular march when they removed from Mount Sinai, which they were to do shortly.

Of all the congregation of the children of Israel.] Who alone were numbered; all except the Levites; but none of the mixed multitude that came with them out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 38.)

After their families,] It appears by Josh. vii. 16, 17, &c. that the several tribes of Israel were divided into families, and those families into households, and those households had every one of them a head or chief, who is called the father of it. There were seventy of these families in all; but some tribes had more, others fewer, according to the number of souls (as they are called); that is, persons who were in each when they went down into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 27.)

By the house of their fathers.] Every family, as I said, being distributed into houses (which we now call families); these houses were denominated from their chief, whom they called their father; for no houses were denominated from the mother, as Jews say.

With the number of their names.] The names of every person, in the several houses, were set down and registered, that they might be the better known.

Every male by their poll.] But no women; for the reason which follows.

Ver. 3. From twenty years old and upward.] Which was ever after this the age when men were thought fit for war.

All that are able to go forth to war in Israel.] One would think by this they were not to number very aged and decrepit people, because they were no more able to go to war than women and children, and those under twenty years old. And if we may believe Josephus (lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 9.) after fifty years old, men were not bound to pay the half shekel which was due in such musters; and therefore we may reasonably think were excused from going to war, unless they had a mind themselves.

Thou and Aaron.] Who had the highest authority in the nation.

Shall number them by their armies.] This seems to import, that, in taking the account of them, they distributed them into certain troops or companies, out of which were formed regiments (as we now speak), and greater regular bodies, which composed several armies. We do not read this was required in the former numbering, (Exod. xxx.) that being for another end, as I now observed; not for their more orderly march in their remove from Mount Sinai. And here I cannot but take notice, what a vast difference there was between this method and that rude way which Cecrops, the first king of Attica, after the Ogygian flood (which happened about the time of Moses), took to know the number of his people; which the Greek writers say, was by requiring every one of them to bring a stone, καὶ βάλλειν εἰς τὸ μέσον, and throw it down before them; which he counting, found them twenty thousand. So the scholiast upon Pindar, (Ode ix.) and others in Meursius de Regibus Atheniens. (lib. i. cap. 7.)

Ver. 4. And there shall be with you a man of every tribe.] Whom they were to take for their assistants.

Every one head of the house of his fathers.] The LXX. and the Vulgar understand this to signify the principal persons in each tribe, who were best acquainted with every family and household in that tribe. And so it is expounded, ver. 6. and many think these were the first-born in their tribe: but there is this objection against it, that Nahshan, who is named for the tribe of Judah, (ver. 7.) was not descended from the first-born of that tribe; for Pharez was not Judah's eldest son, Selah being before him, who had children, as we find in chap. xxvi. of this book, (ver. 20.) Besides, when the principles of the tribes are reckoned again (chap. xxxiv. of this book), in the last year of their abode in the wilderness, none of them are derived from these men here mentioned, but from others: and therefore these were the most eminent men in the several tribes, upon a different account; either for wisdom or valour, or some other excellent quality.

Ver. 5. And these are the names of the men that shall stand.] Be assistants.

With you.] i. e. With Moses and Aaron.

Of the tribe of Reuben, Elizur the son of Shedeur.] There is little to be observed concerning these tribes, but that they are here placed not in the order of their birth, but of their mothers who bare them. First, the children of Leah, who are all reckoned in the same order wherein they were born of her, (ver. 6—9.) Then the children of Rachel, (ver. 10, 11.) and after them the children of the two handmaids, in the four following verses; where (ver. 12.) Dan is set first, he being the first-born of Bilhah, whom Rachel gave Jacob for his wife, (Gen. xxx. 5.) but then the next that follow are not reckoned according to the order of their birth; for Naphtali, who was born next, is placed the last; and the youngest son of Zilpah placed before the eldest; for which we cannot now discern the reason, though it is likely it was upon the account of some pre-eminence or other which they had gained; as Ephraim, the youngest son of Joseph, is mentioned before Manasseh the eldest, (ver. 10.) because Jacob had given him the precedence, when he blessed them before his death, (Gen. xlviii. 19.)

Ver. 6. Of Simeon, Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai.]

Digitized by Microsoft®

There is less to be observed concerning the names of these great men of each tribe; for whatsoever the import of them may be in the Hebrew language (which Chytræus and others have endeavoured to make out), it signifies nothing to us: only most of them shew how much God was in the thoughts of those who imposed these names on their children; for Elizur signifies my God the rock; and Shelumiel is as much as God my peace, or God my rewarder; and Zurishaddai, my rock omnipotent, or all-sufficient, &c.

Ver. 14. The son of Deuel.] So he is called also, chap. vii. 42. and yet in the second chapter, (ver. 14.) he is called the son of Reuel; for these two letters, daleth and resch, are very often changed, the one for the other; as Ripah (Gen. x. 3.) is called Dipath, (1 Chron. i. 6.) as, on the other hand, Dodanim (Gen. x. 4.) is called Rodanim, (1 Chron. i. 7.) and it is to no purpose to heap up more examples there are of this.

Ver. 16. These were the renowned of the congregation.] The Hebrew word keruim signifies properly men called or named; that is, who had the honour to be named by God to this employment; which made them more noble than they were before. But, without this respect to their nomination by God, this word signifies, in general, famous men, as we translate it, (chap. xvi. 2. xxvi. 9.) or renowned, (Ezek. xxiii. 23.) Accordingly the Vulgar translates it, most noble.

Princes of the tribes of their fathers.] As appears more plainly from the noble offerings which each of them made for the dedication of the altar, (chap. vii.)

Heads of thousands in Israel.] Men not only of great authority; such as Jethro advised Moses to take to his aid in governing the people, (Exod. xviii. 21.) but the highest of that rank; being chief commanders over all the thousands that were in their several tribes; under whom, no doubt, were many inferior officers of great account; for so all people have found it necessary to submit themselves to the government of some supreme power, with several subordinate rulers under it. In which Israel excelled all other nations, being under the government of God himself, who appointed Moses immediately under him, with several others, as we here find, to assist him; for it is truly observed by Xenophon, that οὐδὲν οὕτως οὔτ' εὔχρηστον, οὔτε καλὸν ἀνθρώποις ὡς ἡ τάξις: nothing is either so profitable for men, or so becoming, as good order; and, on the contrary, nothing so mischievous, or unseemly, as confusion. Now order is nothing else but the apt disposition of every thing, in its proper place, for certain ends and uses. Accordingly among men nothing is more necessary, than that every one should know and keep his place in that degree and rank that belongs to him; as was here ordered by God for the preservation and good government of his people.

Ver. 17. And Moses and Aaron took these men.] To be their associates in the numbering of the people.

Which are expressed by their names.] Whom God himself marked out by name to be joined with them. For as people cannot be preserved without order, so that cannot be preserved without rulers and governors; and they will signify nothing if their authority be not reverenced; and nothing can gain them such reverence, as a particular designation by God to their office.

Ver. 18. And they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month.] They immediately executed their commission, on the same day they received it, (ver. 1.) summoning all the people to appear before them.

And they declared their pedigrees.] The people instantly obeyed, and every one shewed from whom he was descended; or it may refer to Moses and Aaron, and the rest, who set down every man's original in the public tables.

After their families, by the house of their fathers, &c.] First, they shewed of what family they were; and then of what house in that family; and then the name of every person in that house was given in. (See ver. 2.) Such a kind of distinction Cecrops made in Attica, when he numbered the people, whom he divided into four tribes (which in the days of Alcmæon, their last king, were increased into ten); every one of which had several people in it, which were like the families in Israel; there being no less than ten or eleven people in that tribe which was called after his own name, Κεκροπίς. (See Meursius, lib. i. de Reg. Athen. cap. 7. and lib. ii. cap. 10.) And every one knows how Rome, at the first, had three tribes instituted by Romulus, which were divided into ten courts (if I may so call them), and those into certain families; which in aftertimes were increased into five-and-thirty tribes, according to the regions of the city.

Ver. 19. As the Lord commanded Moses, so he numbered them.] With the assistance of the forenamed persons.

In the wilderness of Sinai.] Before they removed from Sinai; which being upon the twentieth day of this month, (chap. x. 11.) they finished this work in so many days, or less.

Ver. 20. And the children of Reuben, Israel's eldest son, by their generations, &c.] The word generations seems to be larger than families, as that is than houses, comprehending every family in that tribe; as families comprehend every household, and household comprehends every person therein. So the meaning is, all that were descended from Reuben, according to their several families; and houses in those families; and persons in those houses.

Ver. 21. Those that were numbered of them, &c. were forty and six thousand and five hundred.] Some have observed, that this tribe was one of those who had the smallest number of men in it; in which they think was fulfilled the prophecy of Jacob, who foretold that Reuben should not excel, (Gen. xlix. 4.) But I do not look upon this as solid; for there were several tribes, who all this time had fewer persons in it than this; particularly the children of Joseph (whom Jacob compared to a fruitful bough, Gen. xlix. 22.) were very much fewer. (See below, ver. 33. 35.) Gad also, Benjamin and Asher, were fewer in number than Reuben; who, in this regard, excelled five tribes.

Ver. 23. Of the tribe of Simeon were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred.] He had six children when they went down into Egypt, and Reuben but four; which is a plain reason of the greater increase of this tribe than the former.

Ver. 24. Of the children of Gad, &c.] It is probable that this tribe is therefore mentioned next, though descended from a handmaid, because they were to encamp and march together with Simeon under the standard of Reuben; as is ordered in the next chapter, ver. 14.

Ver. 25. Of the tribe of Gad were forty and five thousand six hundred and fifty.] He had more sons than Simeon (Gen. xlvi. 10. 16.) when they came out of Egypt; and yet fewer descended from him, by many thousands, than there did from Simeon; of which the reason doth not appear.

Ver. 27. Of the tribe of Judah were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred.] It may be justly thought, that Jacob's prophecy concerning the power and strength of this tribe (Gen. xlix. 8, &c.) began already to be fulfilled, they being far more numerous than any other.

Ver. 28. Of the tribe of Issachar, &c.] There is a plain account why this tribe and Zebulun are mentioned next to Judah, because they two marched under his standard, (chap. ii. 4, 5. 7.) It may be observed also, that these two tribes were more numerous than many other, who had more children when they came out of Egypt.

Ver. 32. Of the children of Ephraim.] He had the preeminence given him to Manasseh long ago, (Gen. xlviii. 19.) and therefore is here placed before him.

Ver. 33. Of the tribe of Ephraim were forty thousand and five hundred.] Though they were hitherto but few in comparison with some other tribes; yet in this the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled, (Gen. xlviii. 19, 20.) that they were more fruitful than Manasseh, there being above eight thousand persons more in this tribe than in the other, (ver. 35.)

Ver. 35. Of Manasseh were thirty and two thousand and two hundred.] This was now the smallest tribe; but before they got to Canaan they grew very numerous, being increased above twenty thousand, (chap. xxvi. 34.)

Ver. 37. Of the tribe of Benjamin were thirty-five thousand and four hundred.] Though Benjamin had more children than any of the rest of his brethren, when they went down into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 21. where it appears he had ten sons), yet his tribe had the fewest men in it of all other, except Manasseh.

Ver. 39. Of Dan were threescore and two thousand and seven hundred.] On the contrary, Dan, who had but one son when they went down into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 23.) grew to a greater number than any other tribe, except Judah. So variously did the Divine providence work in fulfilling the promise to Abraham, of multiplying his seed.

Ver. 41. Of Asher were forty and one thousand and five hundred.] The growth of this tribe was not proportionable to that of some other, considering how many children Asher had at their going down into Egypt. But they increased near twelve thousand more before they got out of the wilderness, (chap. xxvi. 47.)

Ver. 43. Of Naphtali were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.] The great increase of this tribe is alleged by Bochartus, to justify his interpretation of Gen. xlix. 21. by altering the punctuation of the words. But I have there observed, that five other tribes were more numerous than Naphtali when this account was taken of them.

Ver. 44. These are those that were numbered.] This is the account that was taken of the number of men in each tribe.

Which Moses and Aaron numbered, and the princes of Israel being twelve men.] See v. 3, 4, &c.

Each one was for the house of his fathers.] Who could the better judge to what tribe every one belonged.

Ver. 45, 46. So were all those that were numbered, &c. six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty.] By which it appears there was not one man dead since their last numeration (seven months ago), when they were taxed for the tabernacle; for they were at that time just so many as are here mentioned, (Exod. xxxviii. 26.) As for Nadab and Abihu, they were of the tribe of Levi, who are not here reckoned; and the man that was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv.) was not of Israel, by the side of his father.

Ver. 47. But the Levites, after the tribe of their fathers, were not numbered among them.] There was no account taken of them among the other tribes; as it is likely they were not comprehended in the former number, (Exod. xxxviii. 26.) being the persons who took the account, (ver. 21.) and had before this consecrated themselves to the Lord, (chap. xxxii. 29.)

After the tribe of their fathers.] Is a Hebraism, for the fathers of their tribe; expressing, in short, what is at large said of all the rest, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, (ver. 20. 22. 24, &c.)

Ver. 48. For the Lord had spoken unto Moses, saying.] He had received an order from God, when he commanded him to number the people, not to number them; which he sets down, that it might not be thought he favoured them, because he was of their tribe, and therefore exempted them from the wars, unto which all others were engaged.

Ver. 49. Only thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi, &c.] Because they were intended for another service, and therefore were to be numbered by themselves. There was as stout and valiant men in this tribe as any other, (which appeared sufficiently when God's honour was to be vindicated, Exod. xxxii.) but God did not design them for the wars of Canaan, they having employment enough in carrying and guarding the tabernacle.

And from this example, the heathen learned to exempt all those who ministered to their gods from all other services; particularly from the war. Strabo notes (lib. ix. Geograph.) this custom to have been as old as Homer's time; for in all his catalogue there is no mention of any ship that went against Troy from Alalcomenon, because that city was sacred to Minerva, who is thence called by Homer Ἀλαλκομενηὶς Ἀθηνᾶ. The same is observed by Cæsar (lib. vi.) of the ancient Druids, that they were freed from the wars, and from tribute also. Which privilege St. Basil challenges as belonging to the clergy, κατὰ τὸν παλαιὸν νόμον, according to the ancient law, Epist. cclxix. and S. Greg. Nazianzen doth the same in many places; particularly by his letter to Julianus, Epist. clxvi.

Ver. 50. But thou shalt appoint the Levites over the tabernacle.] This was their work, to attend continually upon the house of God.

Of testimony.] So it is called, because the ark of the testimony was there; for which it was principally made. See Exod. xxxviii. 21. and what I have noted upon Exod. xxv. 16. chap. xl. 3.

And over all the vessels thereof, and over all things that belong unto it.] Not to use them in any sacred ministry (which belonged to the priests alone), but to carry them when they were to be removed; and to keep them in safety at all times. See chap. viii. ult. where it is expressly said, they shall do no service there.

They shall bear the tabernacle and all the vessels thereof.] As is particularly directed in the fourth chapter.

And they shall minister unto it.] Which ministry is at large described in the third chapter.

And shall encamp round about the tabernacle.] As a guard unto it: they being like to the legions about the palace of a great king, to secure and defend it from violence or rudeness. Which was the reason that they did not march under any of the standards of the other tribes: because they were to make a camp by themselves; the order of which is directed in the same third chapter. And for the same reason they were not to go to the wars; because their camp was to attend upon the tabernacle, the house of God.

Ver. 51. And when the tabernacle setteth forward, the Levites shall take it down; and when it is to be pitched, the Levites shall set it up.] When the Israelites removed to a new station, the tabernacle was taken in pieces, that it might be the more easily carried from place to place: in which the Levites were to be employed; and likewise in putting it together again, when it was to be set up, where they rested in their journeys; as is more fully ordered in the fourth chapter, where the manner of taking it down and setting it up again is directed; and every one's office about it, whether priests (for they had some hand in it) or Levites, exactly appointed.

And the stranger.] Who is not of this tribe, though an Israelite.

That comes nigh.] To perform any of the forenamed offices.

Shall be put to death.] As a presumptuous person, in meddling with that which doth not belong unto him. The author of Schebet Jehudah extends this to all strangers, who worshipped strange gods; and saith, there was a golden sword hung up in the gate of the temple with this inscription, The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

Ver. 52. And the children of Israel.] The rest of the tribes beforementioned.

Shall pitch their tents every man by his own camp, &c.] In the order prescribed in the next chapter.

Ver. 53. But the Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle of testimony.] As is directed chap. iii. where they are ordered to make a camp nearer the tabernacle, within the other camp of the Israelites.

That there be no wrath upon the congregation of the children of Israel.] To prevent the other camp of the Israelites from coming too nigh the tabernacle; whereby they might have incurred God's displeasure.

And the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle of testimony.] That is, therefore they were to be a constant guard about it; that no man might approach nearer than God allowed, and so bring heavy punishments upon himself and upon the congregation.

Ver. 54. And the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did they.] Consented to all that is here required, and did accordingly.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying.] The just number of days that were spent in taking the forenamed account of the people is uncertain, (see chap. i. 19.) but that being finished, now order is given for their encamping under their several standards. And it is directed to Aaron as well as Moses; though the order for numbering them was directed to Moses only, (chap. i. 1.) Aaron having by that first order been joined with him in taking the account of them.

Ver. 2. Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard.] By the banner of that tribe, to which he was joined by the following order.

With the ensign of their father's house.] Every family and household had their particular ensigns, beside that great banner under which they encamped and marched; it being pitched and carried (as will appear) in the midst of them. How these banners and ensigns were distinguished one from another, we have no certain knowledge. The later Jews say (particularly Aben Ezra upon this place), that Judah carried in his standard the figure of a lion, and Reuben the figure of a man; Ephraim of an ox, and Dan of an eagle, for which I can see no ground. For though Judah be compared to a lion, yet the reasons he gives for the other are very absurd; with which I shall not trouble the reader, but only observe, that there is not one word of any such thing in their ancient writers; no, not in the whole body of the Talmud, as the famous Bochartus assures us. And it is not likely that they, who so lately smarted for making the golden calf, would adventure to make any other images, and expose them to the eyes of all the people. Nor is it impertinent to observe, that when Vitellius in after-ages was to march against the Arabians through Judea, the great men of the nation met him, and beseeched him to march another way: the law of their country not allowing images (such as were in the Roman ensigns) to be brought into it. So Josephus relates, lib. xviii. Antiq. cap. 7. for which one can see no reason, if their ancestors in the wilderness had, by the command or allowance of Moses, carried an eagle in any of their standards: (see Bochart in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 5.) It is more probable, if there be room for conjecture in this matter, that the name of Judah might be embroidered in great letters in his standard, and of Reuben in his, and so of the rest: or they were distinguished by their colours only, as now our regiments are.

Far off about the tabernacle of the congregation shall they pitch.] At such a distance as might shew their reverence to the tabernacle; and that there might be another camp of the Levites within them, who made a nearer inclosure about it, in the same form with the camp of Israel, which was quadrangular. This distance of the camp of Israel from the tabernacle, is reasonably judged (by Josh. iii. 4.) to have been two thousand cubits; that is, a mile.

Ver. 3. And on the east side toward the rising of the sun.] These are two expressions (after the manner of the Hebrews) for the same thing. Or kedma, which we here translate on the east, may be translated on the fore-part, viz. of the tabernacle: which was towards the sun's rising.

Shall they of the standard of the camp of Judah pitch.] These had the most honourable post (as we now speak) of all others; pitching before the most holy place, where Moses and Aaron had their station in the camp of the Levites, (chap. iii. 38.) And therefore the LXX. translate the first words of this verse thus, οἱ παρεμβάλλοντες πρῶτοι, &c. they that encamp first towards the east shall be, &c.

Throughout their armies.] They being, as we read before (and as the next verse tells us again), threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred men, were divided into several bodies (such as we now call companies, and regiments, and brigades), under their several officers: for which the Hebrews have no name but that of army or host.

And Nahshon the son of Amminadab.] He who was employed as the principal person in that tribe to help to take the number of them, (chap. i. 7.)

Shall be the captain of the children of Judah.] Their commander-in-chief, or general, as we now speak.

Ver. 4. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were threescore and fourteen thousand, &c.] Hitherto Moses had set down the words that God spake to him: but these are his own words, which he intermixes all along with those of God's.

Ver. 5. And those that do pitch next unto him.] These now are the words of God; ordering what tribes should pitch under the standard of Judah.

Shall be the tribe of Issachar.] He and Zebulun were two of the sons of Leah, as well as Judah: and therefore their tribes are fitly placed under the standard of the tribe of Judah, as likely to agree well together.

And Nethaneel, the son of Zuar, shall be captain of the children of Issachar.] It may be noted, once for all, that the commanders-in-chief of the several tribes, were those very persons who were chosen to take the number of them: which shews they were men of eminence among them; as I observed, chap. i. 4.

Ver. 6. And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were, &c.] These are the words of Moses, which to the end of the chapter (as I noted before) are interspersed with the orders that God gave for the forming of their camp.

Ver. 9. And all that were numbered in the camp of Judah were a hundred thousand, &c.] This was the greatest body of all other; which had the honour to be placed just before the oracle, as the strongest guard to it: the tribe of Judah lying in the midst, and the tribes of Issachar and Zebulun on each side of his standard; unto which all their ensigns were in some sort of subjection.

Throughout their armies.] This great body was divided into several smaller companies; for which they had no other name (as I observed before), but that of armies.

These shall first set forth.] When they removed from one station to another, this camp marched first. For they commonly went eastward; in which quarter this camp was pitched, (ver. 3.).

Ver. 10. And on the south side shall be the standard of the camp of Reuben, according to their armies, &c.] There is nothing to be observed concerning this camp, but that the tribe of Reuben had the honour to pitch in the midst of it; and the tribes of Simeon and Gad lay on either side of him under his standard or banner: just as Issachar and Zebulun did on either side of Judah. And there was an evident congruity in it; Simeon being his next brother, and Gad the eldest son of Zilpah, the handmaid of their mother Leah, (Gen. xxx. 10, 11.)

Ver. 14. Eliasaph the son of Reuel.] See note upon chap. i. 14.

Ver. 16. And they shall set forth in the second rank.] That is, when they removed, the three tribes that were pitched on the east marched first under the banner of Judah, (as was said before, ver. 9.) and then followed these three that lay on the south under the banner of Reuben.

Ver. 17. Then the tabernacle of the congregation shall set forward with the camp of the Levites.] After the forenamed camps the tabernacle was to follow, between those two that went before, and the camp of Ephraim and the camp of Dan that came after. So they did not march as they pitched; for then there was a camp on each side of the tabernacle: whereas when they marched there was none on the sides, but two camps went before it, and two followed it.

In the midst of the camp.] Not entirely in the midst: for it appears by the tenth chapter of this book, ver 17. that after the first camp under the standard of Judah was gone forward, the tabernacle was taken down and carried by the sons of Gershon and Merari between the camp of Judah and that of Reuben, which next followed: and then the sanctuary set forward, borne by the Kohathites, (ver. 21.) who marched exactly in the midst, between the standards of Judah and Reuben and the standards of Ephraim and Dan.

As they encamp so shall they set forward.] This may refer either to the Levites, the sons of Kohath; that, as they lay encamped on the same side of the tabernacle that the standard of Reuben did, so they should immediately march after them. Compare ver. 10. of this chapter with chap. iii. 29. Or to the two camps forenamed; that they should march in the same order wherein they lay encamped: Judah, for instance, in the midst of Issachar and Zebulun, before and behind him, or on each side of him.

Every man in his place by their standards.] Every man keeping his place which was assigned him, under the standard to which he belonged; that there might be no disorder among them.

Ver. 18. And on the west side shall be the standard of the camp of Ephraim. &c.] There is little to be noted here, but that Ephraim is plainly preferred before his brother, as he was in Jacob's blessing, (Gen. xlviii. 19, 20.) and that the two tribes which encamped under his standard, viz. Manasseh (ver. 20.) and Benjamin, (ver. 22.) are fitly joined with him; they being all descended from Rachel.

Ver. 24. All that were numbered of the camp of Ephraim were a hundred and eight thousand, &c.] This was the smallest body of all the four.

And they shall go forward in the third rank.] And therefore, though they lay on the west side in their encampment, yet when they marched they did not go in the rear of all, but immediately behind the tabernacle.

Ver. 25. The standard of the camp of Dan shall be on the north side, &c.] This tribe, we may reasonably think, was advanced to this dignity, of bearing one of the four standards, though they descended from a handmaid; because Dan was the eldest of Jacob's sons of that sort, (Gen. xxx. 6.) and this tribe was the most numerous of all others, except Judah; as the foregoing chapter shews, (ver. 39.) with whom the tribes of Asher and Naphtali are fitly joined, being descended from handmaids also.

Ver. 31. All that were numbered in the camp of Dan were a hundred and fifty-seven thousand, &c.] This was the greatest body of men, except that under the standard of Judah, who marched in the front; and is the reason, perhaps, why these are ordered here, in the next words, to bring up the rear.

They shall go hindmost with their standards.] Here the standard comprehends ensigns; for there was but one standard for this camp, as there were no more for the other three: therefore the meaning is, they shall march hindermost under their several colours, as we now speak; which was ordered for the greater security of the sanctuary, by the two strongest bodies marching before and behind, where there was the greatest danger.

Ver. 32. These are those which were numbered of the children of Israel by the house of their fathers, &c.] That is, thus were all these persons disposed under their several standards; whose number was taken by Moses and Aaron, with their associates, (chap. i. 44, 45.)

Ver. 33. But the Levites were not numbered among the children of Israel, as the Lord commanded Moses.] And consequently did not belong to any of these standards, being to make another camp by themselves, (chap. i. 47, &c.)

Ver. 34. And the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses.] As they gave in their names when they were to be numbered, (chap. i. 54.) so they now joined together under such standards as God appointed.

So they pitched by their standards, and so they set forward, &c.] Each tribe encamped under the standard that was assigned to them; and they also marched, when they set forward, in such order as is here directed. Some order, no doubt, had been observed before, both when they rested and when they marched, (see Exod. xii. 18.) but it was not so exact and regular as this form, into which they were now cast by God himself, nor can we think it was so strictly observed.

The Jews say that this camp made a square of twelve miles in compass about the tabernacle; as Dr. Lightfoot hath observed, in his Cent. Chorogr. cxlviii. and J. Wagenseil more lately, in his annotations upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 1. sect. 51. where several of them say, that the camp was three parasots in compass: and a parasot was four miles.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THESE are the generations of Aaron and Moses.] Being now to give an account of the Levites, who had not been numbered with the rest of the children of Israel, he sets down the descendants of the principal persons among them; viz. Aaron (whom he puts in the first place, because he was the eldest brother, and his posterity were advanced to the dignity of priests) and Moses; whose posterity were only ministers to the priests, as all the common Levites were. It may seem, indeed, at first sight, as if he gave an account only of Aaron's posterity; (ver. 2.) but if we look further to ver. 27, 28. we shall find the posterity of both here numbered in the family of the Amramites, of which both Aaron and Moses were: Amram being their father; from whom the genealogy of the children of Moses is derived, (1 Chron. xxiii. 13, 14, &c.) through their generations; as here those of Aaron.

Concerning the word generations, see Dr. Hammond on the first of St. Matthew, note a.

In the day that the Lord spake unto Moses in Mount Sinai.] This circumstance seems to be particularly specified, because at that time Nadab and Abihu (who are mentioned in the next verse) were both alive, and very eminent persons, (Exod. xxiv. 1. 9, 10.) though they were now dead, at this numbering of the Levites.

Ver. 2. These are the names of the sons of Aaron, Nadab the first-born, &c.] There seems no necessity of setting down the names of Aaron's sons, they not being here to be numbered. But it was of great concernment to have the distinction preserved between the priests and the Levites, their offices being very different; and therefore Moses here sets down who belonged to the one, and who to the other.

Ver. 3. These are the names of the sons of Aaron, the priests which were anointed.] See Levit. viii. 30.

Which he consecrated.] In the Hebrew, whose hand he filled. (See Exod. xxviii. 41. and xxix. 9.)

To minister in the priest's office.] He would have it noted, that Aaron's posterity were solemnly consecrated to a higher office than the rest of the tribe of Levi, who were to be their servants: the very name of cohen carries dignity in it; signifying sometimes a prince, as well as a priest. Accordingly, the priests had very little servile work imposed upon them; but their chief business was to draw near to God, to present him with the blood, and the fat, and some part of the sacrifices which might be killed by other persons. This shews that they were God's familiars; insomuch that some sacrifices were divided between him and them: and it was the same thing, whether they were consumed on the altar, or eaten by the priests: and those things are said to be given to God which were put into their hands, though they never came to the altar: which is an evidence of the near relation they had to the Divine Majesty, which the Levites had not; for they could not come nigh to offer any thing to him, no more than the rest of the Israelites but were employed in inferior service about the tabernacle, that the priests might wholly attend to the service of God at the altar.

Ver. 4. And Nadab and Abihu died before the Lord, &c.] A little after their consecration, (Lev. x. 1, &c.)

And they had no children.] Which is here recorded, that all posterity might know there were none to be admitted to the office of priesthood, but such as could derive their genealogy from Eleazar or Ithamar. If the other had left any sons, they would have inherited their father's office before Eleazar; as Maimonides observes out of Siphre: (see Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. vi. Theor. xx.)

And Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the priest's office, in the sight of their father.] The LXX. rightly translate it, together with their father, who was the high-priest, and they lower priests under him: and so were all their sons; which it is likely they had in good number: for they are appointed, (ver. 38.) for the guard of the tabernacle towards the east. And thus the Gemara Hierosol. in the title concerning Fasting, saith, that Moses appointed eight classes of priests: four of the family of Eleazar, and as many of Ithamar; which continued till the time of Samuel the prophet, and David, who admitted many more: (see Selden de Success. in Pontif. cap. 1.)

Ver. 5. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Now he gives order about the rest of the tribe of Levi, who had been omitted in the late muster.

Ver. 6. Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them.] They had consecrated themselves to God by a noble act, mentioned Exod. xxxii. 29. which procured them this blessing, to be presented to God, and consecrated to him in a solemn manner, for such services as he should assign them. So this word, bring near, signifies to offer them unto God: as they were, chap. viii. 10, 11.

Before Aaron the priest.] In his presence.

That they may minister unto him.] Unto Aaron and the rest of the priests, who were the immediate ministers of God; and the Levites were given to minister unto them: which they did many ways; especially while they remained in the wilderness, where they had a peculiar charge (which otherwise would have been incumbent on the priests), not only to guard the tabernacle, and keep a watch night and day about it; but also to take it down, and to carry it, when they removed, and to set it up again when they rested; as we read in the following part of this chapter, and in the next. When they came into the land of Canaan, and were settled there, they had less to do of this kind: but as the charge of the tabernacle still lay upon them, as it had done before, so did other works in the courts of the Lord's house, and in the chambers where they waited on the priests; which are particularly mentioned in 1 Chron. xxiii. 28, 29, &c. And in David's time their work was still more increased; for he appointed them to be singers in the house of the Lord, and to play upon several sorts of instruments, (1 Chron. xxv.) which they did morning and evening, (1 Chron. xxiii. 30.) Porters, perhaps, there were before, who stood at the several gates of the tabernacle, as afterward of the temple; and are said therein "to minister in the house of the Lord," (1 Chron. xxvi. 12.) as also guards of the treasury of God's house, and of things dedicated to him, (ver. 20.) But as he increased the number of them, so he settled them in their courses, that there might be a constant attendance with greater ease. As for those of them that were made judges and officers, not only in matters concerning the Lord, but in the service of the king, (as we read there, 1 Chron. xxvi. 29, 30.) it no more belongs to what is said of them here, than what follows there, (ver. 31.) that "there were found among them mighty men of valour." (See upon ver. 10.)

Ver. 7. And they shall keep his charge, and the charge of the whole congregation.] It highly concerned Aaron in particular, and the whole congregation in general, that the tabernacle should be well guarded: and this was the Levites' great business at present; who took this charge from off their hands, by attending that service, which all of them were bound to perform.

Before the tabernacle of the congregation.] This exactly expresses in what their ministry consisted; which was not performed in the tabernacle (where the priests only officiated in the holy place, as the high-priest in the most holy), but before it, in the external part of it, where they assisted the priests in their service.

To do the service of the tabernacle.] Such service as I have mentioned before, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 8. And they shall keep.] By guarding them, and keeping a continual watch about them.

All the instruments of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Every thing belonging to it.

And the charge of the children of Israel, to do the service of the tabernacle.] By which service at the tabernacle they took upon them the charge; which otherwise was incumbent on the whole congregation, who were to take care that the holy things were kept both safe and secure, and also separate to the sacred uses to which they were appointed.

These words, which are often repeated, [to do the service of the tabernacle,] are to be carefully noted; because the Levites did not serve in the tabernacle (which belonged only to the priests), but served the tabernacle, by guarding it, and taking it down, and carrying it, &c. as was said before.

Ver. 9. And thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons.] They were first presented unto God, (ver. 6.) and God bestowed them as a gift upon the priests. (See chap. viii. 19.)

They are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel.] To attend upon the priests, and to obey their orders; for which they paid them nothing, but they were to do it freely, being given to them to be their servants by God, who paid them their wages.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on their priest's office.] Or, thou shalt appoint them to wait on their priesthood: which he had shewn before was very different from the Levitical office; but, to make them more mindful of their dignity, he repeats it again; that Aaron and his sons alone should officiate as priests, viz. in offering sacrifice; in setting the bread upon the holy table; looking after the lights, and burning incense; which they were to perform in their own persons, and not appoint any others, as their deputies, to do them: for none of these things could be performed by the Levites, whose business it was to look after the fine flour of which the bread was made; to prepare it, and the frankincense which was to be burnt; and abundance of such-like things, which are particularly mentioned, 1 Chron. ix. 27—29. 31, 32. But they could not make the anointing oil, or the sweet perfume, mentioned Exod. xxx. 23. 34. for they were most holy; and, therefore, the priests only could compound them.

And the stranger that cometh nigh.] By stranger is meant any one (though a Levite) that was not of the sons of Aaron, who alone had the privilege to approach unto God.

Shall be put to death.] God himself sent out a fire to consume Korah and his company, who presumed to offer incense, being but bare Levites, and not priests, (chap. xvi.)

Ver. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] To make the matter more clear, he further tells Moses the reason, why he took the Levites from among the children of Israel to be his after a peculiar manner.

Ver. 12. And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel.] Take notice of the reason why I have taken the Levites from among the rest of the Israelites, (ver. 9.) for it is by my order and appointment.

Instead of all the first-born that openeth the matrix, &c.] To make an exchange with them for all their first-born, which I have heretofore challenged as my own, and now take the Levites in their stead.

Therefore the Levites shall be mine.] As all the first-born were, which now shall be theirs, and the Levites be mine.

Ver. 13. Because all the first-born are mine.] By a special right, which is mentioned in the next words.

For on the day that I smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt.] The title whereby he laid a claim to all the first-born was, that great miracle (as R. Levi of Barcelona calls it) which he wrought, when he destroyed all the first-born of their neighbours in Egypt, and touched not one of theirs. By which sparing mercy he acquired a just right to them; and by that solemn dedication which he then commanded to be made of them unto his uses, (Exod. xiii. 2. 12, 13.)

I hallowed unto me all the first-born in Israel, &c.] He separated them unto himself, by sparing them, when he killed all other first-born, but only theirs.

Mine they shall be.] Both by that act of his own, and by the act of the children of Israel, whom he commanded to sanctify them to him, (Exod. xiii. 2. and xxii. 29.) they became God's. By which it appears, that he had not a peculiar right in the first-born, more than in any other of their children, till their coming out of Egypt. And therefore, the taking of the Levites to be his, instead of the first-born, is no argument that the first-born had hitherto been the priests who ministered unto God, till this exchange of them for the Levites. So our learned Dr. Lightfoot seems to infer, in his notes upon this passage; "The first-born (saith he) had been priests till the consecration of the Levites; but now that function must be confined to that tribe." In which words (with due respect be it spoken to that excellent man's labours) there are several mistakes. For, as the priesthood was not now confined to this tribe, but to one family in this tribe (that of Aaron), so it was not confined to it upon this occasion; but he and his sons were consecrated before this exchange of the Levites for the first-born, who were now given to minister unto them, but had nothing to do with the priesthood; no more than the first-born had, for whom they were exchanged; that peculiar right which God had in the first-born being since their coming out of Egypt. Upon all which considerations, we may look upon this exchange as an argument rather that the first-born were not priests in former times than that they were: as the Jews fancy, and as many have suggested from this very taking of the Levites to be God's portion in their stead. For so Menochius himself (lib. ii. de Repub. Jud. cap. 1.) asserts from this very place, "Jus sacerdotum in Levitas translatum, et eos loco primogenitorum acceptos, quibus hoc jus debebatur," that the right of priests was transferred to the Levites, and they were accepted instead of the first-born, to whom that right belonged. In which there is not a word of truth, but only that the Levites were accepted instead of the first-born; who had the same right to the priesthood that the Levites had; that is, none at all.

I am the Lord.] Who may take whom I please to be employed in my service; and think it reasonable that those whom I spared, when I slew the Egyptian first-born, should be mine.

Ver. 14. And the Lord spake unto Moses.] There was some reason, no doubt, why Moses alone is commanded to take the number of the Levites upon this occasion, (as he alone did, ver. 16.) when Aaron is joined with him in numbering the Israelites, (chap. i. 3.) and in numbering the Levites themselves who were fit for service, (chap. iv. 2. 41. 45.) nay, the chief of the Israelites assisted therein, (ver. 46.) And it is most probable he alone was employed to take this account, because Aaron was a party in it; the money that was to be paid for so many of the first-born, as exceeded the number of the Levites, being given to him and to his sons, (ver. 48.)

In the wilderness of Sinai.] This command immediately followed the other, in the two preceding chapters, before they departed from the wilderness of Sinai; where they had been ever since God delivered the law to them from that mountain.

Ver. 15. Number the children of Levi, after the house of their fathers, by their families.] Just as they had numbered the rest of the children of Israel. (See chap. i. 2.) Only those they numbered from twenty years old and upward; but the Levites from a month old and upward.

Every male from a month old and upward shalt thou number them.] The reason of this difference was, that this was the age at which they were to redeem their first-born, (chap. xviii. 16.) in whose stead the Levites were to be given unto God. (See ver. 40. of this chapter.)

Ver. 16. And Moses numbered them according to the word of the Lord, &c.] This charge was committed to him alone, (ver. 10.) and he alone (as I there observed) performed it.

Ver. 17. And these were the sons of Levi, by their names, Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari.] The same account we had before, (Gen. xlvi. 11. Exod. vi. 16.)

Ver. 18. And these are the names of the sons of Gershon, by their families, Libni and Shimei.] The same is said Exod. vi. 17.

Ver. 19. And the names of the sons of Kohath, &c.] They are mentioned in the same order, in Exod. vi. 18, 19.

Ver. 20. These are the families of the Levites, according to the house of their fathers.] These were the principal families in this tribe; from whence the several households, and the persons in them, were derived.

Ver. 21, 22. Of Gershon was the family, &c.] From his two sons sprung two families; who had in them seven thousand and five hundred male children, from a month old and upward.

Ver. 23. And the families of the Gershonites shall pitch behind the tabernacle westward.] Where the most holy place was; and where they under the standard of Ephraim lay, in the great camp of Israel, (chap. ii. 18.) between whom and the tabernacle this part of the camp of Levi pitched.

Ver. 24. And the chief of the house of the father of the Gershonites, &c.] The commander-in-chief, as we may style him, or the principal officer in this part of the camp of the Levites, was Eliasaph the son of Lael; but of what family he was, whether of the Libnites or Shimites, is not related.

Ver. 25. And the charge of the sons of Gershon.] That which was committed peculiarly to their care.

In the tabernacle of the congregation.] In the things belonging to the tabernacle; for none went into it but the priests alone.

Shall be the tabernacle.] Not the boards, and pillars, and bases of it, (for they belonged to the care of the sons of Merari, ver. 36.) but the ten curtains, which were the inward hangings of it, and are called the mischan, or tabernacle, (Exod. xxvi. 1. and see the next chapter of this book, ver. 25.)

And the tent.] The outward curtains of goats' hair, which are called ohel, the tent, (Exod. xxvi. 7. 12.)

The covering thereof.] The michse, as the Hebrews call it, or the covering of the tent, were the rams' skins and badgers' skins, which lay outmost of all, upon the curtains of goats' hair, (Exod. xxvi. 14.)

And the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] The outward veil, mentioned Exod. xxvi. 36. for the inward veil, which hung before the most holy place, was the charge of the Kohathites.

Ver. 26. And the hangings of the court.] See Exod. xxvii. 9.

And the curtain for the door of the court.] Exod. xxvi. 16.

Which is by the tabernacle, and by the altar round about.] Or, as the Hebrew particle al may be translated, is over, or upon the tabernacle, &c. that is, this curtain at the door and the hangings of the court compassed the tabernacle, and the altar of burnt-offerings (which stood at the door of it, Exod. xl. 19.) round about; so that they were not exposed to common sight: for these Gershonites had nothing to do with the altar itself, which was the charge of the Kohathites, (ver. 31.)

And the cords of it.] This seems to refer, not merely to the curtain for the door of the court, but to all that went before, viz. the cords whereby those hangings were stretched out, and fastened by pins to the wood-work of the tabernacle: for the cords of that belonged to the custody of the sons of Merari, (ver. 37.) and we find pins and cords, as well for the tabernacle (that is, the hangings) as for the court, i. e. the boards, &c. (Exod. xxxv. 18.)

For all the service thereof.] Of this part of the house of God, as appears from ver. 31. and 36. where this is repeated with respect to the other parts of it.

Ver. 27. And of Kohath was the family of the Amramites, &c.] He was the second son of Levi, and had as many more families sprung from him as from the eldest; among which was the family of the Amramites, of which were Moses and Aaron.

Ver. 28. In the number of all the males, &c.] Though there were four families of the Kohathites, and but two of the Gershonites, yet the latter were as numerous as they, within eleven hundred.

Keeping the charge of the sanctuary.] Of what belonged to the holy place, which was committed to their charge, as it follows afterward; and they were instructed in it betimes.

Ver. 29. The families of the sons of Kohath shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle southward.] Between the tabernacle and the standard of Reuben, (chap. ii. 10.)

Ver. 30. And the chief of the house of the father of the families of the Kohathites shall be Elizaphan the son of Uzziel.] There was a commander-in-chief appointed over this body of the Levites, who was chosen out of the youngest family of the Kohathites. But it is observable, there were no standards belonging to any of these bodies, they being designed for other service, and not for war.

Ver. 31. And their charge shall be the ark, and the table, and the candlestick.] The sanctuary, as was said before, (ver. 28.) being committed to their custody, the particulars are here mentioned, which were the most precious of all the holy things, with which the Kohathites had the honour to be entrusted, though a younger family than those descended from Gershon, because Moses and Aaron were of it, being of the family of the Amramites; which is the reason why the Kohathites are reckoned first in the next chapter; (ver. 2.) and that of the forty-eight cities given to the Levites by Joshua, almost half of them fell to their families, (Josh. xxi. 4, 5.)

The altars.] Both the altar of burnt-offerings and the altar of incense.

And the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they (i. e. the priests) minister.] See Exod. xxv. 29. xxxvii. 16.

And the hanging.] That is, the veil before the most holy place, for all other hangings were under the care of the Gershonites, (ver. 25. 26.) wherein the ark was wrapped, when they carried it, (chap. iv. 5.)

And all the service thereof.] Whatsoever belonged to this part of God's house: (see ver. 26.) and the particulars are mentioned in the next chapter, ver. 7. 9. 14.

Ver. 32. And Eleazar, the son of Aaron, shall be chief over the chief of the Levites.] There was one officer in chief set over each of these great families; of the Gershonites (ver. 24.) of the Kohathites, (ver. 30.) and the Merarites, (ver. 35.) And over all these chiefs there is now appointed a supreme chief (who was to govern them as they governed those under them), and that was Eleazar, who was more than a Levite, being the eldest son of Aaron, the high priest.

And have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary.] But, more particularly, Eleazar was to supervise those that had the sanctuary under their care; that is, all the Kohathites and Elizaphan their chief, (ver. 20.)

Ver. 33, 34.] Of Merari was the family of the Mahlites, and the family of the Mushites, &c.] Nothing is observable of these, but that they were the fewest in number, being thirteen hundred less than the children of Gershon, (see ver. 22.)

Ver. 35. These shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle northward.] Opposite to the Kohathites, between the standard of Dan and the sanctuary, (chap. ii. 25.)

Ver. 36. And under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari, shall be the boards of the tabernacle, &c.] Concerning all the things mentioned in this, and in the next verse, see Exod. xxvi. 15, 16, &c. xxvii. 10—12, &c. and the next chapter of this book, ver. 31, 32.

Ver. 37. And their cords.] These are different from those beforementioned, ver. 27. as I noted there.

Ver. 38. But those that encamp before the tabernacle towards the east.] Where the entrance into it was.

Even before the tabernacle of the congregation eastward.] He would have this station observed, as much excelling the rest.

Shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons.] There were but three bodies of the Levites, descended from the three sons of Levi, (ver. 1.) and therefore none left to guard this side of the tabernacle, but Moses and Aaron, and their families; who lay between the standard of Judah and the tabernacle, (see chap. ii. ver. 3.) which was the most honourable post, as I there noted: where the priests were with great reason placed, together with the chief governor of all, Moses; because they were to guard the holy place, that none might go into it but themselves.

Keeping the charge of the sanctuary.] Of the entrance into it.

For the charge of the children of Israel.] Which it concerned every one of the children of Israel should be kept sacred: (see ver. 7.)

And the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.] No man that was not of the house of Aaron (though a Levite) was, upon the peril of his life, to enter into the sanctuary: of which they had the charge: (see ver. 10.)

Ver. 39. All that were numbered of the Levites, which

Moses and Aaron numbered, at the commandment of the Lord.] This looks like a contradiction to the observation I made, ver. 14. 16. But Aaron's numbering here, in all probability, is only agreeing that this was a true account which Moses took of the tribe of Levi. For Moses still continues to be alone concerned in numbering the first-born of the children of Israel, for whom they were to be exchanged, (ver. 40. 42.)

Were twenty and two thousand.] If the particular sums beforementioned (ver. 22. 28. 34.) be put together, they amount to three hundred more than twenty-two thousand. Therefore it is a reasonable conjecture, that the three hundred are omitted in this account, because they were the first-born of the Levites themselves; and upon that score belonging to God already, (by the law in Exod. xiii. 2. xxxiv. 20.) could not be exchanged for the first-born of other tribes, and substituted in their stead, as other Levites were. It is very observable here also, that the Levites were the fewest in number of any tribe; being but two-and-twenty thousand three hundred, from a month old and upward: when some tribes were twice, nay thrice as many, (see chap. i. 27.) not reckoning children, but only men from twenty years old and upward. In which the Divine Providence was very conspicuous, which so ordered it, that this whole tribe might be dedicated to him; whereas, if it had grown proportionably to the rest, there would have been more Levites by far than the first-born of all the tribes.

Ver. 40. And the Lord said unto Moses.] To whom alone this command is directed, as I observed above.

Number all the first-born of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward.] The first-born males were to be a month old, before their parents were bound to redeem them: if they died before, they were not to pay any thing for them. Which depends upon another law, Lev. xii. 4. 6. where if a woman brought forth a male, besides the seven days of her separation, she was to stay three-and-thirty days more before she went unto the sanctuary: at which time the child being to be presented to God, it appears that he acknowledged them for his when they were a month old. Yet they distinguish between the time when the redemption money was due, and when it was offered. This latter was deferred till the mother was abroad again: but it was due, and the father obliged to pay it, as soon as the child was a month old. So Const. L'Empereur observes out of Maimonides, upon Bava kama, cap. vii. sect. 6.

And take the number of their names.] That their number, and that of the Levites, might be compared one with the other; for the reason which here follows.

Ver. 41. And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the Lord), instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel.] God had taken them before, as we read, ver. 12. by declaring his will to Moses about it. And now he commands Moses to declare his will to the people, and actually to make this exchange; after he had taken the number, both of the first-born and of the Levites. For he had authority to take which he pleased, being their Lord.

And the cattle of the Levites, instead of all the firstlings among the cattle of the children of Israel.] Not that they should be sacrificed, or taken from the Levites; but that they should be accounted God's cattle; they being the cattle of the Levites, who were his entirely: and therefore were presented unto him, as the Levites were; but still continued in their possession by his allowance, for their encouragement in his service: (see ver. 45.)

Ver. 42. And Moses numbered as the Lord commanded him all the first-born of the children of Israel.] But we do not find that he numbered the firstlings of their cattle, or the cattle of the Levites; because the exchange of them was not made in particular, by substituting one for one; but generally, by substituting all the cattle of the Levites, instead of all the firstlings of the Israelites' cattle.

Ver. 43. And all the first-born males, by the number of names, &c. and were twenty and two thousand two hundred and threescore and thirteen.] It may appear something strange, that, from above six hundred thousand men, (reckoning from twenty years old and upward, chap. i. 46.) there should not be more than this number of first-born sons; till it be considered, that thus many were born since the slaughter of the Egyptian first-born (which was not much above a year ago), after which time all the first-born of Israel became God's; but not those that were born before: for so the law is, Exod. xiii. 2. Whatsoever openeth the womb, (i. e. hereafter) both of man and beast, shall be mine.

Ver. 44. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Still he is the person solely employed in this business.

Ver. 45. Take the Levites instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel, and the cattle of the Levites instead of their cattle.] Having numbered both the Levites and the first-born, now he bids him take those two-and-twenty thousand Levites instead of so many first-born. As for the cattle, they were not numbered, as I observed before, but exchanged in the lump, as we speak.

And the Levites shall be mine.] I think it is remarkable that he doth not add, and their cattle shall be mine also. For he did not take their cattle from them when they became his; but left them the use of them, who still enjoyed them in his right.

I am the Lord.] This exchange is made by my authority, who am the Lord, both of them and all they have.

Ver. 46. And for those that are to be redeemed of the two hundred and threescore and thirteen, &c.] There being two hundred threescore and thirteen first-born more than there were Levites, they are directed, in the next verse, what to do about them. For there could be no exchange of Levites for them, because there was not a sufficient number to be taken in their stead.

Ver. 47. Thou shalt even take five shekels a-piece by the poll.] This was the price of redemption ever after, as appears from chap. xviii. 16. For it had been lately constituted the value of a man-child, from a month to five years old, in Levit. xxvii. 6.

After the shekel of the sanctuary, &c.] See Exod. xxx. 13, &c. The only difficulty in this matter was, to determine which of the first-born should be redeemed by paying this money, and which should be exchanged for the Levites. For every one of the Israelites, no doubt, was desirous rather to have his first-born redeemed by a Levite, than by paying five shekels; and yet some of them must be put to this expense, there not being Levites enough to answer for them all. The Jews think (particularly R. Solomon) that there was no way to satisfy this doubt like that by drawing of lots, which was done in this manner. Moses, saith the forenamed doctor, took two-and-twenty thousand scrolls of parchment, and wrote in them these words, a son of Levi; and two hundred and seventy and three more, wherein he wrote five shekels; and then putting them all together in an urn, and shaking it to mingle them, he commanded every one of the first-born to come, and put in his hand, and draw out a schedule: and to him that drew out one of the former sort, he said, a Levite hath redeemed thee; but to him that drew out one of the latter, he said, pay thy price. And thus they tell the story also in the Gemara Babylon. Tit. Sanhedrin, which is probable enough; unless we suppose the congregation to have redeemed the two hundred seventy-three first-born out of a common stock; which was a shorter way, but not so Divine as the other.

Ver. 48. And thou shalt give the money, wherewith the odd number of them is to be redeemed, unto Aaron, and to his sons.] Which was but reasonable; because the Levites being given to them by God, (ver. 6, 7.) the money that was paid to make up what was wanting in their proportion to the first-born belonged to them likewise.

Ver. 49. And Moses took the redemption-money of them that were over and above.] To whom the lot fell, having five shekels written upon it.

Them that were redeemed by the Levites.] The first-born were redeemed by the Levites as far as their number would reach; the rest, who were more than the Levites, were redeemed by money.

Ver. 50. Of the first-born of the children of Israel took he the money, a thousand three hundred and threescore and five shekels.] Five times two hundred seventy and three make just this number.

Ver. 51. And Moses gave the money of them that were redeemed unto Aaron, and to his sons.] Which was a rule observed in future generations, (chap. xviii. 15, &c.)

According to the word of the Lord, as the Lord commanded Moses.] This is so oft repeated, to shew how faithful a servant Moses was; who did nothing but by the Divine order, and omitted nothing that was commanded him.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying.] They being both of them concerned to see this carefully executed, he speaks to both; and they took others to their assistance, (ver. 34. 46.)

Ver. 2. Take the sum of the sons of Kohath, &c.] They are first mentioned, being employed in the most honourable work; as I observed before, (chap. iii. 31.)

Ver. 3. From thirty years old and upward.] In this work, to which they are appointed, they were not employed till they came to thirty years of age; but they were admitted to attend at the tabernacle, and do other service, at the age of five-and-twenty; as we read, chap. viii. ver. 25. Which place the Jews (in the Gemara Babylonica upon the title Cholin) reconcile with this, after this manner: they were admitted to learn their duty at five-and-twenty, and to minister at thirty. And so Aben Ezra upon Numb. viii. They were probationers, and might do some service at five-and-twenty years old, but not do all: for they might wait upon the tabernacle, but not bear the ark. And that is the exact truth; they were admitted to minister to the priests at five-and-twenty, but were not put upon this laborious work here mentioned, till they had sufficient strength for it; which was at thirty years of age, when they were able to carry burdens; for by that word their work is described, (ver. 15. 19. 24. 31. 47.) For though some things, which they were charged withal, might be put into waggons, yet the ark and the most holy things were to be carried upon their shoulders, though they marched never so far, (ver. 15. and vii. 9.) When the ark, indeed, was settled in the temple, which was a fixed place, and therefore was no longer to be carried up and down, then (as D. Kimchi observes upon 1 Chron. xxiii.) king David appointed them to enter upon their office at twenty years old; there being also other great work to be performed in his time, for which they were fit at that age. And so it continued even after their return from the captivity at Babylon, Ezra iii. 8. (See Selden de Success. in Pontificat. lib. ii. cap. 4. and Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. vi. sect. 1.)

Even until fifty years old.] Beyond which age they were not bound to do any service, but only to minister with their brethren at the tabernacle, (chap. viii. 25, 26.)

All that enter into the host.] Or, into the warfare. For their watching continually, as a guard, about the tabernacle, (chap. iii. 7, &c.) made them a sort of militia, who were encamped, as appears by the foregoing chapter, about the tabernacle for its security. Besides which, there was other work which might make their service as laborious as a soldier's life is, and give it the name of entering into the host; which manner of speaking St. Paul uses unto Timothy, 1 Tim. i. 18. where he exhorts him to war a good warfare.

To do the work of the tabernacle of the congregation.] They did not perform any work in it, but about it (such as here follows), unless we understand by the tabernacle, the outward court, into which they went to minister unto the priests.

Ver. 4. This shall be the service of the sons of Kohath, in the tabernacle of the congregation, about the most holy things.] The next verses explain what this service was: or, if the word about (in the latter end of the verse) were quite left out, the sense would be more clear; this shall be the service of the sons of Kohath, &c. the most holy things; that is, the ark, as Aben Ezra expounds it. And his interpretation may be justified from ver. 19, 20. in the latter of which it is called the holy, and in the former the holy of holies; as it is here in the Hebrew: for it was the most holy of all other holy things in the tabernacle; and gave the name to the place where it stood, of holy of holies, or the most holy place. And this made the service of the Kohathites the most honourable of all other, and is the reason they are mentioned first.

Ver. 5. When the camp setteth forward.] Which it did not do till the cloud was taken up, and removed from off the tabernacle, (Exod. xl. 36, 37. Numb. x. 11.)

Aaron shall come, and his sons.] While the cloud rested upon the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord filled the house, none but Aaron might come into the most holy place where the ark was, and that but on one day in the year; and then, after he had filled it with incense, which made a cloud before the mercy-seat (which was the covering of the ark), over which the Schechinah was. But that being removed in the cloud, when it was taken up from the tabernacle; not only Aaron, but his sons also might come into the most holy place, without any irreverence; that which made it so holy (viz. the glory of the Lord) being gone out of it for the present; so that there was no danger in approaching to the ark where it was wont to rest.

And they shall take down the covering veil.] Whereby the holy place was parted from the most holy; which is always meant by the word parocheth, (as I shewed upon Exod. xxvi. 31.) which is here used: and though the word masach be added to it, which constantly signifies the outward veil at the entrance of the sanctuary; yet it is plain that the inward veil, which was at the entrance of the most holy place is here intended: for the other was committed to the care of the Gershonites, (ver. 25.)

And cover the ark of the testimony with it.] By this it is evident they went into the holy place, unto the very ark, over which they threw this covering.

Ver. 6. And shall put thereon the covering of badgers' skins.] Not any of those wherewith the tabernacle was covered, (Exod. xxvi. 14.) but a covering made on purpose for this use, to defend the ark from the injury of the weather when they carried it on their shoulders.

And shall spread over it a cloth wholly of blue.] Or, of perfect blue. This was the third covering of the ark; which, till it was laid upon it, the Levites might not approach it. And since the tabernacle was the image of things in the heavens (as not only the apostle, but the Jews themselves say), the ark in particular being a figure of the celestial throne of God; it is not an unreasonable conceit of R. Bechai, that this blue-coloured cloth was spread over it as an emblem of the skies, which are spread like a curtain between us and the Majesty on high.

And shall put in the staves thereof.] It is not said they shall put them in the rings; for they were never to be taken out of them, (Exod. xxv. 15.) Nor do the Hebrew words signify that they should put them in; but it should be translated, put the staves thereof, that is, upon their shoulders. So Aben Ezra interprets it; which seems to me the most simple exposition: or, fit and dispose them, under the covering, that they might be laid on their shoulders: or, order them so in the rings (which is Chuskuni's explication), that they might fall into the two notches, which were in the staves, to keep the ark from sliding up and down.

Ver. 7. And upon the table of shew-bread they shall spread a cloth of blue.] It is not said wholly of blue, as it is of the former; which shews it was of something a different colour.

And put thereon the dishes.] Upon which the bread was set.

And the spoons and bowls, &c.] See Exod. xxv. 29.

And the continual bread.] i. e. The bread which stood continually in the presence of God.

Shall be thereon.] Even when the table was carried from place to place; which shews that they provided this bread, (according to the order, Exod. xxv. 30.) all the time they were in the wilderness. And it was not hard to procure so much corn from their neighbours, bordering upon the wilderness, as would be sufficient for this purpose, and for others, which I shall note in their proper places; particularly from the land of Midian, where Moses's father-in-law lived; which was not far from Sinai, (as appears from Exod. iii. 1.) where they were at present.

Ver. 8. And they shall spread upon them a cloth of scarlet, and cover the same with a covering of badgers' skins.] These had a triple covering, as well as the ark; being holy things, and having a holy thing (that is, the bread of the presence, as it is called in the Hebrew, because it stood before God continually) in the dishes upon the table.

And shall put in the staves thereof.] That it might be ready to be carried, (Exod. xxv. 27, 28.)

Ver. 9. And they shall take a cloth of blue.] Like that which covered the table, (ver. 7.)

And cover the candlestick of the light.] See Exod. xxv. 31. and xxxvii. 17, &c.

And his lamps, and his tongs, &c.] Exod. xxv. 37, 38, and xxxvii. 23.

And all the oil-vessels thereof.] For God commanded them to bring pure oil to feed the lamps continually, (Exod. xxvii. 20.) which was put, no doubt, in vessels, to preserve it for daily use.

With which they minister unto it.] With which oil they keep the lamps continually burning.

Ver. 10. And they shall put it, and all the vessels thereof, within a covering of badgers' skins.] There were but two coverings for the candlestick and its vessels, it being of lesser value than the table of shew-bread, and what belonged to it.

And shall put it upon a bar.] Rather upon a bier; for the word we here translate bar, is different from that used before, (ver. 6. 8.) which we translate staves; and signifies any instrument whereby things are removed from one place to another. We translate it indeed a staff, (chap. xiii. 23.) whereon two of them that went to spy out the land carried the cluster of grapes they had cut down: which was laid, no doubt, upon something that was broad; as this bar was whereon they carried the candlestick: which had no rings belonging to it, and therefore, I take it, was carried upon something resembling a bier, on which corpses are carried to their grave in this country: see ver. 12. and so the LXX. ἐπ' ἀναφορέων.

Ver. 11. And upon the golden altar.] So called, because it was overlaid with pure gold, (Exod. xxx. 3.)

They shall spread a cloth of blue, &c.] As they did upon the candlestick, (ver. 9.)

And shall put to the staves thereof.] Into the rings; which were made on purpose, that it might be carried upon the staves, (Exod. xxx. 4, 5.)

Ver. 12. And they shall take all the instruments of the ministry wherewith they minister in the sanctuary.] I do not see what can be meant by these, but the holy garments which Aaron and his sons put on in the time of their ministration. For all other things have been already mentioned; and these are called the clothes of service, Exod. xxxi. 10. where they are immediately mentioned after all the forenamed furniture of the tabernacle.

And shall put them in a cloth of blue, and cover them with a covering of badgers' skins.] As they did the candlestick, and the altar of incense, (ver. 9. 11.)

And put them on a bar.] By this it appears that the Hebrew word mot, which we translate a bar, signifies a broad instrument for carriage; such as I have described ver. 10.

Ver. 13. And they shall take away the ashes from the altar.] Of burnt-offering; which was often cleansed from its ashes, (Lev. vi. 10, 11.) but then especially when it was to be removed. What they did with the fire, which was always to burn upon it, (Lev. vi. 12, 13.) is not here related; but we may suppose that it was carried upon the grate, which had rings on purpose, that it might be carried separate from the altar. (See Exod. xxvii. 4.)

And spread a purple cloth thereon.] As being a holy thing, though not of such sanctity as those beforenamed.

Ver. 14. And they shall put upon it all the vessels thereof, &c.] That they might be carried with it.

The censers, the flesh-hooks, and the shovels, and the basons.] Here the censers are put first, which are mentioned last in Exod. xxvii. 3. where this word is translated fire-pans. Others understand by it, tongs.

All the vessels of the altar.] Immediately after these words, we find there follows, in two places, the laver and his foot, Exod. xxxv. 16. and xxxix. 39. where, in the very same verse, the laver is mentioned with the altar and its vessels: and immediately follows them in two other, Exod. xxxviii. 7, 8. and xl. 30. The reason why it is not mentioned here, is, perhaps, because he names only those things upon which the sons of Aaron were to put a covering; and this, it is likely, was carried without one.

And put to the staves of it.] Exod. xxvii. 6, 7. and xxxviii. 6, 7.

Ver. 15. And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary and all the vessels, &c.] This work was to be performed by them alone; and the Levites were not to meddle with any of these things till they had done.

After that the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it.] For all the forementioned things, belonging to the sanctuary, were to be carried by them, even the ark itself: which they carried so, that all the people might see it went along with them. For the rings being fastened to the bottom of the ark, (see Exod. xxv. 12.) when the staves were on their shoulders it appeared on high: to represent, saith R. Bechai, Him that is most highly exalted over all. The priests, indeed, might carry the ark, being more than Levites, (Deut. xxxi. 9.) and accordingly we find, that, upon extraordinary occasions, they did; as when they went over Jordan, (Josh. iii. 14.) and when Jericho was besieged; (chap. vi. 6.) some think also, when David, as he fled from Absalom, sent the ark back, (2 Sam. xv. 29.) But it appears, from ver. 24. that there is no certainty of that; especially since, when he brought it from the house of Obed-Edom, he not only employed the Levites in it, but declared none else ought to bear it, (1 Chron. xv. 2. 15. 27.) He bade the priests indeed, as well as the Levites, sanctify themselves for this work: for ye (saith he to the priests, ver. 12.) are the chief of the fathers of the Levites: but they seem to have been present, only to see the Levites perform their charge; and to accompany the ark, as David himself did.

But they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die.] Some imagine they were not to touch these things till they were covered by the priests: but it is more likely that even then they were not to touch them, but only the staves, or the bar, whereon they were carried; especially the ark, which is here principally meant by the holy thing (the word any not being in the Hebrew), whose staves only they touched, and lifted it up by putting them upon their shoulders.

These things are the burden of the sons of Kohath, in the tabernacle of the congregation.] When it was removed; for at other times they had nothing to do with these things: which are here called their burden, as, ver. 4. they are called their service, to shew the nature of their service, which required the strength of grown men, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 16. And to the office of Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, pertaineth the oil for the light, &c.] It is commonly thought, that he is required to carry this, and the other things that follow in this verse, himself: but, if all things be considered, it will appear more reasonable to think, that he, who was the chief of all the chiefs over the Levites, (chap. iii. 32.) is peculiarly required to see the Kohathites did their duty: for, though they had a chief over them, whose work it was to inspect them, (chap. iii. 30.) yet God thought good to appoint Eleazar to supervise both him and all under him in these weighty concerns: and so the words may be interpreted out of the Hebrew.

The oversight of Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, shall be the oil, &c. the oversight of all the tabernacle, and of all that is therein, &c.] And there is the greater reason thus to understand it, because the oil-vessels are before committed to the Kohathites, (ver. 9.) and consequently the oil itself; which could not be carried but in the vessels.

The sweet incense.] Mentioned Exod. xxx. 34.

And the daily meat-offering.] See Exod. xxix. 40, 41.

And the anointing oil.] Exod. xxx. 23, &c. These were not named before; but it is here laid upon Eleazar, to see that they were as carefully carried by the Kohathites as any other things belonging to the sanctuary.

Ver. 17. And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying.] The things beforementioned, especially the ark, were so sacred, that he repeats the admonition he had given about the danger of irreverence to it: which he here represents in a frightful manner.

Ver. 18. Cut ye not off.] Do not by your negligence occasion the destruction of a great many persons.

The tribe of the family of the Kohathites from among the Levites.] A considerable part of the tribe of Levi, viz. the family of the Kohathites, who were near a third part of it.

Ver. 19. But do thus for them, that they may live and not die.] Proceed in this manner, to prevent so great a mischief as their destruction.

When they approach unto the most holy things.] Come to take up the ark: which is meant by the holy of holies: (see ver. 4.)

Aaron and his sons shall go in.] And cover the ark, and the rest of the things within the sanctuary; as is before directed.

And appoint them every one to his service, and to his burden.] And then allot to every one his share in this work; that is, to carry such particular things, as they think most proper for them.

Ver. 20. But they shall not go in to see.] They might go in to the most holy place, when not only the glory of the Lord was removed; but the ark and mercy-seat, upon its removal, were covered by the priests (for then the place where they lay covered was no longer holy), but they might not come in to see the priests cover them; which was to be done before they approached.

When the holy things are covered.] In the Hebrew it is in the singular number, when the holy, or holy thing is covered, i. e. the ark, as the Jews generally understand it; and that with great reason, as any one may be satisfied, who will take the pains to compare 1 Kings viii. 8. with 2 Chron. v. 9. Where that which in the former place is called the holy, in the latter is called the ark.

Lest they die.] They might not, under pain of death, either see it when it was covered, or touch it afterward, (ver. 15.) but only carry it in the manner there described.

Ver. 21. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] He was principally concerned in this, but Aaron was also joined with him, to see the execution of what is here required, (ver. 1. 19. 34.)

Ver. 22. Take also the sum of the sons of Gershon, &c.] The eldest son of Levi, (chap. iii. 17.) who, though they were employed in lower services, were to account it an honour to serve about the tabernacle.

Ver. 23. All that enter in to perform the service.] I do not understand why this should not be translated as ver. 2. into the host. For it is the very same phrase in the Hebrew, both here and there: only here more emphatical by doubling the word for host: and therefore may, very properly, be translated in this place, that enter in to war the warfare. For the service of the Gershonites was more burdensome than the former, though they were fewer in number, (ver. 36. 40.)

Ver. 24. This is the service of the families of the Gershonites.] Which were only two, (chap. iii. 18. 21.)

To serve, and for burdens.] To serve, when the tabernacle rested; and to carry burdens, when it removed: (see ver. 47.)

Ver. 25. And shall bear the curtains of the tabernacle.] The ten fine curtains, which were the inward hangings of the tabernacle, (Exod. xxvi. 1, 2, &c.) Which, I suppose, were taken down as well as carried by the Gershonites: because nothing is said here of Aaron or his sons being employed, to make them ready for carriage.

And the tabernacle of the congregation, his covering.] Not the boards of the tabernacle, which were the charge of the children of Merari, (ver. 31.) but the eleven curtains of goats' hair which covered the boards, (see Exod. xxvi. 7, 8, &c.)

And the covering of badgers' skins, which is upon it.] The outward covering of all, which was of rams' skins died red, and badgers' skins (as we translate it, Exod. xxvi. 14.)

And the hanging for the door of the tabernacle.] Which is described, in the conclusion of the same chapter, (Exod. xxvi. 36.)

Ver. 26. And the hangings for the court.] Exod. xxvii. 9, &c.

And the hanging for the gate of the door of the court.] See Exod. xxvii. 16.

Which is by the tabernacle, and the altar round about.] The sense would have been more plain, if the particle al, which we translate by, had been translated upon, or over; for the court encompassed both the tabernacle and the altar, (Exod. xl. 6—8.)

And their cords.] Which were employed in fastening these hangings.

And all the instruments for their service.] The brazen pins, I suppose, mentioned Exod. xxvii. 19.

And all that is made for them.] And whatsoever else belonged to them: (see chap. iii. 26.)

So shall they serve.] Or, in that shall they serve.

Ver. 27. At the appointment of Aaron and his sons shall be all the service of the sons of the Gershonites, &c.] In the Hebrew it is, at the mouth of Aaron, &c. i. e. according to their order, every one of the Gershonites were to apply themselves to such services as they directed: for God had given the Levites to them to be their ministers, and keep their charge, (chap. iii. 6, 7.)

And ye shall appoint unto them in charge all their burdens.] The word here for appoint seems to import, that the priests gave them a particular, as we speak, of what they were to do; that they might neither forget nor mistake; for it is the same word that is used in the beginning of this book (chap. i. 3.) for numbering the people; and so it is used here, ver. 34. 47, 48. Therefore the Vulgar translates these words: "Et sciant singuli cui debeant operi mancipari;" and every man may know what is the proper business of his own calling; not to meddle with other men's, nor to think himself fit to undertake every thing. Ἓν γὰρ ὑφ' ἑνὸς ἔργον ἄριστα ἀποτελεῖται, as Aristotle speaks in his Politics, (lib. iii.) one work is best performed by one person.

Ver. 28. And their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar, the son of Aaron the priest.] That is, under the direction and conduct of Ithamar: for though the Gershonites had a chief of their own, (chap. iii. 24.) yet Ithamar was to inspect both him and them, and see they did not neglect their duty. Thus Eleazar was set over the Kohathites, (ver. 16.)

Ver. 29. As for the sons of Merari, thou shalt number them after their families, &c.] Which were but two, (chap. iii. 33.) as those of Gershon were.

Ver. 30. Every one that entereth into the service.] The words in the Hebrew are the very same with those, ver. 3. which we translate enter into the host. (See there.)

Ver. 31. This is the charge of their burden, &c.] The most cumbersome things fell to their charge; which here follow.

The boards of the tabernacle.] See Exod. xxvi. 15, &c.

And the bars thereof.] See there, ver. 26, &c.

And the pillars thereof.] See in the same place, ver. 32. and xxxvi. 36.

And sockets thereof.] These belonged both to the boards of the tabernacle, (Exod. xxvi. 19. 21. 25.) and to the pillars, (Exod. xxvi. 32. xxxviii. 27.)

Ver. 32. And the pillars of the court round about.] Exod. xxvii. 10—12.

And their sockets.] See there.

And their pins.] Ver. 19. and chap. xxxviii. 20.

And their cords.] Exod. xxxv. 18. xxxix. 40.

By name ye shall reckon the instruments of the charge of their burden.] The priests (particularly Ithamar) were to give them an inventory of these things; expressing by name every pin, for instance, and to what use, and in what place it served; because otherwise such small things might have been lost, if they had not taken a special care of them; and they might not have been able to set up the tabernacle again when they rested for want of them.

Ver. 33. This is the service of the families of the sons of Merari, according to all their service in the tabernacle of the congregation.] In taking down and carrying the tabernacle.

Under the hand of Ithamar, &c.] Who had the oversight both of the Gershonites and the Merarites; as Eleazar had of the Kohathites, (ver. 16. 28.)

Ver. 34. And Moses and Aaron, and the chief of the congregation.] They took to their assistance the very same men, I suppose, who were employed in numbering all the children of Israel, (chap. i. 4. 16, 17.)

Numbered the sons of the Kohathites, &c.] Having assigned to them their particular charge, they now proceed to number them; as God commanded, (ver. 2, 3.)

Ver. 35. Every one that entereth into the service.] Or, as we translate it, (ver. 3.) entereth into the host.

Ver. 36. And those that were numbered of them, by their families, were two thousand seven hundred and fifty.] Of the whole number of males descended from Kohath, (compare this with chap. iii. 28.) there was a fourth part, and better, that were fit for service.

Ver. 37. These were they that were numbered of the families of the Kohathites, all that might do service in the tabernacle.] Such service as is particularly mentioned from ver. 4. to ver. 16.

Ver. 38. And these are they that were numbered of the sons of Gershon, &c.] He proceeds in the same order to number them, which he observed in giving them their charge; beginning with the children of the second son of Levi, and then going back to the eldest.

Ver. 39. From thirty years old and upward, &c.] This verse is the very same with ver. 35.

Ver. 40. Two thousand and six hundred and thirty.] A third part and little more of their males were fit for service. Compare this with chap. iii. 22.

Ver. 41. These are they that were numbered of the families of the sons of Gershon, of all that might do service in the tabernacle, &c.] Such service as is described from ver. 24. to ver. 29.

Ver. 42, 43.] These two verses are the same with ver. 38, 39.

Ver. 44. Even those that were numbered of them, after their families, were three thousand and two hundred.] It is very remarkable, the descendants from the youngest son of Levi, (chap. iii. 17.) which had the fewest males in it of a month old and upward, had the most robust men fit for service: for here are above half (compare this with chap. iii. 34.) of the whole number of males grown up to thirty years of age: which was a singular providence, the heaviest burden laying upon them who were to carry the boards, &c. of the tabernacle; not indeed upon their shoulders, but in waggons; which they were to load after they had taken them down, and unload when they were to set them up again; and for that reason had more waggons allowed them than their brethren the Gershonites, (chap. vii. 7, 8.)

Ver. 45. These are those, &c. whom Moses and Aaron numbered.] Who were principally employed in this business.

According to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.] To whom the command is expressly directed, (ver. 21.)

Ver. 46. All those that were numbered of the Levites, whom Moses and Aaron, and the chief of Israel, numbered.] For they took in others to their assistance, (ver. 34.) which is here repeated, to shew that there was no fraud in the business; there being witnesses of every tribe that they proceeded impartially, and did not favour the Levites, who were their brethren.

Ver. 47. Every one that came to do the service of the ministry, and the service of the burden in the tabernacle, &c.] The first of these [the service of the ministry] one would think related to their serving the priest when the tabernacle was standing; and the latter [the service of the burden] to their carrying the tabernacle when it was taken down, and removed; and so I expounded those words, ver. 24. But he mentioning here only those that were numbered from thirty years old, I think, upon further consideration, that there is no regard in these expressions to the service they did to the priests in the tabernacle, unto which they were admitted at twenty-five years old, (see ver. 3.) but only to the service mentioned here in this chapter, which relates altogether to the taking down and carrying the tabernacle. And therefore these must be looked upon as two phrases for the same thing: the former of which is not exactly translated; for there is nothing of ministry in the Hebrew; but the words are, every one that cometh to serve the service of the service, and the service of the burden, or carriage. For it is the same word, which, being joined with work, we translate servile, (Lev. xxiii. 7. and other places.)

Ver. 48. Eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore.] If the three sums, mentioned ver. 36. 40. 44. be put together, they amount exactly to this sum in the whole.

Ver. 49. According to the commandment of the Lord, they were numbered by the hand of Moses.] By the assistance of Aaron and others, (ver. 1. 34. 36.)

Every one according to his service, and according to his burden.] I observed before, (ver. 47.) that service and burden are two expressions of the same thing. For though the sons of Kohath had the noblest part of the work, yet their employment is called both a service and a burden, ver. 19. as that of the Gershonites is, ver. 24. For which service all the tithes of the country of Canaan were given to them, and continued to be theirs when this kind of service ceased; as it did when the temple was built: for then there were no burdens to be carried on their shoulders, (as Josiah speaks, 2 Chron. xxxv. 3.) but their duty was changed, even by David, before the building of the temple; who made them singers, and keepers of the treasury, as well as porters at the gates of God's house; and likewise judges and other officers in the country; as we read in 1 Chron. xxvi. But the alteration in their service made no alteration in the wages allotted to them; for they still enjoyed all the tithes.

Thus were they numbered of him, as the Lord commanded Moses.] This is so often repeated, (ver. 37. 41. 45.) that all posterity might reverence these ordinances as Divine institutions, and not merely human appointments. And so we are to look upon all these laws, as wise orders made by the Sovereign of the world, for the better government of that people, whom he had taken for his own peculiar. And it argues a very profane spirit in those (as Conr. Pellicanus here observes) who can admire and praise Ovid de Fastis, and such-like books, and have no regard at all (if they do not ridicule them) to these sacred writings, which are of such venerable antiquity.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It is not said when this was spoken which here follows; but it is likely immediately after the foregoing commandments, upon which it hath some dependance.

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel, that they put out of the camp every leper, and every one that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead.] There were three camps, (as Maimonides, and a great many others mentioned by Mr. Selden, observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1. n. 5.) the camp of the Schechinah, or of the Lord, viz. the sanctuary with its courts, which are called the tents of the Lord; (1 Chron. xxxi. 2.) and next the camp of the Levites, who, with Aaron and his sons, made a camp about the tabernacle (chap. iii. of this book), and then the camp of Israel, (chap. ii.) which encompassed them all. Answerable to these, when the temple was built, they reckoned the temple itself from the east gate to be the camp of the Lord; and the camp of the Levites, to be from the entrance of the mount of the house of the Lord to that east gate of the temple; and the camp of Israel they thought extended from the entrance of Jerusalem to the mount of the house of the Lord. Now lepers were so unclean, that they were not admitted into any of these three camps, but shut out of them all: (see Lev. xiii. 46.) But he that had an issue, (Lev. xv. 2.) was only shut out of the two first camps, the camp of the Lord, and the camp of the Levites; but he might be in the camp of Israel. And he that was defiled by the dead, (Lev. xxi. 1.) was only excluded from the first, the sanctuary, but not from the other two: (see Drusius also upon chap. iv. 25.)

Ver. 3. Both male and female shall ye put out.] For women had issues (for instance) as well as men, (Lev. xv. 2. 19, &c.)

That they defile not their camps.] The camp of Israel consisted of four camps (and therefore he speaks in the plural number), that of Judah, that of Reuben, that of Ephraim, and that of Dan, (Numb. ii. 3. 10. 18. 25.) Which would have been so defiled, if they had suffered these unclean persons to stay among them, that none would have been fit to go to the sanctuary.

In the midst of which I dwell.] By his special presence in the sanctuary, which was encompassed by these camps; out of reverence to which, such unclean persons were to be kept at a greater distance than other men and women.

Ver. 4. And the children of Israel did so, and put them without the camp, &c.] There was an order for this before; particularly for putting out the lepers, (Lev. xiii. 46.) which could not be put in execution till the camp was formed, as now it was.

Ver. 5. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It is uncertain when this was spoken; but I see no reason why we should not think it was at the same time with the other things here mentioned.

Ver. 6. When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit.] In the Hebrew the words are plainly these, shall commit any sin of man; that is, against his neighbour: as in Joel iii. 19. violence of the children of Judah, is truly translated, violence against the children of Judah. For it is apparent from the next verses, (7, 8.) that Moses here speaks of offences against their neighbours.

To do a trespass against the Lord.] Such offences against their neighbours as were also great offences against God. For the Chaldee understands these words of frauds and cheats put upon men by a false oath. And there is a good warrant for this interpretation from Lev. vi. 2, 3. where Moses gives the same command: which seems here to be repeated, only because he had something to add unto it, (ver. 8.)

And that person be guilty.] Or rather, be sensible of his guilt, (see Lev. vi. 4.)

Ver. 7. Then they shall confess the sin that they have done.] Or rather, if they shall confess, &c. For so the particle vau sometimes signifies: particularly chap. xii. 14. where we (as well as the LXX.) translate it, if her father had spit in her face: see what I have noted upon Lev. vi. 4.

And he shall recompense, &c.] Rather, then he shall recompense the injury he did to his neighbour, in the manner here directed; which hath been explained, Lev. vi. 5. (see there.)

Ver. 8. But if a man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto.] By this it is apparent, that if a man, to whom an injury had been done, was dead, he that committed it was bound to make satisfaction to his heir, whosoever he was, by restoring the principal, and adding a fifth part to it. Now the Israelites never wanting some of their kindred to succeed to their inheritances, the Hebrew doctors expound this of the proselytes of righteousness; who might possibly die without any heir; because they had no kindred, but such as were born after their regeneration. In which case the goods that had been illegally taken from such a proselyte by a Jew, did not become his own, unless he paid the price of them, with such an addition as is here required, &c. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. p. 684, 685. edit. Lond.)

Let the trespass be recompensed unto the Lord.] By bringing to him the principal and the fifth part.

Even unto the priest.] Whom God deputed to receive it as his minister. And it was (as the Jews rightly expound it) equally distributed among all the priests, who were then waiting in their course. Which is a new addition to the law in Levit. vi. and the reason, it is likely, why that law is here repeated.

Besides the ram of the atonement, &c.] Mentioned Levit. vi. 6, 7. where see what I have noted.

Ver. 9. And every offering of all the holy things of the children of Israel.] Upon the occasion of the foregoing laws concerning a recompence to be made to the priest, where a man that had been wronged was dead, and no heir to him could be found, he explains some other laws wherein the priests were concerned: who were to have all the heave-offerings, as the word trumoth (here used) signifies, (chap. xviii. 8.)

Which they bring unto the priest.] To be offered unto God.

Shall be his.] Who offers it. For there being many priests who waited in their courses at the tabernacle; all of which could not officiate at the same time, but some at one time, some at another; this law determines, that the particular priest who performed the office of sacrificing, should have to himself that part of the holy things which fell to the priest's share; and it should not be divided among them.

all. Thus L'Empereur (upon Bava kama, cap. 9. sect. 12.) expounds these words better than any I have met withal.

Ver. 10. And every man's hallowed thing shall be his.] As the former verse speaks of the holy things of the children of Israel in general, so this, of what any particular person offered: which still with greater reason was to belong to the priest that offered it. For "the labourer is worthy of his hire:" and therefore he that did the work of sacrificing, had the reward of it. R. Solomon applying this to tithes hath a gloss upon these words, which, though not pertinent, is very remarkable: "He that doth not duly pay his tithe, in the end his land shall yield him but a tithe of what it was wont to yield." And so R. Bechai upon Deut. xiv. expounds these words, when a man divideth not as he ought, he shall have nothing but the holy things; that is, the tithe of what he used to have, according to Isa. v. 10.

Whatsoever any man giveth the priest, it shall be his.] These words are only a fuller explication of this law (as the same L'Empereur observes), that the rest of the priests might not take away those holy things from him that offered them, under pretence that they belonged to the whole sacerdotal order. For though they were delivered unto him, yet it was, they might say, that they should be divided among the whole classes then in attendance. So some things were, (ver. 2.) and therefore this law is added to prevent their extending what was done in some cases unto all.

Ver. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] There is so little connexion between this and the foregoing laws, that it is not easy to give a reason why it is here placed. All that I can say is, that Moses having spoken concerning frauds, from the suspicion of which men were to purge themselves, by an oath, (ver. 6.) he here takes occasion to mention the greatest case that could happen of this nature: which was, when a woman was suspected of adultery; concerning which God gave him the following order.

Ver. 12. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man's wife go aside.] Being private, for some time, with another man; whose company her husband had charged her not to keep alone; and therefore is suspected by him to be an adulteress.

For it is certain, that, by a wife that goeth aside (whom the Hebrews from hence call Sota), is not meant one that hath certainly committed adultery; but is, with some reason, suspected of that crime. And therefore it is a rule among the Jews, "The bitter waters never are used but in a dubious case."

And commit a trespass against him.] And thereby hath very much offended him.

Ver. 13. And a man lie with her carnally.] As her husband hath cause to suspect; he having (as I said before) admonished her not to be with such a man in private: that is, to give him no cause of jealousy. So Abarbinel rightly expounds a man's lying with her carnally, of her husband's opinion and suspicion: and the next verse justifies this exposition.

And if it be hid from the eyes of her husband.] There being no clear evidence, but only conjectures, that she is actually defiled.

And be kept close.] The matter having been carried very secretly: or, as it may be interpreted, but she was shut up close with him.

And she be defiled.] In her husband's opinion.

And there be no witness against her.] For if there had, she must have been put to death, (Levit. xx. 10.)

Neither she be taken with the manner.] She not being apprehended in the very act.

Ver. 14. And the spirit of jealousy come upon him.] He be possessed with a strong conceit, of which he cannot rid himself, that she hath been unfaithful to him. For so a spirit of slumber (and the like) is used in Scripture, for such a sluggish temper, as a man cannot shake off.

And he be jealous of his wife, and she be defiled.] Whether it be really so.

And he be jealous, and she be not defiled.] Or whether it be only his suspicion.

Ver. 15. Then shall the man bring his wife unto the priest.] To the magistrates of the place where they lived (saith the Mischna, cap. 1. sect. 3. of Sota), together with his witnesses, both of the premonition he had given her, and of the privacy she had had with another man after his premonition, so long that there might be time enough for him to defile her: otherwise this action did not lie against her, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 13.) But having these witnesses ready, he was to speak to the priest when he brought his wife before him, after this manner; "Having a jealousy of this my wife, I admonished her not to keep company with such an one; with whom she afterward was in secret; and these are the witnesses of it. She saith she is innocent, but I desire the water may be given her, that the truth may be tried." See Selden, in the place beforenamed, (cap. 15.) and Wagenseil upon Sota, (cap. 1. sect. 3. not. 2.)

And he shall bring her oblation for her.] That is, the husband shall bring her oblation (not the priest, as some understand the words of the Mischna about this matter): which Chaskuni fancies was offered, as his oblation, not the woman's; to expiate his fault in not reproving her sufficiently, when he first observed her immodest behaviour: for it could not be a sacrifice for her expiation (saith he), because the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination. But this is against the very words of Moses in this place; which say, he shall bring her oblation for her. And so Abarbinel expounds it, "the Scripture intimates that this sacrifice was brought by the husband for the sake of his wife; for he had done nothing that needed a sacrifice." Nor is Chaskuni's reason of any moment; for there is nothing said to make us look upon this as an expiatory sacrifice; but the true intention of it was (as Wagenseil well observes, Annot. in Mischna Sota, cap. 2. p. 349.) to supplicate the Divine Majesty, that he would be pleased to clear the woman's innocence if she were causelessly suspected; or otherwise discover and punish her guilt.

By this it appears, that if the process was began in some court below (as the Jews affirm), the cause was removed to Jerusalem (where only they could sacrifice when the ark of God's presence was settled there), and brought before the great Sanhedrin: who, putting her husband out of the court (as they say in the next section of the forenamed Mischna), and having the woman alone by herself, endeavoured first by striking a terror into her, and then by giving her good words, to persuade her to tell the truth: saying, "Dear daughter, perhaps thou wast overtaken by drinking too much wine, or wast in a frolic humour, or carried away by the heat of youth, or by the example of evil neighbours:"

come, confess the truth, for the sake of His great name, which is described in the most sacred ceremony; and do not let it be blotted out (ver. 23.) with the bitter water." If, after this, she confessed the fact, saying, I am defiled; then she was to tear the instrument of her dowry in pieces, and go whither she pleased. For such an adulteress was not put to death, but only lost her dowry, without any other punishment. If she said, I am pure; then she was brought to the door of the tabernacle, and they did as follows. So the Mischna, (cap. 1. sect. 5.) and see Wagenseil's annotations on Sota. And now that they have not this way of trial among them, if a man's wife give him suspicion, by keeping a man's company in secret, which he forbade her, he may not use her any more as his wife, and she loses her dowry; as Buxtorfius observes, in his book de Sponsal. et Divort. par. i. sect. 92.

The tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal.] The common offering of this sort was of fine wheat-flour; only this, and the sheaf, or handful, mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10. were of barley. But that was of fine flour sifted from the bran; this of coarse flour, that had nothing taken out of it, as the Mischna saith in Sota, (cap. 2.) Where the reason given for this barley-offering is, because she was supposed to have committed the act of a beast (which is not confined to one), therefore she was to sacrifice the food of a beast; for so barley was in Judea. Many such pretty, rather than solid reasons, are collected out of their authors by Simeon de Muis in his Varia Sacra upon this place. The simplest reason seems to be, that a viler sort of sacrifice was most suitable to her vile condition; for which reason also there was no oil nor frankincense permitted to be offered with it; as it here follows.

He shall pour no oil upon it, nor put frankincense thereon.] This sacrifice was different from all others of this kind, (see Lev. ii. 15.) For though that mentioned Lev. v. 11. was to have no oil nor frankincense with it, yet it was of fine flour, and not barley. And though the sheaf mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10. was of barley, yet it was sifted, and, besides, oil and frankincense were used with it; which are here forbidden. The reasons of which are given by the Jews, according to their various fancies: and some of them are ingenious enough; as, that a good name being compared to oil, (Eccles. vii. 1.) it is here omitted, because the woman had lost her reputation. Maimonides is a little more judicious; for looking upon oil and frankincense as added unto sacrifices for the honour and dignity of them, he thinks God would have this splendour (as his word is) to be wanting to such a woman's sacrifice, because of the baseness of her behaviour, which was the occasion of it; as if she had been told (to stir her up to repentance), "because of the filthiness of thy actions, thy oblation is more imperfect than others," (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 46.) But none, I think, hath given a better account of this than St. Chrysostom (Orat. v. adv. Judæos), because the woman was loaded with sorrow, and heavy accusations, and evil suspicions, ἐμιμεῖτο τὴν συμφορὰν τῆς οἰκείας θυσίας τὸ σχῆμα, the form of the sacrifice imitated the domestic calamity: for every one knows that oil and frankincense were signs of joy and gladness; and therefore not used upon so sad an occasion as this was.

For it is an offering of jealousy.] These and the following words give the reason why oil and frankincense were to be omitted; because it was an offering for one suspected of adultery. And, in such cases, God had before ordained there should be no oil nor frankincense used, (Lev. v. 11.) delicacies being improper in offerings for sin.

An offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance.] For she appeared before God as a sinner; and if she were not guilty, yet she was loaded with an accusation, and a just suspicion of guilt; to which, if she had given any occasion, this sacrifice reminded her of it, and awakened her conscience to reflect upon it.

Ver. 16. And the priest.] It is the opinion of P. Cunæus, (lib. i. de Rep. Hebr. cap. 12.) that the priest here mentioned was to be a member of the great Sanhedrin; to whom the judgment of the matter belonged. But another very learned person thinks, with more reason, the priest, whose lot it was to attend at that time in his course, is here meant. (See Mischna, cap. 1. Sotæ, sect. 5. annot. 8. Wagenseil.)

Shall bring her near.] Rather bring it (that is, her offering) near to the altar at the door of the tabernacle.

And set her.] Rather set the offering; for she is ordered to be set before the Lord afterward, (ver. 18.)

Before the Lord.] At the altar, which was at the door of the tabernacle. (See Lev. i. 3.) At the east gate of the temple, saith the Mischna, which was called the gate of Nicanor; for there women also after child-bed were purified, and the lepers cleansed.

Ver. 17. And the priest shall take holy water.] From the laver: for no water was holy, but that which was made so by the laver; as the Jews say in Jalkut. Therefore Onkelos, instead of holy water, hath water from the laver.

In an earthen vessel.] Which had never been employed to any other use (as the Mischna saith), and contained about a pint of our measure. This I take to have been appointed, as a further expression of the vileness of her condition; for the reasons which the Jewish doctors give of it are not to be regarded. The best that I have observed is, to declare that she should be broken in pieces, like that earthen vessel, if she was guilty of that which she denied.

And of the dust.] Another token of her vileness; this being the serpent's food.

That is in the floor of the tabernacle, &c.] To make her afraid of the judgment of God. For if there were no dust in the tabernacle, they were to fetch it from some other place, (as Maimonides relates their practice, Hilcoth Sota, cap. 4.) and lay it upon the floor of the tabernacle; and then take it and put it into the water.

And put it into the water.] Sprinkle a little of it upon the water (that it might be more easily drunk), but so much, that it might be plainly seen. For there were three things, the Jews say, of which a less quantity was not admitted than might be seen, viz. this dust, and the ashes of the red heifer, (chap. xix. 17.) and the spittle in the face of him that would not marry his brother's wife, (Deut. xxv. 9.) But if the priest put the dust into the vessel first, and then poured the water upon it, he did not do amiss; as the Jews say in the ancient book Siphri. (See Wagenseil upon Mischna Sotæ, cap. 2. sect. 2. annot. 11, 12.)

It hath been observed by some, that such ways of trial were in use among the gentiles; which if they could be proved to have been as ancient as Moses's days, it would make it probable, that this was ordered by God, to divert the Jews from following the superstitions of other nations to make this discovery, and bring them to appear before him at his tabernacle, and there use such rites as were of his appointment: (see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. Dissert. i. cap. 2. p. 539, &c.)

Ver. 18. And the priest shall set the woman before the Lord.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; where a great many women, who were called together on purpose, stood about her; "that they might be taught not to do after her lewdness," (as the prophet Ezekiel speaks, chap. xxiii. 48.) As many others also as would might be present; except only her maids and domestic servants; who were put out, lest they should disturb her mind too much; as Mr. Selden interprets the words of the Mischna, about this matter, (lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 15.) Which another very learned man (J. Wagenseil) interprets the quite contrary way, "lest her mind should place any hope in them," (cap. 1. sect. 6. annot. 8. on Sota.)

And uncover the woman's head.] He was to strip her of all her head attire (as the manner was, if we may believe Philo, in all judicial proceedings), to loose her hair, and tear her garments down to her breast; which he bound about her (as the Jews say) with an Egyptian cord. And if she had any gold or jewels, or other ornaments about her, they were all taken from her; and she was clothed with a black garment. All which were plain tokens of her lamentable condition.

And put the offering of memorial in her hands.] After he had put it into a frying-pan, under which he held his own hand, (Lev. ii. 7.) and at the same time held in his other hand the bitter water; which he shewed her.

Which is the jealousy-offering.] Offered purely upon the account of her husband's jealousy; as he told her.

And the priest shall have in his hand the bitter water.] So called, because they put wormwood, or some such thing into it, to give it a bitter taste; as Maimonides and the ancient rabbins fancy. But the later doctors say, nothing was mixed with this water but dust; and yet it became bitter in the mouth. So Nachman and others. But the most probable account of all others is, that this water was called bitter, from its direful effects upon the body of the woman, if she was guilty. To which exposition Jacob Abendana inclines: (see Wagenseil upon the Mischna Sota, cap. 3. sect. 5. annot. 1.)

Which causeth the curse.] Or rather, which was given her with curses, and dreadful imprecations: blotted out with the bitter water, (ver. 21. 23.) as R. Bechai expounds it.

Ver. 19. And the priest shall charge her by an oath.] Adjure her to tell truth, in the manner following.

And say unto the woman, If no man hath lain with thee, &c.] If thou art innocent of that whereof thou art suspected.

Be thou free from the bitter water, &c.] It shall have no ill effect upon thee.

Ver. 20. But if thou hast gone aside, &c.] Art guilty of adultery.

Ver. 21. Then the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing.] This is no new adjuration; but only another part of that which began ver. 19. and is continued in this and the foregoing. So that these three verses contain the entire form of adjuration; which the priest was to pronounce in a language which the woman understood, as the Jewish doctors observe; otherwise, how could the woman answer Amen? as R. Ismael saith in Siphri; exactly according to the apostle's doctrine, 1 Corinth. xiv. 16. And the priest was to signify to her, that this proceeding was merely to satisfy her husband's jealousy, by discovering the truth. Thus this whole matter is related, by the author of Ez. Hechajim (an incomparable MS. as Wagenseil calls it, who hath it in his possession): "The priest pronounces this curse in a language which she understands; and signifies to her in the vulgar tongue, that these things are done purely because her husband is jealous of her, she having been secretly with one whose company he forbade her to keep: and then saith in a tongue familiar to her, If no other man hath lain with thee but thy husband, &c. be thou free from these bitter waters, &c. but if thou hast been false to him, &c. the Lord make thee a curse, &c. Unto which the woman was to answer, Amen, Amen." By which words she not only consented to what the priest said, but made the same imprecation upon herself.

The Lord make thee a curse.] So that when men would imprecate any evil to another, they should say, Let that befal thee which befel such a woman: as Rasi expounds it.

And an oath among thy people.] A form of execration, as the aforesaid MS. expounds it: or, as Rasi will have it, when men called God to witness, they should say, If I swear falsely, let God punish me as he did such a woman. These execrations were tacitly supposed in the oaths among the pagans, as our great Selden shews at large, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. p. 461, &c. where he observes, out of Porphyry, that the ancient Indians had their Λίμνην δικαστηρίου, lake of probation, or trial: and in his Marmora Arundeliana, (p. 28.) there is this form of imprecation in the league between the city of Smyrna and Magnesia, Εὐορκοῦντι μοὶ εὖ εἴη. Ἐπιορκοῦντι δὲ, ἐξώλεια καὶ αὐτῷ καὶ γένει τῷ ἐξ ἐμοῦ. Let it be well with me, if I swear truly; but if falsely, let destruction be both to myself and to my posterity. And at this day there is a custom in the kingdom of Siam to determine dubious cases, by giving a lump of rice impregnated (as my author speaks) with curses to a man to eat. Which if he can swallow without vomiting, he carries the cause; and his friends carry him home in great triumph, &c. So Jodocus Schoutenius (who was director of the East-India Company there, 1636).

When the Lord doth make thy thigh to rot, and thy belly to swell.] When they see the dreadful effect of this water, in the rotting of thy thigh, after thy belly is swelled. For the swelling of the belly, it appears by the next verse, preceded the rotting of the thigh.

Such imprecations were in use in Homer's time it appears by Agamemnon's prayer; wherein he calls Jupiter, and all the rest of the gods, to bear witness of his sincerity; wishing them to send a multitude of pains and griefs upon him if he forswore himself: (Iliad. xix. ver. 264, 265.)

ἐμοὶ θεοὶ ἄλγεα δοῖεν
Πολλὰ μάλ', ὅσσα διδοῦσιν ὅτις σφ' ἀλίτηται ὀμόσσας.

Ver. 22. And this water that causeth the curse.] Or, For this water, &c.

Shall go into thy bowels, &c.] If thou art guilty, it shall produce the following effects.

To make thy belly to swell.] By the belly the Jews understand the womb, and the bowels, which swelled till they burst.

And thy thigh to rot.] By her thigh is meant the secret parts of her body, as Chaskuni observes on this place. And both Bochartus and Heinsius have given many instances of the use of the word in this sense: the former in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15. and the latter in Aristarch. Sac. cap. 1. And thus we read, in the passion of SS. Perpetuana et Fælic. that when Perpetuana was thrown to the beasts, and lay on the ground, she drew back her coat, which was torn from her side, ad velamentum femoris, to cover her thigh from being seen; pudoris magis memor quam doloris, having a greater sense of modesty than of pain, (p. 32. edit. Oxon.)

The Mischna here observes, not impertinently, with what measure men mete, it shall be measured to them again; for in the very part that offended, she suffered for her crime. I noted before (ver. 17.) that there were such ways of trial anciently among the gentiles; but I am apt to think they were all later than the times of Moses, who did not ordain these rites to keep the Jews from following their customs, but they rather imitated what was practised among the Jews. Particularly Bochartus observes, out of Philostratus, there were waters in Cappadocia, sacred to Jupiter, which were very sweet and pleasant to those who were innocent and swore truly, but quite contrary to those who were perjured; whose eyes, hands, and feet were presently seized and infected with blotches and filthy ulcers, ὑδέροις καὶ φθόαις, which is the very disease here mentioned, if we believe Josephus, who saith the woman's belly swelled by the dropsy, till at last it burst. And Philostratus adds, that the whole body of such people grew consumptive; nor could they stir from those waters, but there they lay deploring their misery. (See Bochart. lib. i. Canaan, cap. 28. p. 589, 590.) Which agrees so perfectly with what the Jews say of this bitter water, that it is most likely this story of the Cappadocian water was derived from thence. For they say, not only the belly of the woman swelled, and her thigh rotted, but every member of her body felt the effects of this deadly poison, which spread to the very hairs of her head; as they tell us in Rabboth, quoted by Wagenseil upon the Mischna, which saith the same, (cap. 1. Sotæ, sect. 7.) And therefore Huetius justly thinks the fable of the Stygian Lake, and several other rites of finding out the truth of secret crimes, were invented by the Greeks from this example, (Demonst. Evan. propos. iv. cap. 11. n. 2.) Many authors have collected several sorts of trials of this kind; and lately Guil. Saldenus, in his Otia Theologica, Exercit. v. n. 24, 25. But, above all, see Huetius's Quæstiones Alnetanæ, (lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 22.) where he gives a large account how far this rite of trying women's chastity by drinking this water was spread amongst the most barbarous nations.

And the woman shall say, Amen, Amen.] The word Amen is doubled, to express her full consent, and her earnest desire that God would deal with her according to her deserving. The Mischna will have the first Amen refer to those words, The Lord make thee a curse; and the second to the next words, And an oath among thy people: so that she prayed God both might come upon her, if she were guilty. We may as well say, that one of these Amens relates to the first part of the adjuration, (ver. 19.) and the other to the second part, (ver. 21.) Or, as Abarbinel doth, that there being a double curse, one that her belly should swell, and another that her thigh should rot, she said a double Amen; praying both might befal her, if she were guilty. And, as the Talmudists understand it, they were an imprecation upon herself. For so they say in Schevnot; Whosoever saith Amen to an oath (or curse) seems to pronounce the oath, or curse, with his own mouth. See Wagenseil upon Mischna Sotæ, (cap. 2. sect. 5. annot. 3.) where he produces a great deal more out of the Scripture itself, in confutation of the opinion of our learned Fuller, who, in his Miscellanies, affirms, that Amen is only an asseveration, but never a form of swearing.

Ver. 23. And the priest shall write these curses.] Several opinions are related in the Mischna, concerning the words that were to be written; which some would have to begin at ver. 19. If no man have lain with thee, &c. and to continue to this verse. But others think they began at these words, ver. 21. The Lord make thee a curse and an oath, &c. and that the last words were omitted, the woman shall say, Amen, Amen. Which of these opinions is the true, neither the Gemara nor Maimonides have determined.

In a book.] Every scroll of parchment, wherein any thing was written, the Jews call sepher, a book: in which, it hath been commonly said, the name of the woman was written, together with the curse; but there is nothing either in the Scripture or in antiquity to countenance this.

And he shall blot them out with the bitter water.] Or rather, into the bitter water; that is, he was to scrape out the words he had written into the water, and so make the woman drink it: or, as the Jews explain it, wash the words he had written with the bitter water till they were quite blotted out: see Wagenseil in Mischna Sotæ, cap. 3. sect. 3. Who observes a great many curiosities which the Jews have about the parchment and the ink, upon and with which these curses were written; and that they were not valid, if they were written by a layman; or by a priest that was not of age; or if they were written before she was adjured; or if he blotted out one word before the rest were written, &c. (See there, cap. 2. sect. 4.) Hottinger forgot himself when he said, the scroll itself was thrown into the water, (Thesaur. Philolog. lib. ii. cap. 2.) for no such thing appears.

Ver. 24. And he shall cause the woman to drink, &c.] viz. After he had offered the jealousy-offering upon the altar, (ver. 26.) And if she refused to drink the water, into which the curses were scraped, they forced her to it, with this preceding admonition; My daughter, if thou art confident of thine innocence, do not fear to drink this water; which will do thee no more hurt than dry poison laid upon the flesh of a living creature, &c. If hereupon she confessed that she had been polluted, the water was straightway poured out; because there was no holiness in it, as Maimonides saith. For it is called holy, ver. 17. not because it was sanctified to this use, but only because it was taken out of the laver, which was a holy vessel: see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Heb. cap. 15. who observes also, in the foregoing chapter, that if after a man had brought his wife to this trial, he chanced to die before this adjuration, she was freed from taking the potion, but lost her dowry.

And the water that causeth the curse.] Or, that is loaded with curses, which have been scraped into it.

Shall enter into her, and become bitter.] Produce those direful effects beforementioned, if she be guilty.

Ver. 25. Then the priest shall take the jealousy-offering out of the woman's hand.] Into which he had put it, before he adjured her, (ver. 18.)

And shall wave the offering before the Lord.] How this waving was performed hath been shewn before, upon Leviticus. Rasi here expresses it in four words, he moved the oblation to and fro, up and down. Something like to which Pythagoras seems to intimate in that Symbol of his, Προσκύνει περιφερόμενος, worship, turning round. Which Plutarch ascribes to Numa; in whose life, he says a great many observable things, concerning turning round in their sacred offices: which was a rite in use among the gentiles; who, when they saluted their gods, standing with their heads uncovered, turned about their bodies to the right hand; as Christoph. Arnoldus observes out of Suetonius and others, in his appendix to Wagenseil's annotations upon Sota, p. 1186.

And offer it upon the altar.] At the south corner of it.

Ver. 26. And the priest shall take a handful of the offering, even the memorial thereof.] See upon the second chapter of Leviticus, ver. 2.

And burn it upon the altar.] The rest of it the priests were to eat, unless her husband himself was a priest; in which case, it was all thrown among the ashes. See Selden in the place abovenamed: where he also observes, that if she confessed the fact, or her husband would not have her drink, or either of them died before she drank, or a witness of the adultery appeared (which made the waters useless), the whole sacrifice was burnt, and not only a memorial thereof. All which is in the Mischna, sect. 3, 4.

And afterward shall cause the woman to drink of the water.] The sacrifice therefore was first offered; though the Mischna says, that if the priest gave her the water to drink first, and then presented the offering, he did not do amiss.

Ver. 27. And when he hath made her to drink the water.] By this it appears he might force her to drink, if she would not do it by persuasion.

Then it shall come to pass, that if she be defiled, and have done trespass against her husband, that the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter, &c.] These effects here mentioned presently followed: for she grew pale, and her eyes were ready to start out of her head, &c. so that they cried out, Carry her forth, carry her forth, lest she defile the court of the temple, by dying there, as the Mischna saith, cap. 3. sect. 4. The adulterer also, if we may believe the Jews, died the same day and hour: nay, his belly swelled, as hers did; and his secret parts rotted, as the author of Ez. Hechajim saith, in Wagenseil upon Sota, (cap. 5. sect. 1.) where he adds, that all this came to pass, in case her husband had never offended in the same kind: for if he had at any time defiled the marriage-bed, then this water had not these effects upon his wife, though she had been faulty. Which the Gemara also affirms.

Ver. 28. And if the woman be not defiled, but be clean, then she shall be free.] Receive no harm at all by drinking the water.

And shall conceive seed.] If she was barren before, she became fruitful after this trial, and also bare a man-child (if we may believe the Jews), and had easy labour. Her beauty also increased, her health was confirmed, and if she had any disease it was cured. They observe also, that if, after she was thus cleared, she kept company again with the same man whom her husband suspected, and by his renewed admonition had required her not to be in private with him, this potion was not repeated; but she was dismissed from being his wife, without any dowry: but if she kept company with any other person privately, after admonition to the contrary, this potion might be repeated, as often as she offended with new lovers. Thus that MS. Ez. Hechajim, so highly commended by Wagenseil, who also adds, that in case her husband put her away after her acquittal, and she married another man, who had the same ground of jealousy that her former husband had, because of her familiarity with the same person whom he had forbidden her to keep company withal, her new husband might bring her to a new trial by this water: and so might as many husbands as she should marry one after another, if she gave the like occasion of jealousy.

Ver. 29. This is the law of jealousies.] Whereby God declared himself to be privy to the most secret sins, and to be both the preserver of conjugal faith and chastity, and the protector of innocence: and provided that man and wife should live happily together, by keeping men from cruel and furious proceedings against their wives, when they entertained a jealousy of them (willing them to commend the case to God), and by continuing wives in their duty out of dread of this punishment; which was so terrible (as Maimonides well observes) even to innocent women, that they would have given all they had to avoid it; nay, wished rather to die than undergo such a public infamy, of having their head uncovered, their hair cut off (as he represents it), their garment torn to their breasts; and so to stand in the sanctuary before a great multitude of men and women, and the whole Sanhedrin. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.)

When a wife goeth aside.] If the man went aside from her, she had not the same action against him; because the family was not so much injured by his going aside, as by hers; which brought a spurious brood to inherit his estate.

To another instead of her husband.] Hence the Talmudists conclude, such an action did not lie against a woman who was only espoused; or that waited for her former husband's brother to take her to wife; if they gave suspicion of being defiled. So the Mischna, cap. 4. sect. 1.

And is defiled.] By that other man with whom she went aside.

Ver. 30. Or when the spirit of jealousy cometh upon him, and he be jealous over his wife.] It appears by the first words of this law, (ver. 13, 14.) that whether she was really defiled, or there was only a vehement suspicion of it, which bred a jealousy in him; the husband had liberty to bring her to this trial for his own satisfaction: which law was rather permissive than preceptive.

And shall set the woman before the Lord.] That he might shew whether there was cause for her husband's jealousy or not: (see ver. 18.)

And the priest shall execute upon her all this law.] Though the man was not bound to bring her to this trial, but rather the contrary, if he could otherwise get rid of his jealousy; yet the priest was bound to proceed against her, according to the foregoing rules; when she was set before the Lord to be tried. And he might set her before him on any day that was not a festival, and in any hour of the day; but not in the night: nor might he give the drink to two suspected women at one and the same time.

Ver. 31. Then shall the man be guiltless from iniquity, and the woman shall bear her iniquity.] By iniquity here is to be understood the punishment due to iniquity. For the wife, or her parents, if she appeared to be innocent, could have no action against the husband, upon the account of this accusation: and if she was guilty, she was justly punished for her crime; and her husband had no reason to say (as the Jews speak in Pesikta), "Woe is me, that I have killed a daughter of Israel," &c. for he is here pronounced innocent in that matter by the eternal God; who doth not exercise a tyranny (as they there go on) over his creatures, nor gives them precepts, that he may make them weary of their lives, or destroy them. No, his precepts are right; the whole law is Divine: and God doth not bring any man into judgment, but for the violation of that which was expressly commanded, and which he might have been able to fulfil.

But the particle vau in the beginning of this verse signifies sometimes as much as if, as I observed upon ver. 7. And so the Jews here commonly understand it, if the man be guiltless from iniquity. For thus the rule is expressed in the Gemara, upon the fifth chapter of Sota: When the husband is free from iniquity (i. e. from adultery), then the water tries his wife: but if he be not free (i. e. be himself also guilty of adultery), then the water hath no power to try her: that is, produces none of the effects beforementioned. And so the author of Ez. Hachajim, in Wagenseil upon Sota, (p. 595.) concludes from these very words, That the bitter water then only had power, when the man was free from the sin of which he suspected his wife: and gives this as the reason, why, in the latter end of the second temple, this way of trial ceased, and was quite taken away by the Sanhedrin; because the number of adulterers was then so great, that the water had no effect; according to those words of the prophet Hosea, (chap. iv. 14.) "I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery," &c. For that is another rule of theirs, When adulterers were multiplied, the bitter waters ceased; i. e. there was no trial by them: (see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Heb. cap. 15. p. 408.) Yet the Jews seem to have continued in after-ages, since their temple was destroyed, some form of dreadful imprecations, in their synagogues, for the discovery of truth in doubtful cases. For St. Chrysostom says, he himself saw a very modest, good Christian woman, brought by a senseless fellow (who also had the name of a Christian) into a Jewish assembly; whom he would have compelled to take their oath, περὶ τῶν ἀμφισβητουμένων αὐτῷ πραγμάτων, concerning some things wherein he desired satisfaction: from which the woman being rescued, by St. Chrysostom's assistance, when he examined the man about it, how he came to forsake the church, and resort to their Sanhedrin; his answer was, "That he had been told by many, φοβερωτέρους τοὺς ἐκεῖ γινομένους ὅρκους εἶναι, that there were more horrible adjurations among them than Christians," (Homil. i. adv. Judæos.) Which, no doubt, arose from the direful effects of this adjuration here prescribed, if the woman was guilty of what she was suspected.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This law very properly follows the foregoing (about women suspected of adultery), as a remedy against all such sins; by abstaining from wine, and all other incitements to lust; and by devoting themselves, for some time, in a peculiar way to the service of God. And there seems to be a plain opposition between a woman professing herself a Nazarite, and forbearing wine, and the care of her hair; and a woman that loved company, and was entangled in the love of other men besides her husband.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Who were all concerned in this law.

When either man or woman.] For women as well as men might make this vow, if they were at their own disposal, and not under the power of their parents, or husbands, by whose authority this vow might be disannulled, (chap. xxx. 4, 5, &c.)

Shall separate themselves.] The Hebrew word japhli signifies the doing something extraordinary, beyond the common rate of other men: and therefore Forsterus hath well translated it, when a man or woman shall vow a singular vow.

To vow a vow of a Nazarite.] The Hebrew word Nazar, which signifies in general to separate, in the conjugation niphal (as they call it) signifies to separate from others, by a profession of some special act of religion. Whence Nazir signifies one that, beyond the common prescription of the law, dedicates, not his goods, but himself to God in a peculiar kind of sanctimony. So Philo, who calls this μεγάλη εὐχή, the great vow: because he that makes it, devotes not his corn, or beasts, &c. but his own self unto God; κτημάτων γὰρ τὸ μέγιστον αὐτός τίς ἐστιν αὑτῷ, for every man is to himself the greatest possession he hath.

To separate themselves unto the Lord.] To separate themselves for some time, to a higher measure of purity than other men practised; that they might attend to the service of God. From whence this vow was called, separation unto the Lord. For they who observed it were holy, saith Maimonides; yea, were placed, for the present, in the dignity of the high-priest as to sanctity: being forbidden to pollute themselves for their father or mother, as it follows afterward, (More Nev. par. iii. cap. 48.) The Jewish doctors are wont to be so curious in marking every word, and scrupulously adhering to it, that it is something strange they should allow a father the liberty to separate his child to be a Nazarite, without its consent; when the text expressly speaks of those who separate themselves. But so the Mischna determines in Sota, (cap. 3. sect. 8.) and it allows this liberty to the father, though not to the mother; though we find Hannah vowing Samuel to be a Nazarite before he was born, 1 Sam. i. 10, 11. (See Wagenseil on that place, annot. 2, 3.)

Ver. 3. He shall separate himself from wine.] In this consisted one part of the special sanctity of Nazarites; that, by abstinence from wine, or any thing that was intoxicating, they might the better attend to the study of the law, or other exercises of religion.

And strong drink.] As wine was made of grapes, so shecar was a liquor made of other fruit, as dates, &c. (see Lev. x. 9.) To which add, that other authors call the juice of dates, as well as grapes, by the name of wine. Nay, Pliny saith, that præcipua vina, the choicest wines, were made of those dates called cariotæ, which grew about Jericho; though they were iniqua capiti, hurtful to the head, from whence they had their name, (lib. xiii. Nat. Histor. cap. 4.) With great reason, therefore, such intoxicating liquors were forbidden to those who set themselves apart to attend upon God, during the time of their separation. Which justifies, in part, what Maimonides saith, that Nazarites were advanced to the dignity of priests, who might not drink any wine, or strong drink, in the time of their ministration to God in the sanctuary.

And shall drink no vinegar of wine, &c.] For that had the same effect with wine and strong drink, of which it was made.

Neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes.] i. e. Secondary wine; which was made by maceration of grapes in water, after the juice had been pressed out to make wine. Pliny speaks of various kinds of it, (lib. xiv. Nat. Hist. cap. 10.)

Nor eat moist grapes, or dried.] Which might have stirred up their appetite after wine, or heated their blood; and indisposed them for the service of God, to which they had devoted themselves.

Ver. 4. All the days of his separation.] Or Nazariteship, as it is in the margin. Which sort of vow, either was for all their life, or only for a time. Samson and John Baptist were made perpetual Nazarites, by the direction of God, from their mother's womb. But here Moses speaks of such as were made Nazarites by themselves, for a time only. Which the Jews say was at least for thirty days: but it appears by St. Paul it might be for a week only: unto which he limited the time of his ἁγνισμὸς, as it is called in Acts xxii. 26, 27. For every one might vow for what time he pleased.

Shall he eat nothing that is made of the vine-tree.] No paste, nor sauce, that had any of the juice or infusion of the grapes in it.

From the kernel even to the husk.] Which might give the smallest tincture to any thing into which they were put.

All this caution seems to be intended to instruct those, who give themselves wholly unto God's service, to be very sober and abstemious in the use of wine and strong drink; the excess of which is the bane of true piety. For "Amat Spiritus Sanctus sicca corda," as Grotius admirably observes upon Luke i. 15. The Holy Ghost delights in dry souls.

Ver. 5. There shall no razor come upon his head.] Nor was his hair to be cut with scissors, or any other instrument; but he was to let the locks of his hair grow, as it is in the conclusion of this verse. This made such persons look majestically and venerably, without any expense. For, as Agesilaus speaks in Stobæus, τὸ κομᾶν τῶν κόσμων τὸ ἀδαπανώτατον, to let one's hair grow long, is the cheapest ornament. Besides, neglect of the hair was proper to those who renounced, for the present, all manner of pleasure (as the Nazarites did), and betook themselves to a severer sort of life. Such persons not only let their beards and their hair grow, but wore a hairy garment, which the Hebrews called addareth. Such an one John Baptist wore, as Elijah did before him, whose mantle is called by this name, (1 Kings xix. 19.) and who is said himself to have been a hairy man, (2 Kings i. 8.) from whence Grotius concludes, that either he was a Nazarite, or the habit of a prophet and a Nazarite was the same. (See him on Matt. iii. 4.)

But Moses himself seems, in the next words, to give the plainest reason of this matter.

Until the days be fulfilled, in the which he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall be holy.] It was a token he had kept himself pure from all legal defilements: for if he had not, he must have shaved his head, (ver. 9.) as they did who were cleansed from their leprosy, (Levit. xiv. 8, 9.)

And shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow.] This law, in which consists the second part of their Nazariteship, some fancy to have been translated from the Egyptians, into the religion of the Hebrews. Which was the opinion of S. Cyril of Alexandria, lib. xvi. de Adorat. where he saith, that Moses, knowing how hard it would be to bring the Israelites from the ill customs they had learnt in Egypt, most wisely instituted the like rites to those that were in use there, to the intent they might not perform such worship any longer to demons, but to the Lord of all. Procopius Gazæus, upon this place, hath the same notion: "Græcorum liberi, si in nymphas vel montanas vel aquatiles incidissent, comas nutriebant. Lex itaque mala dæmonum consuetudine dempta, ad Deum hoc ipsum transfert." The sense of which is, that the Greeks let their hair grow in honour of the nymphs; and therefore the law, to abolish that wicked custom, transferred that to God which was done to demons. To which I should readily subscribe, if there were any proof that this rite of consecrating their hair to demons was so old among the Egyptians and Greeks as the times of Moses. It is far more probable, that the original of this custom among the gentiles was from this law of the Nazarites. So Hen. Lindenbrogius very well observes upon those words of Censorinus, (de Die Natali, cap. 1.) Crinem Deo sacrum pascebant, that they let their hair grow in honour of their gods; particularly of Apollo, who thence was called Κουροτρόφος; of Bacchus, Minerva, and others; yea, this superstition grew so much, that they consecrated it to rivers, in which they thought there was some divinity. But hujus moris origo (saith that learned annotator upon him) videtur fluxisse à Nazaræis Judæorum. The original of this custom seems to have flowed from the Jewish Nazarites. (See more upon ver. 18.)

Ver. 6. All the days that he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall come at no dead body.] This was a third part of this religion, not to touch a dead body, nor be in the house where a dead body was, nor accompany it to the grave, (see chap. xix. 11—13.) For such defilements by the dead made men unclean seven days, so that they might not approach to the house of God; and therefore, that the Nazarites might always be fit to attend upon his service, he would have them avoid this defilement.

Ver. 7. He shall not make himself unclean for his father, or for his mother, &c.] In this he was superior to the ordinary priests, who might be defiled for such near kindred, (Levit. xxi. 2, &c.) and was equalled to the high-priest (as I observed before, ver. 2. out of Maimonides), who might not, (Levit. xxi. 11.)

Because the consecration of his God is upon his head.] His hair upon his head, which was unshorn, shewed him to be separated (as the word is in the Hebrew) unto God. Which hair also was consecrated to him, when the days of his separation were fulfilled. For in this unshorn hair seems to have consisted the principal part of Nazariteship.

Ver. 8. All the days of his separation he is holy to the Lord.] By a peculiar vow, and therefore was not to come near a dead body.

Ver. 9. And if any man die very suddenly by him.] Either by violence, or an apoplexy, or any other way. And the case was the same, if he chanced to light upon a dead body unawares.

And he hath defiled the head of his consecration.] The consecration of his head; that is, his hair. For though he could not help his being so suddenly surprised, yet he was defiled by being where a dead body was: and consequently the hair of his head, which had been consecrated to God, was defiled also; and therefore could not be offered to him, and burnt in his honour.

Then he shall shave his head in the day of his cleansing.] His Nazariteship was interrupted by this defilement, so that it could not proceed further; but, after the usual purification, was to be begun anew; by shaving off this polluted hair, and letting new hair grow instead of it. By this it appears that Moses here speaks only of such as made this vow for a limited time: for perpetual Nazarites, who were consecrated to God for all their life, were never shaven, whatsoever defilement they contracted.

On the seventh day shall he shave it.] For so many days uncleanness by the dead lasted, (chap. xix. 11.) and the seventh day was the day of cleansing from that uncleanness, (ver. 12.) All other legal uncleannesses polluted a Nazarite so, as to make him stand in need of such purifications as other men used in those cases: but this alone polluted him so as utterly to put him out of that state; which, as it here follows, was to be begun again.

Ver. 10. And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons, to the priest, &c.] The very same sacrifice which was offered for one that had been defiled by a running issue, (Levit. xv. 14.)

Ver. 11. And the priest shall offer the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering.] As in the forenamed case, (Lev. xv. 15.)

To make an atonement for him.] Which was to be done before the burnt-offering would be accepted.

For that he sinned by the dead.] He had not properly sinned; but contracted a legal uncleanness, by touching a dead body, or being where it was. Which, though it was against his will, yet was a defilement in the account of the law; and a kind of sin, because it was a breach of a ceremonial law, and therefore thus to be purged. The reason of which, and such-like precepts, Abarbinel observes, (in his preface to the book of Leviticus, chap. iv.) was only this; to make men very cautious how they contracted any defilement; as the Nazarite might do in the time of his separation, and put himself to much trouble. Which is the foundation of a famous saying among their wise men: "Diligence begets caution; and caution purity; and purity, holiness and sanctity."

And shall hallow his head the same day.] Consecrate his hair afresh to the Lord, after his head hath been shaved.

Ver. 12. And he shall consecrate unto the Lord the days of his separation.] This is a further explication of what was said just before, in the end of the foregoing verse: that from the eighth day he shall begin to compute the time of his Nazariteship, for so many days as he at first vowed unto the Lord.

And shall bring a lamb of the first year, for a trespass-offering.] Which was to be offered even for ignorant offences, by the law made before, (Levit. v. 15.)

But the days that were before] His defilement by the dead.

Shall be lost.] Shall not be reckoned, as the LXX. have it, but go for nothing (as we speak), though they were so many that he had almost fulfilled his vow. If, for instance, he had vowed to be a Nazarite for a whole year, and in the twelfth month happened upon a dead carcass, all the foregoing eleven months were lost, and he was to begin his year's vow again: and this, as often as such an accident happened, if it were before the time that his vow was completed. Which may seem very hard, if we do not seriously consider the intention of it; which was, to oblige them to the strictest care to preserve themselves holy and pure in all things; as they were plainly taught to be, by the watchful diligence they were bound to use, to avoid this legal defilement here mentioned. For none could absolve them from this vow, till it was fulfilled in the exactness that is here required. For, as they tell the story in the Talmud, Queen Helen having taken a vow upon her for seven years, by coming into the holy land was engaged for seven years more; and being defiled towards the latter end of them, was obliged for another seven years; which was twenty and one years in all. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 18.)

Because his separation was defiled.] His first separation was defiled by a dead body; which made it necessary he should begin a new one. It might happen also that he might die, before he had fulfilled the time he had vowed to be a Nazarite. In which case, Maimonides saith, any of his sons might go on where he left, and at the end of the days which his father had vowed, offer the sacrifices here appointed, and be shaved in his stead. (So the Mischna Sotæ, cap. 3. sect. 8.) But Maimonides acknowledges there is no foundation for this in Scripture; but it relies wholly upon tradition. (See Wagenseil on that place, annot. 4.)

Ver. 13. And this is the law of the Nazarite.] Of putting an end to his Nazariteship.

When the days of his separation are fulfilled.] At the end of the time he vowed to continue in this state.

He shall be brought.] By the priest.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] That the sacrifices here prescribed might be offered for him.

Ver. 14. And he shall offer his offering unto the Lord.] i. e. The Nazarite was to present these following offerings unto the Lord: for the priest's offering them is not mentioned till ver. 16.

One he-lamb of the first year without blemish for a burnt-offering, and one ewe-lamb, &c.] Here are all sorts of offerings, which he was obliged to make in the conclusion of his Nazariteship. A burnt-offering, as an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion. A sin-offering, imploring pardon for any omissions of which he might have been guilty during this vow: and a peace-offering, in thankfulness to God, who had given him grace both to make, and to keep, and to fulfil this vow.

Ver. 15. And a basket of unleavened bread, cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, and wafers of unleavened bread anointed with oil.] Besides the forementioned sacrifices, here are three oblations more prescribed to complete his thankfulness: of which see Exod. xxix. 2.

And their meat-offerings, and their drink-offerings.] This seems to relate to the burnt-offering and peace-offering beforementioned, (ver. 14.) which were to have their proper meat-offering and drink-offering; besides the basket of unleavened bread, with the cakes and the wafers: see Levit. vii. 12. Numb. xv. 2, 3, &c. Where these accessory offerings are ordered to accompany the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, though sin-offerings had none.

Ver. 16. And the priest shall bring them before the Lord.] Unto the altar of burnt-offerings; as the Nazarite had already brought them to the door of the tabernacle, (ver. 14.)

And shall offer his sin-offering, and his burnt-offering.] Though the burnt-offering be first named, (ver. 14.) as the principal sacrifice of all other, yet the sin-offering was first offered; by which his peace being made with God, the two other offerings which followed were acceptable to him.

Ver. 17. And he shall offer the ram for a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the Lord, with the basket of unleavened bread.] And the cakes and wafers, which accompanied the peace-offering, that nothing might be wanting to complete the feast which was to be made upon them.

The priest shall offer also his meat-offering, and his drink-offering.] By this it appears, that these were distinct from the basket of unleavened bread, &c. as I observed, ver. 15.

Ver. 18. And the Nazarite shall shave the head of his separation.] i. e. The hair of his head, which was consecrated to God, shall be shaved off, that it may be presented unto him. For having now fulfilled his vow, this hair was holy; it not having been defiled as that hair was which he shaved off before, (ver. 9.)

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] That it might be publicly known he had ended his vow.

And shall take the hair of the head of his separation.] His hair which was consecrated to the Lord.

And put it in the fire.] Where it was burnt.

Which is under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings.] In the court of the women, (as they tell us in Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 5.) where there were four rooms; and that in the north-east corner was the room of the Nazarites; in which they boiled their peace-offerings, and, having polled their hair, put it under the pot where the sacrifice was boiling: which, as L'Empereur there observes out of Abarbinel, was offered out of joy, that their vow was fulfilled; and therefore they put their hair to be there burnt, as a testimony that their Nazariteship was at an end, and that they had no further obligation to let their hair grow, in observance of this law. And according to this account, that question is resolved which many have made: whether the Nazarite's hair was to be burnt with holy fire, (viz. that on the altar) or with common: for it was burnt with that which was under the pot, or caldron, in which the peace-offerings were boiled, which was common fire. And, indeed, it had been unseemly to burn hair upon the altar, it being God's table, where his meat was set before him; for it would not have been grateful at one of our feasts. Yet the fire under the peace-offerings may, in some sort, be called holy, as it was employed to boil holy meat; and in that regard, more sacred than other vulgar fire.

There are those who think no account can be given of such ordinances as these, but only this; that it was so general a custom, and so very ancient among mankind, to let their hair grow on purpose, and to plait it in locks, that they might, at a certain time, cut it off, and devote it to some of their gods; that, in all likelihood, the Israelites would have followed their superstition, if God, to prevent it, had not instituted a way of doing what the rest of the world did, without their idolatry. For the directions which God here gives about it, are manifestly opposite to the way of the gentiles. For the Nazarites are here directed to cut their hair (when the time of their separation was completed) at the door of the tabernacle, where it was also to be burnt; whereas the gentiles hung their hair, when they had cut it, upon trees; or consecrated it to rivers, (as I observed, ver. 5.) or laid it up in their temples, there to be preserved. The Hebrew Nazarites also are required to offer various sorts of sacrifices, when they cut their hair; of which we rarely read any thing among the gentiles: and all the time of their separation were to drink no wine, nor eat grapes, &c. which was not known among the heathen. From whence it is, one may think, that they are so often put in mind of the Lord, in this law of the Nazarites; who are said to be separated unto the Lord, (ver. 1. 5, 6.) and the consecration of his God is said to be upon his head, (ver. 7.) and all the days of his separation he was holy to the Lord, (ver. 8.) unto whom he consecrated the days of his separation, (ver. 12.) to put them in mind, that, though they used this rite, which was common to other nations, yet it was in honour of the Lord only, whom they acknowledged to be the author of health, and strength, and growth: for the devil also had his Nazarites, as appears from Hosea ix. 10. All this is said, and much more, with a specious show of truth, by a most ingenious and learned friend of mine, now with God, in his excellent book, De Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus, &c. lib. iii. Dissert. 1. cap. 6.

But there are two things wanting to make this opinion probable. First, none can tell how the world came by such a custom of letting their hair grow for sacred uses, unless they had it from Moses; who tells us whence he derived it, viz. from God; who appointed this rite for such reasons, as then were plain, but now, perhaps, do not appear to us. Besides, secondly, there is not the least evidence that this custom was so old as Moses's time; which to me seems not likely, but rather that it was derived, among the gentiles, from an imperfect knowledge of what is here ordained by Moses. For the chief part of this Nazariteship consisting in letting their hair grow, and consecrating it unto God, the gentiles took it to be a piece of great devotion, Μὴ ἀποκείρειν τῶν παίδων τὰς κορυφὰς, &c. as Theodoret speaks, Quæst. xxviii. in Levit. not to cut off their children's hair, but let it grow, and, after a certain time, dedicate it to their demons. Many authors have written much of this custom; for which there was a certain day appointed at Athens, viz. the third day of the feast called Ἀπατούρια, which day was called Κουρεῶτις, because then the hair of their grown children was shorn off, and sacrificed to Diana. (See Petr. Castellanus, in his Syntagma de Festis Græcorum; where he quotes a passage out of Hesychius, (p. 28.) who says, that before they cut off their hair, they brought a measure of wine, which they offered to Hercules, and then all that were present drunk of it: which is some imitation of the drink-offering here mentioned by Moses, which was offered at the completion of their Nazariteship. And Grotius and Huetius have made it so plain, that the Attic laws were derived from Moses, that I cannot doubt but this custom also flowed from the same fountain.

And, if we must give an account of the reason of this institution among the Hebrews, I think that of Maimonides is better than this, against which I have excepted; viz. that this law about their hair was made in opposition to the opinion of the ancient idolaters, called Zabii, who held all things which were separated from the body to be impure; as the hair, the nails, and the blood. From whence all barbers among them were accounted impure persons, because they cut men's hair, and let blood: and whosoever suffered a razor to pass upon his flesh, was required to wash himself in pure fountain-water; as he shews, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 47.

Ver. 19. And the priest shall take the sodden shoulder of the ram.] The left shoulder, which he was to take out of the pot as it was boiling; for the right shoulder (which is called the heave-shoulder in the next verse) was the priest's portion, by a law made before this, (Lev. vii. 32, 33.)

And one unleavened cake out of the basket, and one unleavened wafer.] The basket of unleavened bread was ordered to be offered before, (ver. 17.) and now he orders one of the cakes and one of the wafers (mentioned with the bread, ver. 15.) to be put into the hands of the Nazarite; the rest being burnt, I suppose, upon the altar.

And shall put them into the hands of the Nazarite.] That he might give them to the priest, in token of his thankfulness to him for his pains.

After the hair of his separation is shaved.] And his vow, in a manner, completed; as it was immediately after these things were presented unto God.

Ver. 20. And the priest shall wave them.] Both the sodden shoulder and the cake and wafer.

For a wave-offering before the Lord.] See Lev. vii. 30, 31.

This is holy for the priest, with the wave-breast, and heave-shoulder.] These two were the priest's portion out of all peace-offerings, as I observed before, from Lev. vii. 34. but in this peace-offering he had, moreover, the other shoulder, as a special token of the Nazarite's gratitude for his cleansing.

And after that the Nazarite may drink wine.] He was restored to his former freedom, to live as other men did.

Ver. 21. This is the law of the Nazarite, who hath vowed, and of his offering to the Lord for his separation.] All these things he was bound to perform, before he could be freed from his vow, though he was never so poor.

Besides that that his hand shall get.] Besides which he might add, if he pleased, according to his ability.

According to the vow which he vowed, so must he do after the law of his separation.] There was a necessity that he should perform what his vow obliged him unto, according to the law of Nazariteship; though he might voluntarily offer what he thought good, over and above his oblation, now that he was executing his vow. His friends also might join with him in the expense he was at for so many sacrifices as he was enjoined to offer; or in providing voluntary offerings, beyond his oblation. Thus we read, in Acts xxi. 23, 24. that St. Paul, by the advice of St. James, and the elders at Jerusalem, was at charges with certain men that had this vow upon them, and purified himself with them: which was agreeable to the custom among the Jews, as Petitus and others have observed out of Maimonides; who says, others might help the Nazarites to fulfil their vow, and partake with them in it, by abstaining from wine, &c. for some time, as they did.

Ver. 22. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] The tabernacle having been lately erected, to which the people were all to resort, they are invited to it by the directions here given, how they should be dismissed, when they came to worship: which was in such a manner, that they might not doubt (as R. Menachem glosses) but the Divine benediction would come down upon them from his celestial habitation, when they devoutly frequented his house here on earth.

Ver. 23. Speak unto Aaron, and unto his sons, saying.] Whose proper office it was to bless the people; as it was to offer their sacrifices, and burn incense, (Deut. xxi. 5.)

On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them.] Standing so that they might be seen with their hands lifted up and spread; speaking with a loud voice, with their faces towards the people: (see Lev. ix. 22.)

Ver. 24. The Lord bless thee, and keep thee.] Give thee all good things, and preserve thee from all evil.

Ver. 25. The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee.] Be favourable unto thee, and pardon all thy sins.

Ver. 26. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace.] Be always with thee to protect and defend thee, and give thee perfect happiness.

When this benediction was said in the sanctuary (if we may believe the Jews), it was but one, and pronounced without any pause; the people keeping a profound silence: but out of the sanctuary (in their synagogues) they made three of it, the priest pausing at the end of every verse, and the people saying Amen to each of them. In the sanctuary also they pronounced the name Jehovah, which is here thrice repeated; but in their synagogues they used some other name instead of it. So the Mischna Sota, (cap. 7. sect. 6.)

The repetition of this name three times, in these three verses, and that with a different accent in each of them (as R. Menachem observes), hath made the Jews themselves think there is some mystery in it: which we understand, though they do not. For it may well be looked upon by us, as having respect to the three persons in the blessed Trinity; who are one God, from whom all blessings flow unto us, (2 Cor. xiii. 14.) This mystery, as Luther wisely expresses it, (upon Psal. v.) is here occulte insinuatum, secretly insinuated, though not plainly revealed. And it is not hard to shew, if this were a place for it, how properly God the Father may be said to bless and keep us; and God the Son to be gracious unto us; and God the Holy Ghost to give us peace.

Ver. 27. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel.] To put God's name upon them, was to commend them to his almighty goodness; or, to bless them, by calling upon the Lord, and beseeching him to bestow all that they desired upon them.

And I will bless them.] The Jews from hence observe, that God's blessing, in some sort, depends upon the blessing of the priest: which they thought so necessary, that such priests as were admitted to no other service might perform this; for fear the people should at any time want it. So Chaskuni, (upon Deut. xxi. 5.) and Jalkut, (as Wagenseil observes upon the Gemara Sotæ, cap. 7. sect. 26.) whose words are these, "The blessing pronounced by a priest, who hath some blemish in his body, ought to be accounted legitimate."

Jonathan here paraphrases these words in this manner, I will bless them in my Word, or by my Word: which is the apostolical doctrine, that God the Father hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in, or by Christ, (Ephes. i. 3.) who, with the Holy Ghost, is most high in the glory of God the Father. And it is observable, that the Jews think it utterly unlawful to add a fourth benediction to these three, though they find one in Deut. i. 2. "The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more than you are; and bless you as he hath promised you."

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass on the day that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle.] Which he did upon the first day of the first month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xl. 17, 18.)

And had anointed it, and sanctified it, &c.] See Lev. viii. 10, 11.; where it is said, he anointed also (as it here likewise follows) all belonging to it: which being seven days in doing, as appears from the thirty-fifth verse of that chapter, it is evident that the word day doth not here precisely denote the very day on which the tabernacle was erected; but more largely, at or about that time (as it must necessarily signify, ver. 84. of this chapter), after he had set up the tabernacle; and not only sanctified and anointed it, but received orders about sacrifices, and anointed the priests (with the rest mentioned in the book of Leviticus), and also had numbered the people; ordered their encampment, and the encampment of the Levites; and given them their charge about the tabernacle. In short, when Moses had done all the things mentioned hitherto in this book, then followed this dedication of the altar. And whosoever will compare this chapter with the second, may easily be convinced that this offering of the princes was not made till the camp was formed, and the tribes ranged under their several standards: for the princes' offer held in the same order and method that they are disposed there.

Ver. 2. That the princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers.] Mentioned chap. i. 5. 16.

And were over them that were numbered.] This evidently shews that this offering of the princes was after the numbering of the people.

Offered.] In the order that is set down in this chapter.

Ver. 3. And they brought their offering.] The LXX. translate the Hebrew word korbanam, τὸ δῶρον αὐτῶν, their gift, or their present, which they made to God; which consisted of several things, for divers uses.

Before the Lord.] i. e. At the door of the tabernacle; as it is explained in the end of the verse.

Six covered waggons, and twelve oxen.] In the first place they made a present for the service of the tabernacle itself; that such parts of it as were most cumbersome might be more conveniently carried; and that they might be free from dust, rain, or hail. The waggons were covered; being not ordinary carriages, but such as were used by great persons. So the LXX. understood it, who translate the Hebrew word tzabbim, by λαμπήνη, in Isa. lxvi. 20. and here ἁμάξας λαμπηνίκας. Now as Pollux reckons λαμπήνη among the waggons and chariots then used, so Hesychius tells us (as learned men have observed) it signifies such waggons as illustrious men and women used; and that they were covered above.

A waggon for two of the princes.] This shews plainly enough, that they were sumptuous, and had, perhaps, rich coverings; in that two of the great men joined in the present of one waggon.

And for each one an ox.] That there might be a pair of oxen to draw each waggon. And it is probable, those oxen were yoked together, which were offered by those two princes, who joined in offering one waggon.

And they brought them before the tabernacle.] Set them before the entrance of it.

Ver. 4. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It seems Moses did not accept these presents, till he had orders from the Lord, in the next words.

Ver. 5. Take it of them.] Receive their presents, as acceptable to me.

That they may be to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.] He directs their use: which was to carry the tabernacle, when they removed from one place to another.

And thou shalt give them to the Levites.] In order to which, he directs him to bestow them upon the Levites, who had the charge of that carriage.

To every man according to his service.] In such proportions as the things they had to carry required.

Ver. 6. And Moses took the waggons and oxen, and gave them to the Levites.] In such proportions as follow in the next two verses.

Ver. 7. Two waggons and four oxen to the sons of Gershon, according to their service.] As they were fewest in number that could do service, so they had less burdensome things to carry than the sons of Merari, (chap. iv. 25, 40.) and therefore had fewer carriages allowed them.

Ver. 8. And four waggons and eight oxen he gave unto the sons of Merari, according to their service.] They were the most numerous, and had the greatest burden; and therefore had allowance of more carriages and oxen, (chap. iv. 31, 32. 48.)

Under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest.] Who had the inspection and care both of the Gershonites and Merarites, (chap. iv. 28. 33.)

Ver. 9. But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none.] For the reason that follows.

Because the service of the sanctuary belonging unto them was, that they should bear upon their shoulders.] The LXX. translate it more exactly, because they had the service of the holy thing, (τοῦ ἁγίου, as the ark is called, chap. iv. 4.) they shall carry it on their shoulders: which was for the greater honour and dignity of the ark, and of the law contained in it; as Maimonides, R. Levi ben Gersom, and others, observe: and that the form and structure of the ark might not be discomposed, as Maimonides adds, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 45.) nor the ephod and the breast-plate ruffled; as they might have been by the shaking of a waggon. Yet they all observe, this was not so peculiar to the sons of Kohath, but that the priests, the sons of Aaron, upon some special occasions, carried the ark; particularly when they went over Jordan, (Josh. iii. 3.) and at the siege of Jericho; at both which times a great miracle was to be wrought; and when Zadok and Abiathar carried it back to Jerusalem, 2 Sam. xv. 29. (though that, I observed before, may be otherwise interpreted, and there seems no reason why they should carry it back, when the Levites brought it, ver. 24.) and when Solomon's temple was built, (1 Kings viii. 6.) For the Levites might not go into the holy place, and therefore it was then carried by the priests.

Ver. 10. And the priests offered.] They brought the offerings, which they desired might be presented unto God.

For the dedicating of the altar.] The Hebrew word chanac, which, in one place of the Pentateuch, signifies simply to begin to use, or enjoy a house, (Deut. xx. 6.) here, and in several other places, signifies the first application and addiction of any thing to sacred uses, or to the Divine service; to which it had been designed and consecrated. And this was done with some certain solemn words and actions, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 1. and cap. 15. n. 3. And so, among the Latins, the word inchoare, when applied to sacred things, signifies, to perfect or consummate; as Servius observes upon Æneid. vi. And both civil and sacred initiations were accompanied with great joy and gladness. But this is not to be understood, as if the dedication of the altar was the setting of it apart, and sanctifying it for the service of God, (which had been done before, and seven days spent therein, Exod. xxix. 27. Levit. viii. 11.) but, as the word properly signifies, the beginning to use it, after it had been so sanctified.

In the day that it was anointed.] At the time that it was set apart; and all other things ordered for the safeguard of the tabernacle. (See ver. 1.)

Even the princes offered their offering.] Presented their gifts (as the LXX. translate it), which they desired God would accept upon this great occasion.

Before the altar.] At the door of the tabernacle, near unto which the altar stood, (Exod. xl. 6.) for he speaks of the altar of burnt-offerings.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto Moses, They shall offer their offering.] Here again Rasi observes, that Moses would not receive their offering till he knew the mind of God; who directed in what manner and order their gifts should be offered to him.

Each prince on his day, for the dedication of the altar.] This made the dedication a very long solemnity, which continued twelve days. When these twelve days began, it is not easy to determine; but it seems to me a very reasonable computation, which Fortunatus Scacchus hath made of this whole business, Myrothec. Sacr. Elæochrysm. lib. ii. cap. 74, where he supposes, that the tabernacle being erected the first day of the first month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt, seven days were spent in the consecration of it and of the altar, &c. And on the eighth day Moses began to consecrate Aaron, and his sons, which lasted seven days longer. Then the fifteenth day of that month was the first day of unleavened bread, which God commanded (as we read here, chap. ix.) to be observed in the first month, and lasted till the two-and-twentieth. The rest of the month we may well suppose was spent in giving, receiving, and delivering the laws mentioned in the book of Leviticus. After which, on the first day of the second month, he began to number the people, according to the command in the beginning of this book, which may be supposed to have lasted three days. And then on the fourth the Levites were numbered: on the next day we may suppose they were offered to God, and given unto the priests: on the sixth day they were expiated and consecrated (as we read in the next chapter); and on the seventh day their several charges were parted among them, (of which we read chap. iv.) After which the princes, he supposes, began to offer upon the eighth day of the second month, for the dedication of the altar, which lasted till the nineteenth day inclusively: and on the twentieth day of this month they removed (as we read chap. x. 11, 12.) from Sinai to the wilderness of Paran.

Ver. 12. And he that offered his offering the first day.] By God's order, no doubt.

Was Nahshon the son of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah.] He held the principal place among the Israelites, being the nasi, the prince or captain (as we translate it, Numb. ii. 3.) of the children of Judah, who had the first standard. And yet he alone, of all the twelve great men here mentioned, is not called nasi, prince of Judah, as all the rest are called princes of their tribes, (ver. 18. 24. 30, &c.) but simply Nahshon of the tribe of Judah. The Jews give several reasons of it: but perhaps it was, because he offered first, which was honour enough; and there needed no more to be said of him.

Ver. 13. And his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was a hundred and thirty shekels, and one silver bowl, &c.] It appears by the metal that this charger and bowl were of, that they were for the use of the altar of burnt-offerings in the outward court, for all the vessels of the sanctuary were of gold. And I take this charger (or broad dish, or platter) to have been offered, for receiving the flesh which was offered at the altar, or the fine flour for the meat-offerings. And the bowl received the blood, or was used for pouring out wine.

Both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil, for a meat-offering.] Which was to attend upon the burnt-offering and the peace-offering, mentioned ver. 15. 17. See chap. iv. 7. where I observed, it was not difficult to procure this fine flour in the wilderness.

Ver. 14. One spoon of ten shekels of gold, full of incense.] Both the metal of which it was made, and that which was in it, shew this spoon was for the use of the golden altar in the sanctuary: which may incline one to think, that both altars were now dedicated; that is, first began to be used for the service of the whole congregation. (See ver. 88.)

Ver. 15. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year.] There are so many sacrifices mentioned here and in the two following verses (no less than twenty-one in all), that, together with the silver and gold plate, they look like too great a present to be made out of one man's private estate: and therefore some have thought, that the rest of the great men of the tribe of Judah joined with Nahshon in their contributions towards it; and that it was offered in his own and their names.

For a burnt-offering.] This is first mentioned, as being the most ancient sort of sacrifice, long before we read of any other; and being an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over all.

Ver. 16. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] This in all likelihood was first offered, though the other be first mentioned. For in the next chapter we find the burnt-offering enjoined in the first place; but the sin-offering offered before it, (chap. viii. 8. 12.) The like I observed before, (chap. vi. 16. see there.)

Ver. 17. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year.] These sacrifices were more numerous than the burnt-offering or the sin-offering; because the priests, and the princes, and as many of the people as they invited, had their share of them, and feasted before the Lord upon them, with great rejoicing: which custom, as Mr. Selden observes, flowed from hence to the gentiles, who dedicated their altars, and temples, and statues, &c. with much ceremony; and the ancient Greeks, πολυτελεστέροις ἱερείοις, with more sumptuous sacrifices. See lib. iii. de Synedriis, cap. 14. num. 3. where he also shews, how they were dedicated among the Romans with plays, and feasting, and public largesses; and at last their feasts became anniversary, as the feast of dedication among the Jews was, after the times of Antiochus, (num. 6, 7.) In which feast there was Ανχνοκαΐα, illuminations (as we now speak), by setting up of candles, or lamps, in token of joy, (cap. 13. num. 9.)

This was the offering of Nahshon, the son of Amminadab.] And was the pattern which all the rest followed.

Ver. 18. On the second day.] Their offerings were thus distributed, to be offered on several days, that confusion might be avoided; and that every tribe might distinctly express their devotion to God, and be graciously accepted by him; and the solemnity be made the more remarkable, by continuing it so long as twelve days. For which reason the feast of dedication, after Mattathias had purged the temple and the altar, after the profanation of them by Antiochus, was kept eight days by the Jews in following times; and this Parascha (as they call it) of the law, from chap. vi. 22. to chap. viii. 4. of this book, was wont to be read at that feast; as the same Mr. Selden observes, (cap. 13. n. 7.) As among the Romans, he observes, (cap. 14. n. 7.) there was a feast of like nature kept six days.

Nethaneel the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer.] This tribe, and Zebulun, being under the standard of Judah, are the next that offer. And so they proceed in the same order; Reuben, and those under his standard offering next; because they encamped next to them, (ver. 30. 36. 42, &c.)

Ver. 19. He offered for his offering one silver charger, the weight whereof was a hundred and thirty shekels, &c.] It may be observed, once for all, that there is no difference in the offerings of these princes; but all offered plate of equal weight, and an equal number of sacrifices, without the least variation: either by common agreement, or by the Divine appointment; that the vanity of vying one with another might be prevented; and none might brag of their outdoing their brethren; and all might be confident that they were equally interested in the altar, and accepted by the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 24. On the third day Eliab the son of Helon, &c.] Here it may be observed, that Moses thought fit to set down distinctly, and at length, the offerings of the princes of every tribe (as he doth here, and in the following part of this chapter), though they were the very same, without any difference; that an honourable mention being made of every one apart, none might think themselves in the least neglected.

Ver. 30. On the fourth day Elizur, &c.] There is nothing new to be noted of him, or any of the rest; because the same thing is repeated, for the reason forementioned.

Ver. 48. On the seventh day Elishama, &c. offered.] This solemnity was not interrupted by the sabbath; but the offerings continued then, as upon other days.

Ver. 84. This was the dedication of the altar.] By these oblations and sacrifices; which were simple and plain, though costly and magnificent. With which the gentiles were not content, but used sometimes barbarous rites in their dedications; as appears by their taurobolia and criobolia in honour of the mother of the gods, &c. (See Selden in the forenamed book, cap. 14. n. 8, 9.)

In the day when it was anointed.] The dedication lasting twelve days, it is apparent the word day, in this place, necessarily signifies the time (were it more or less), wherein a thing was done; as I observed ver. 1. and see ver. 88.

By the princes of Israel.] From whose examples princes and great men should learn (as Conradus Pellicanus well applies all this), "to be devoutly religious; and to possess the fear and reverence of the Lord God in their breasts: to be strong in faith; far from covetousness; unanimous in their endeavours to do honour to God; to give a good example of faith and good works to others; to seek the profit of their subjects; assist the servants of God; lend their helping hand to the proficiency of true piety; provide the ministers of the church with all things necessary, that religion be not neglected and contemned by their poverty; for the sake of God whom they serve, to do them honour by word and deed; and follow their godly admonitions, &c. This is a profitable allegory (saith he) of this history: and we need not seek for one more ingenious. As for those who highly value the allegorical sense of all these things, habent alios qui gustui suo consulent et curiositati; they may find other commentators to please their taste, and satisfy their curiosity."

Twelve chargers of silver, twelve silver boards, &c.] In these and the following words the whole sum of the oblations and sacrifices is set down by Moses; that every reader, in all future times, might see (without the trouble of casting up the account) how devout and generous their ancestors were.

Ver. 87. All the oxen for the burnt-offering were twelve bullocks, &c.] Whether there were any prayers made for a gracious acceptance of the sacrifices, which should be hereafter made on this altar, we are not told. But the sacrifices themselves were in the nature of supplications; and it is likely, they that offered them made their humble petitions with them. And so the gentiles always did at the dedication of their temples or altars: an instance of which is observed out of Gruter, by Fort. Scacchus and by Selden, in these words: "Hanc tibi aram Jupiter Opt. Max. dico dedicoque uti sis volens propitius mihi collegisque meis," &c. Which is a dedication of an altar to Jupiter, with a prayer that he would be gracious to him that dedicated it, and to his friends and neighbours. The like dedication there is of a temple to Priapus, near Padua, with this prayer, that he would constantly guard their fields, &c. (Myroth. Sacr. Elæochrys. 2. cap. 28. lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 14. p. 290. 309.)

With their meat-offering.] Which was brought in the twelve chargers and bowls, as a necessary appendix to the burnt-offerings and the peace-offerings; as is fully explained chap. xv. 8, 9.

Ver. 88. This was the dedication of the altar.] Which is repeated here again, to shew why it was called the dedication; because this was the first solemn sacrifice which was offered for the tribes, or particular persons among them; and therefore was the more sumptuous.

After that it was anointed.] Here the word day is omitted, (which is used ver. 1. and ver. 84.) Moses intending only to let posterity know that this dedication followed not long after the anointing of the tabernacle and the altar; whereby it was sanctified to God's service.

Ver. 89. And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with Him.] That is, with God. This seems to be here mentioned, because he had lately had a special occasion to go and inquire particularly of God, about a matter of great concernment, as will appear from chap. ix. 8, 9. And it is likely he had gone in twice upon this occasion, to consult him about the offering of the princes, (ver. 4, 5. 10, 11.) and now, it is possible, went in again, to know if the Lord would give him any further directions.

Then he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy-seat, &c.] There God promised to meet him, and to commune with him, &c. (Exod. xxv. 22.) which supposes he would be always present there. And so he was; for the cloud of glory filled the house after it was set up, (Exod. xl. 33, 34,) from whence God spake to him, (Lev. i. 1.) and told him he would appear (i. e. reside constantly) in the cloud upon the mercy-seat, (Lev. xvi. 2.) Now here he relates how God appeared and communed with him from thence; which was by a voice that he heard of one speaking to him, as he stood in the outward part of the sanctuary. So the Jews understand it; particularly R. Solomon, who thinks that Moses only entered into the sanctuary, and, standing in the very entrance of it, heard the voice speaking to him from between the two cherubims: which was very clear and strong; but went no farther than into the sanctuary, where Moses alone at that time was. So they observe in Siphri, as Buxtorf notes in his Histor. Arcæ Fæderis, cap. 15.

And he spake unto him.] With an audible voice; and so distinctly, that he perceived and understood every word. Which Abarbinel thinks God vouchsafed for this reason; that, as he visibly represented to him in the mount the pattern of the tabernacle, and of every thing belonging to it, whereby the form and figure of every particular was imprinted on his mind, and he was the better able to give directions how to make them exactly: so he being to write in his law all that God required them to do, he delivered every thing to him in an audible voice; that he might set down in these books the very words and phrases which he heard with his ears from the mouth of God, as plainly as if he had described them from some ancient volume.

To which I cannot but add, that this audible articulate voice from God, which was perceived by human ears, represented God as if he was incorporate; and may well be looked upon as an earnest of that great mystery, God manifested in the flesh; who in the fulness of time became a man, and spake to all the Jews familiarly in their own language.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] When this was spoken is not certain. If Moses went into the tabernacle immediately after the princes had offered (ver. 89. of the foregoing chapter), it may be thought he then spake these things to him. But both this, and what follows concerning the Levites, seem rather to have been delivered after the order for giving them to the priests, and settling their several charges, (chap. iii. and iv.) But some other things intervening, which depended upon what had been ordered concerning their camp, and that of the Israelites, (see ver. 4.) Moses omits this, till he had set down them, and some other matters, which he had received from God. (See chap. vii. 11.)

Ver. 2. Speak unto Aaron, and say unto him, When thou lightest the lamps.] At the same time the public service of God began at the altar of burnt-offerings (of which he speaks in the foregoing chapter), the setting on the shew-bread, offering incense, and lighting the lamps, were begun in the sanctuary. The last of these is only here mentioned: but it supposes the other.

The seven lamps shall give light over against the candlestick.] Upon the table which was over against the candlestick; as the Vulgar Latin very well explains it: which is rather a paraphrase upon these words than a translation of them, in this manner: When thou lightest the seven lamps, let the candlestick be set up on the south side, (for so it was ordered, Exod. xxvi. 35.) and so Moses set it, (chap. xl. 24.) and let the lamps look towards the north, over against the table of shew-bread, see Exod. xxv. 37. where there is the like obscure expression, but to this sense. And thus this verse may be translated exactly out of the Hebrew, When thou settest up the lamps, the seven lamps shall shine before the face of the candlestick, i. e. enlighten all the room that is opposite to it; for there were no windows in the sanctuary, and therefore these lamps were lighted.

Ver. 3. And Aaron did so: he lighted the lamps thereof, &c.] For God's table being placed over against the lamps, where he was represented as feasting with his people (which nobody doth in the dark), it was but fit that there should be continual light in that place. And this, as I take it, is the first time that the lamps were lighted, when the altar was dedicated, and the public service of God began, which continued ever after.

Ver. 4. And this work of the candlestick was of beaten gold, &c.] Upon this occasion he briefly repeats what is more largely said concerning the structure of this candlestick, Exod. xxv. 31, &c. and xxxvii. 17, &c.

Ver. 5. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] That which follows plainly belongs to what was said, chap. iii. 7.

Ver. 6. Take the Levites from among the children of Israel.] In that place (chap. iii. 7.) he bade Moses give them to Aaron and his sons, out of the children of Israel; and now he executes it.

And cleanse them.] He had given them their charge, (chap. iv.) and now he prepares them for the performance of it: for they could not be fit to attend in the tabernacle till they were purified, and, in some sort, consecrated to that service.

Ver. 7. And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them.] Here he directs how they were to be purified; and then (ver. 9, 10, &c.) how they were to be consecrated or dedicated to God.

Sprinkle the water of purifying upon them.] The manner of making this water is not described till chap. xix. 9. but, in all likelihood, had been ordered and made before, because the Levites were sprinkled with it; as those also were who had been defiled by the dead, (chap. xix. 13.)

And let them shave all their flesh.] The greatest purity was required in them; for they are here ordered to be cleansed, according to the cleansing of a leper, (Levit. xiv. 8, 9.) and of a Nazarite, when he was defiled by the dead, (Numb. vi. 9.) R. Levi ben Gersom thinks there was this moral signification in this shaving; that they were hereby admonished, "To cast away all worldly cares, as much as might be, and wholly give themselves to their sacred ministry."

And wash their clothes.] That their bodies being cleansed might not be defiled by foul apparel.

Ver. 8. Then let them take a young bullock.] For a burnt-offering, as is manifest from ver. 12.

With his meat-offering.] Which always attended upon burnt-offerings, (chap. xv. 9.)

And another young bullock shalt thou take for a sin-offering.] This being offered for the whole body of the Levites, is the same sacrifice that is ordered when the whole congregation of Israel sinned through ignorance, (Lev. iv. 13, 14.)

Ver. 9. And thou shalt bring the Levites before the tabernacle of the congregation.] To the door of it, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood, (Exod. xl. 6.)

And thou shalt gather the whole assembly of the children of Israel together.] The Hebrew words, col adath, which we translate the whole assembly, frequently signifies all the elders of Israel; as in chap. xv. 4. xxv. 7. and xxxv. 12. And it cannot well have any other sense in this place, as appears from the next verse.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt bring the Levites before the Lord.] Present them to him at the altar.

And the children of Israel.] The elders of the people mentioned in the foregoing verse. For all the children of Israel could not possibly do what is here enjoined; but some of them in the name of the rest; and none so proper as their rulers and governors, who were their representatives.

Shall put their hands upon the Levites.] As men used to do upon their sacrifices; which signified the devoting of that beast to God, by him who laid his hand on it at the altar, for such purposes as he brought it. And this was done by private men in their burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, as well as in their sin-offerings; (see Levit. i. 4. chap. iii. 2. and viii. 13.) but the Jews observe, that the whole congregation laid their hands only upon the sin-offering that was offered for them, (Lev. iv. 15.) Therefore the Levites are here to be considered under that notion; as is manifest from ver. 19. where God is said to have given them to Aaron, &c. to make an atonement for the children of Israel. For the Levites being given to God instead of the first-born, by the sanctification of which first-born to God, (as it is called, Exod. xiii. 1.) the whole family was sanctified, and their sin, after a sort, expiated; the offering of the Levites after this manner to God, was to have the same effect that the offering of the first-born had; viz. the sanctification and atonement of the children of Israel.

Ver. 11. And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord, for an offering of the children of Israel.] The Hebrew words are more significant; Aaron shall wave the Levites before the Lord, for a wave-offering, &c. I have often observed before, that this waving, or agitation to and fro before the altar, (of which, see Exod. xxix. 24.) was a solemn consecration of a thing to God, as a sacrifice: and therefore the Levites were presented unto him, under the same consideration as the first-born were. But it was impossible for Aaron to wave them, as he did some parts of a sacrifice; and therefore, it is probable that he lifting up his hands, and turning about to all sides (as he did when he offered a wave-offering), they, at his command, imitated the same motion; and so were offered up to God, and became wholly his. (See ver. 21.)

That they may execute the service of the Lord.] Or, as it is more significantly in the margin, that they may be to execute, &c. Which expresses the intention of this waving them before the Lord, that, being wholly given up to him, they might become meet to execute that service to which he appointed them at his house.

Ver. 12. And the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks.] It being evident, from ver. 19. that the Levites were considered as an expiatory sacrifice; and yet, not being to be devoted to death (no more than the first-born were), these two sacrifices, one for sin, the other a burnt-offering, were substituted in their stead. Upon which, therefore, they were to lay their hands, that the sin, which the children of Israel laid upon them, (ver. 10.) might be transferred to these beasts, by laying their hands upon them, to be actually sacrificed unto God, by shedding their blood.

The one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, unto the Lord.] The burnt-offering was mentioned first, ver. 8. being the most ancient of all offerings, from the beginning of the world: but the sin-offering is offered first, to make the other acceptable. And so it was when Aaron was consecrated, (Lev. viii. 14, 18.) and when he offered for himself, (Lev. ix. 8. 12.) and for the people, (ver. 15, 16.) and (to name no more) in the cleansing of a leper, (chap. xiv. 19.)

To make an atonement for the Levites.] The sin-offering properly made the atonement; and the burnt-offering declared its acceptance.

Ver. 13. And thou shalt set the Levites before Aaron and his sons.] As they were brought before the Lord, because they were to be given unto him, (ver. 9.) so now they were set before Aaron and his sons, because they were given by God to them, (ver. 19.)

And offer them for an offering unto the Lord.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, and wave them for a wave-offering unto the Lord. Some imagine, that as Aaron waved them before, (ver. 11.) so now they were in like manner waved by Moses. But it seems to me more probable, that the meaning is, they being waved, &c. should be set before Aaron and his sons, and presented to them as God's gift, according to his order, (chap. iii. 9.) And so these words ought to be translated, after thou hast waved them for a wave-offering; that is, after Aaron, by his order, had waved them: and thus the like words must be understood, ver. 15. (See there.)

Ver. 14. Thus shalt thou separate the Levites from among the children of Israel.] By the forementioned purification, (ver. 7.) and oblation, (ver. 10, 11.)

And the Levites shall be mine.] They became his, by this solemn oblation of them to him, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 15. And after that shall the Levites go in.] To the court of the tabernacle, where they were to attend upon the priests, and assist them in their ministry, and in taking down the tabernacle when it was to remove.

To do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.] In the court of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offering stood: for into the sanctuary itself none but the priests entered; and there was no ministry there in which the Levites were to assist.

And thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them for an offering.] Or rather, after thou hast cleansed them, and offered, &c. according as was directed, ver. 7. 11.

Ver. 16. For they are wholly given unto me, &c.] God commanded them before to be taken from among the children of Israel, (chap. iii. 45.) and now they are given to him. The word is repeated twice in the Hebrew, given, given (which we translate wholly given), because the children of Israel had devoted them to him, by laying their hands on them, (ver. 10.) and Aaron had waved them as a wave-offering to the Lord, (ver. 11.)

Instead of such as open every womb, &c.] See chap. iii. 12, 13.

Ver. 17. For all the first-born of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast, &c.] Exod. xiii. 2.

Ver. 18. And I have taken the Levites for all the first-born of the children of Israel.] By the exchange mentioned chap. iii. 2. 13. 45.

Ver. 19. And I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron, and to his sons, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are more emphatical, I have given the Levites given, &c. that is, the Levites, which are given unto me, (ver. 16.) I have given unto Aaron and his sons, (chap. iii. 9.)

To do the service of the children of Israel.] See chap. iii. 7. The Vulgar Latin translates it, to serve me for the children of Israel; i. e. to do them service, by assisting the priests in offering sacrifice for the people.

In the tabernacle of the congregation.] See ver. 15.

And to make an atonement for the children of Israel.] Not by offering sacrifice, for that was the work of the priests alone; but by being offered themselves, in the nature of an expiatory sacrifice unto God, as I observed before, (ver. 10. 12.) For though they were not slain at the altar, as sacrifices were, yet they might expiate, as the scape-goat did; which was sent away alive into the wilderness, after it had been presented unto the Lord, as these Levites were, (Levit. xvi. 7. 10.)

That there be no plague among the children of Israel.] As there would have been, if any man had presumed to officiate in the house of God, but such as were, in this manner, taken by himself to minister there.

When the children of Israel come nigh unto the sanctuary.] To worship God, and to bring their sacrifices to be offered at his altar.

Ver. 20. And Moses and all the congregation of Israel.] i. e. The elders of the people, (ver. 9, 10.)

Did to the Levites according unto all that the Lord commanded Moses concerning the Levites, &c.] Separated them to God from the rest of the Israelites, as he had directed, (ver. 14.)

Ver. 21. And the Levites were purified, and they washed their clothes.] According to the order given, ver. 7.

And Aaron offered them an offering before the Lord.] Or rather, waved them a wave-offering, &c. as I observed ver. 11. To which may be added, that it is likely some of the Levites were thus waved in the name of all the rest; for there being two-and-twenty thousand of them, (chap. iii. 39.) one cannot well conceive how they should be every one thus offered.

And Aaron made an atonement for them to cleanse them.] See ver. 12.

Ver. 22. And after that the Levites went in to do their service in the tabernacle of the congregation.] According to the directions given ver. 15.

Before Aaron and before his sons.] In their presence, and by their direction.

Ver. 23. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After the foregoing commands, he gave him some further instructions.

Ver. 24. This is it that belongeth unto the Levites.] Add this to what hath been said about them.

From twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in.] Then they might begin to take the custody of the tabernacle upon them, and to be door-keepers, to keep out strangers and such as were unclean; but not to load the waggons, and do such-like work of burden, till they were thirty years of age. (See chap. iv. 3.)

To wait upon the service of the tabernacle, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are to war the warfare of the tabernacle; which is a phrase often used before, chap. iv. 3. 23, &c. and there applied to those that carried the tabernacle: which they might not do till thirty years of age, but might go in to learn at five-and-twenty, as some reconcile these two. But Abarbinel notes, that there is nothing said of their learning, but of their service, or ministry; and therefore at twenty-five years old they began that part of the service which consisted in the custody of the tabernacle.

Ver. 25. And from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof.] In the Hebrew, shall return from the warfare of their service, i. e. be discharged from their function, and no longer burdened with any laborious work, as that of carrying the tabernacle was.

And shall serve no more.] In such manner of work.

Ver. 26. But shall minister with their brethren.] This ministry is explained in the following words, to keep the charge; that is, to take care of the tabernacle, unto which they were to be a guard.

In the tabernacle of the congregation.] See chap. iv. 3.

And shall do no service.] In the Hebrew, serve no service; that is, do no laborious work (as was said before), their age beginning to require ease and rest; and therefore no ministry was required of them, but what they might well perform without pains and labour.

Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites touching their charge.] Appoint them their ministries, according to these rules.

which were observed after the ark of God was settled, and there was no occasion to remove it any more; when David, therefore, instead of carrying the ark and the tabernacle (for which there was then no further occasion), appointed them to be singers in the temple, and porters, &c. for which they were fit at twenty years of age; but continued their employment no longer than till fifty (as the Jews tell us), when their voice began to decay. Whence that observation of Abarbinel upon this very chapter: "Age makes Levites unfit for service, not blemishes in their bodies; but priests are unfit by blemishes in their bodies, not by age:" for priests continued their service as long as they lived; and though they did not begin it till twenty years of age, yet no law of God forbade them to begin sooner.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai.] Or, the Lord had spoken; for he relates now what was done a month ago; but not recorded till now, for a special reason: which was, that God having commanded them, in the month before this, to keep the Passover, some persons were unprepared for it; and thereupon a question arose, what course they should take? for they were much troubled they could not do as their brethren did: which produced a new command from God, that they should keep the Passover in this second month of the first year after they came out of Egypt. This Moses being to give an account of, as a matter of great importance, he doth it in the proper place for it, when he was relating what things were done in this month, (chap. i. 1.) and deferred the mention of keeping the Passover in the first month, till he could speak of them both together.

In the first month of the second year, after they were come out of the land of Egypt.] In which month they were commanded to keep the Passover, in memory of their wonderful deliverance from the land of Egypt.

Ver. 2. Let the children of Israel also keep the Passover at his appointed season.] Aaron having been lately consecrated, and having offered all sorts of sacrifices for himself and for the people; and God having declared his acceptance by fire from heaven, (Lev. viii. and ix.) God commanded the people should keep the Passover; which he had lately admonished them was one of the feasts of the Lord, (Lev. xxiii. 5.) But the first order for the observation of it, being that they should keep this service when they came to the promised land, (Exod. xii. 25.) they might thence conclude, there lay no obligation upon them to keep it here in the wilderness: and therefore, by a special precept, they are required to keep it (when the year was come about to the time of its first observation), that the memory of so singular a benefit might not presently slip out of their mind: (see Exod. xiii. 5.)

Ver. 3. In the fourteenth day of this month at even, ye shall keep it in his appointed season.] So it was ordained, Exod. xii. 6. Lev. xxiii. 5.

According to all the rites of it.] With unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, and the other rites mentioned Exod. xii. 9, 10.

And according to all the ceremonies thereof.] If there be any difference between ceremonies and rites, I should think this belongs to their eating it in haste, with their loins girt, shoes on their feet, and staves in their hands, (Exod. xii. 11.) Unto which they were not bound, when they came into the land of Canaan, when they were no longer travellers; but, it is likely, were observed here in the wilderness, when they were in an unsettled condition.

Ver. 4. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should keep the Passover.] According to all the rites and ceremonies belonging to it.

Ver. 5. And they kept the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month at even.] It was not hard to procure so much flour, as would serve to make unleavened bread for that even, from some of their neighbours about the wilderness. (See chap. iv. 7.)

In the wilderness of Sinai.] Where they rested almost a whole year; but after they removed from thence were so uncertain in their motions from place to place, that they did not circumcise their children, who consequently could not eat of the Passover: and therefore we never read of its being kept after this during their forty years' stay in the wilderness; nor would they have been obliged, as I said, to keep it now, without this special command. Yet their doctors say, that this is written by Moses, as a reproach to the Israelites, that they observed no Passover in the wilderness, but this one alone. Yet there are Christian writers, who deliver it as the opinion of the Hebrews themselves, that they kept another Passover, a little before they ended their wanderings in the wilderness, viz. in the first month of the year wherein Miriam died. (See Selden de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 2. n. 1.)

According to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did the children of Israel.] They kept the Passover on the fourteenth day at even; but perhaps did not keep the feast of unleavened bread for seven days following. For here is no mention of that; and it had not been easy to provide so much bread, the want of which was supplied by manna.

Ver. 6. And there were certain men who were defiled by the dead body of a man.] And by a late law, (for there is nothing about this in the original law of the Passover, Exod. xii.) no unclean person might eat of holy things, (Lev. vii. 20.)

That they could not keep the Passover on that day.] On the fourteenth day of the first month, at even, when the rest kept the Passover who were not defiled.

And they came before Moses and before Aaron on that day.] On the very day that the Passover was kept.

Ver. 7. And these men said unto him.] Though they came before them both, whom they found sitting together; yet they applied themselves to Moses only, as the supreme judge in such singular cases: for the judges, which were constituted by the advice of Jethro, could not resolve this hard question; and therefore they resorted to Moses, unto whose judgment all difficult causes were reserved, (Exod. xviii. 22. 26. see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 1. n. 3.)

We are defiled by the dead body of a man.] And therefore some may think, should have been excluded out of the camp, (according to what was ordained, chap. v. 2.) and consequently kept from coming with such questions, or about any other business to Moses. But it must be considered, that when this happened, the law now mentioned was not given: for this was in the first month of the second year; and that law was not given till the second month, when the camps were formed.

Wherefore are we kept back.] It was against their will that they were defiled by the dead body of a man (which perhaps they were bound to bury), and therefore they expostulate with Moses about their being denied the liberty which others had; pleading, in effect, it was not their fault that they were defiled by the dead, but rather their unhappiness; and therefore, why might they not challenge a right in this sacrifice, as well as others, seeing they had not forfeited it by any other voluntary guilt?

That we may not offer an offering of the Lord.] The Passover is called the korban of the Lord, because it was to be killed, and its blood sprinkled (which shews it to be properly a sacrifice), and then eaten by God's commandment, in a grateful remembrance of an exceeding great benefit; which shews it to be an eucharistical sacrifice. For though the first sacrifice in Egypt was to procure deliverance to them, and to avert the evil which fell on the Egyptians by the destroying angel; yet, ever after it was a thanksgiving for deliverance then wrought, by God's special favour to them: of which there was a compendious commemoration made in their paschal rites, (Exod. xii. 26, 27.)

In his appointed season among the children of Israel.] For if they did not perform all this service now, they knew it was not lawful to be done at any other time.

Ver. 8. And Moses said unto them, Stand still.] Or, wait here awhile. In which words Moses himself acknowledges the difficulty of the case; which he could not resolve, till he had first consulted the Divine Majesty about it. Which may teach judges not to be ashamed to confess their ignorance, and take advice on matters dubious; as the Jerusalem Targum here observes. But I see no such good ground for the other part of his observation on this verse; that there being four difficult causes brought before Moses, in two of them he made haste to determine; but in the other two he was slow. Those of the first sort were this, and that of the daughters of Zelophehad; (chap. xx.) these he judged presently, because they were pecuniary matters; but the other two, (viz. about him that blasphemed, Lev. xxiv. and him that gathered sticks on the sabbath-day, Numb. xv.) being capital causes, he took longer time to judge; for he put them in ward till the mind of the Lord was known: to teach those that succeeded him in the office of judges, "to make quick dispatch in money matters, but to proceed slowly in capital causes." But, as this was no pecuniary cause, so it doth not appear but he took as much time to understand the mind of God in it, as in the other two about blasphemy and sabbath-breaking: for he went in to consult with him, as he did also in the case of Zelophehad's daughters, whose cause he brought before the Lord, (chap. xxvii. 5.)

I will hear what the Lord will command concerning you.] These words seem to signify, that Moses might go into the holy place when he pleased to inquire of God; where God spake with him in an audible voice, (chap. vii. 89.) whensoever he desired satisfaction about any doubt. So Abarbinel, who in this forsakes the Talmudists: for they fancy, that because God called to Moses, and then spake to him out of the tabernacle, (Levit. i. 1.) he could never go into the holy place, but when he was called. Which was true only at that time, when the glory of the Lord had newly filled the tabernacle; so that he durst not come into it, till he was invited: but was not a general rule to be observed in all his colloquies with the Divine Majesty (that he should wait till he had a singular call to come to him); for it is plain by this place, that he went in to speak with him, whensoever he had occasion.

Ver. 9. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] He brought this case before the Lord, as his manner was in such doubts, and the Lord gave him the following answer; which was to be a rule, not only to these present inquirers, but to all posterity.

Ver. 10. If any man of you, or of your posterity, shall be unclean.] From hence the Jews observe, that this is a law concerning particular persons only; not concerning all the people, or the major part of them. For, as the Mischna saith in the title Pesachim, (cap. 7.) if all the people, or the greater part, or the priests, had contracted any defilement, they ought notwithstanding to keep the Passover, even in that defilement. But if the lesser part only were defiled, then they that were clean ought to keep it in the first month, and they that were defiled in the second. This they ground upon the very first words of this law, (ver. 6.) there were certain men; and upon these, if any man of you, &c. From whence, saith Maimonides, this doctrine follows, out of ancient tradition, that "there were some private persons, who were adjourned to the second Passover; but if the generality should be defiled by the dead, they were not to be so adjourned, but to sacrifice in that uncleanness." A great deal more to the same purpose may be seen in the forenamed Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1. n. 3.

By reason of a dead body.] This case is mentioned instead of all other of like nature. For there was the same reason for those who were unclean by a leprosy; for women in child-bed, or that were menstruous, or those that had a running issue, or had touched a dead carcass. And this some of them ground upon ver. 13. where, speaking of those who should keep the Passover, it is said in general, the man that is clean, &c. therefore, he that was any way unclean might not keep it.

Or be in a journey afar off.] Out of his own country, (for it could not be kept any where but in Judea, Deut. xvi. 2.) or at such a distance that he could not reach the tabernacle upon the day appointed. In the Mischna, indeed, this dereck rechokah, as it is in the Hebrew (a long way off), is defined to be fifteen miles from Jerusalem, or the place where the tabernacle was. Whence Maimonides saith, "If any man on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, at sunrising was fifteen miles or more from Jerusalem, this was a remote way; but if he was not so far from it, he was not comprehended in this remote way; for he might be at Jerusalem time enough in the afternoon to keep the Passover that evening; though he went but a slow pace, and that on foot. But I do not take this to be a reasonable explication. Philo hath determined the distance a great deal better, according to the interpretation I mentioned at first, lib. iii. de Vita Mosis, where he saith, the second Passover was permitted, τοῖς μακρᾶς χάριν ἀποδημίας κωλυομένοις, &c. To such who were hindered by their travels into countries a great way off, from sacrificing with the rest of their nation. For it was not their fault that they were deprived of this honour; especially considering that so small a country as Judea could not contain such a populous nation, but sent out colonies into many places. As for those who were only fifteen miles from Jerusalem, they might easily have come to the feast, if not on the fourteenth day, yet the day before; and if this distance had been a good reason to excuse their absence, most of the nation might have stayed away without any danger.

Yet he shall keep the Passover unto the Lord.] When that uncleanness is gone, and he is returned to his own country again.

Ver. 11. The fourteenth day of the second month at even they shall keep it.] They had a whole month's time given them, to dispose themselves and their affairs, so that they might be able to keep it.

And eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.] Those Jews who are called Karaites, as Mr. Selden observes in the place beforenamed, (n. 7.) expressly say, that they were not bound in the second month Passover unto more than this; to eat the lamb with unleavened bread and bitter herbs: but they were not obliged to keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, because they might do that in the Passover of the first month: for the unclean are only prohibited to eat the Passover, but not to keep the feast of unleavened bread.

If the same persons that could not keep it in the first month, happened again to be unclean in the second, they could not keep it in the third, or the fourth months: for this had been to confound one feast with another; and there is no order for it.

Ver. 12. They shall leave none of it till the morning, nor break any bone of it.] This belongs to the eating of the paschal lamb, (Exod. xii. 10. 46.)

According to all the ordinances of the Passover they shall keep it.] See ver. 3. This is to be understood of all the rites that were proper to the offering, and to the eating of the paschal lamb; but not to the keeping of the seven days of unleavened bread.

Ver. 13. But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the Passover.] In the first month, which was the time appointed for it.

Even the same shall be cut off from his people.] By the hand of the judges, or of God.

Because he brought not the offering of the Lord in his appointed season.] See ver. 7.

That man shall bear his sin.] The punishment of it.

Ver. 14. And if a stranger shall sojourn among you.] He speaks of a proselyte, who had not entirely embraced their religion; but was no idolater.

And will keep the Passover unto the Lord.] Hath a desire to join with you in the solemnity.

According to the ordinance of the Passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do.] He was to be circumcised, and his whole family; or otherwise he could not be permitted to keep it. (See Exod. xii. 44.) If he was made an entire proselyte after the Passover in the first month, and before that in the second, it was a question whether he might keep it then or not.

Ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land.] See Exod. xii. 49.

Ver. 15. And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up.] This is here mentioned again by Moses, because he is going to speak of their removal from Sinai; which was by the direction and guidance of this cloud, which settled upon the tabernacle when it was first erected, (Exod. xl. 34.)

The cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony.] The words may be exactly rendered out of the Hebrew, the cloud covered the (mischan, or) dwelling-place of God, upon (or over) the tent of the testimony: that is, over that part of the tabernacle where the ark was, the cloud appeared visible to all, viz. over the most holy place; where the Lord appeared in a glorious cloud upon the mercy-seat, (Lev. xvi. 2.)

And at even.] When it grew dark.

There was upon the tabernacle.] Upon that part of it now mentioned.

As it were the appearance of fire.] The same cloud which was outwardly dark was bright within, and turned that light side towards them in the night; when the cloudy part could not be seen nor be useful to them.

Till the morning.] Till it was day, when the cloud was more serviceable to them than the light.

Ver. 16. So it was alway.] All the time of their continuance in the wilderness. (See Exod. xiii. 21.)

The cloud covered it by day.] The word by day is not in the original: it being the manner of the Hebrew language to omit a word sometime in one part of a sentence, which the other part necessarily supplies: as in Psal. lxxxiv. 11. One day in thy courts is better than a thousand; i. e. in any other place. And Psal. xci. 7. A thousand shall fall at thy side (i. e. on thy left hand), and ten thousand at thy right hand.

And the appearance of fire by night.] As the dark side of the cloud appeared by day over the holy place, when they had need of no other light but that of the sun; so the bright part appeared every night, and that like fire; when the cloud, by reason of darkness, could not be seen, nor be serviceable to them for their direction. (See Exod. xl. 38.)

Ver. 17. And when the cloud was taken up.] Or went up from off the tabernacle, which it before covered, and appeared higher in the air. From hence to the end of the chapter, Moses gives an account of their removal from Mount Sinai, and the reason of their staying a longer or shorter time in those places to which they removed, all the time of their travels in the wilderness.

Then after that the children of Israel journeyed.] They took down the tabernacle, when the cloud was gone up from it, (as had been directed, chap. iv. 5, &c.) and followed the cloud, which went before them, and led them to the place where they were to rest, (Exod. xiii. 21.)

And in the place where the cloud abode.] Where it stopped its motion, and stood still.

There the children of Israel pitched their tents.] Set up the tabernacle, and encamped round about it.

Ver. 18. At the commandment of the Lord the children of Israel journeyed.] The motion of the cloud was an indication of the Divine pleasure, that they should move also, and go towards another station: which they did, and went on as long as the cloud moved.

And at the commandment of the Lord they pitched.] For when the cloud stood still, that was a Divine direction to them to stand still also, and there to fix their station where the cloud stood; which, as soon as the tabernacle was set up again, came down and settled upon it, in its wonted place, over the tent of the testimony, (ver. 15.)

As long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in the tents.] And as long as the cloud rested immoveable, in that new place to which it had conducted them, they likewise rested in tents round about it.

Ver. 19. And when the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days.] As it sometimes did: for Maimonides reckons that they stayed eighteen years in one place.

Then the children of Israel kept the charge of the Lord.] This phrase is used here something differently from the sense it hath chap. iii. 25. 28, &c. signifying their obedience to God in fixing their abode there where the cloud rested till it moved again, though it rested never so long.

And journeyed not.] This is the explication of the foregoing words, they kept the charge of the Lord; not daring to stir without the conduct of God, though sometimes they stayed so long in a place, that, no doubt, it was very irksome to those who were very desirous, if not impatient, to be in the land of promise. This is an instance of some regard they had to the Divine Majesty; though they did not fear and reverence him so much as they ought to have done; which appeared by their frequent mutinies and disobedience, mentioned in the following story.

Ver. 20. And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle, according to the commandment, &c.] If they had a desire to rest awhile longer in some station which was very convenient for them; yet, upon the motion of the cloud, they took down their tents and moved also.

Ver. 21. And so it was, when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed.] That is, if it did not stay a whole day in a place, but settling, in the even upon the tabernacle, it was taken up again the next morning; yet they followed its motion. This is a great instance of their obedience in this particular: for, having rested but one night, they might be weary, and very unwilling to take down their tents and the tabernacle, and travel again the next morning.

Whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up, they journeyed.] This is a further instance of their being perfectly guided by God in this matter; that, though they were at rest in their beds, yet, if notice was given of the motion of the cloud, they rose up and went after it. For they were sensible their safety depended upon the protection and guidance of this cloud.

Ver. 22. Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, &c.] These words may seem superfluous (saith Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 50.) unto those who do not consider the intention of Moses in this relation; which was, to confute the conceit of profane people, who imagined the reason of the Israelites staying so long in the wilderness was, because they lost their way. For the Arabians, he saith, in his days, still called the wilderness, in which they travelled, the wandering desert; fancying the Israelites here bewildered (as we speak), and could not find their way out; but wandered like men in the dark, backward and forward; not knowing which way to turn themselves: therefore the Scripture punctually shews, that all their removals (which were irregular), and the time they rested in any place (which was very unequal, being sometimes for eighteen years, some only for one day, or one night), were all ordered by a special direction of God. For which cause all the circumstances of their motion are recited so particularly by Moses. Which shews, also, that the way from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea (on the borders of the land of Canaan) was a plain, known, and beaten road, of about eleven days' journey; which it was not easy for them to miss. And therefore the cause of their going about, and of their staying forty years in the wilderness, is that which Moses relates.

Ver. 23. At the commandment of the Lord they rested in the tents, &c.] This is the usual recapitulation of what goes before; (see chap. ii. 34. iv. 49. vi. 21.) and here was the more necessary, because it gives an account of a most material thing, their long stay in the desert, through which God thought fit to lead them, (Exod. xiii. 17, 18.)

They kept the charge of the Lord.] Moved or rested according to the direction which God gave them.

At the commandment of the Lord.] See ver. 18.

By the hand of Moses.] By his ministry, who told them they were to be guided in their motions by the cloud. And therefore they expected no other commandment but that; the Lord being in that cloud, and telling them by its motion or rest what they should do. And when it did move, no question, it was so leisurely, as that they, their children, and cattle might follow it with ease, and be able to take their necessary refreshment.

It is observable, that in all these verses 18. 20. 23. where it is said they journeyed or rested al pi (at the mouth), which we well translate at the commandment of the Lord, Onkelos renders it at the mouth (or commandment) of the Word of the Lord: which Word he takes to have given to Moses all the commandments he received; for so he translates those words, Exod. xxv. 22. "And there will I meet thee by these; and I will prepare (or appoint) my Word to thee there:" to deliver, that is, the Divine oracles and answers to him.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This commandment concerning the trumpets, it is very likely, was given before, but not mentioned till now, when there was an occasion for one principal use of them, viz. the removal of their camp, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 2. Make thee two trumpets.] There were several sorts of trumpets, of different form, among the ancients, as Eustathius shews upon Homer's Iliad Σ. p. 1138. where he mentions six: the second of which was στροογγύλη, turned up round like a ram's horn; which, he saith, the Egyptians used (it being found out by Osiris) when they called the people to their sacrifices; Χρῶνται δὲ αὐτῇ πρὸς θυσίαν καλοῦντες τοὺς ὄχλους δι' αὐτῆς. It was called in their language Χνουή. Now in this Moses opposed the Egyptians (which they would do well to take notice of, who make their customs to be of the greatest antiquity); for those which he here ordered to be made were long, such as we use at present. So Josephus tells us, in whom there is a large description of them, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 11. where he saith they were a cubit long, and narrow, like a pipe; but wider, as ours are, at the bottom.

Though only two be now ordered for present use, it did not hinder their making more hereafter; when both priests and people also were multiplied: see 2 Chron. v. 12. where, in Solomon's time, there were a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets. And Josephus mentions a vast number more, (lib. viii. Antiq. cap. 2.)

Of silver.] These being sacred trumpets, as Josephus frequently calls them, it was fit they should be made of this pure metal; which gave them also a shriller sound.

Of one whole piece shalt thou make them.] As he did the candlestick, (Exod. xxv. 31.) which made them the more firm, and apter to give a certain and distinct sound.

That thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps.] These are the two great uses for which they were designed: unto which some think a third is added, (ver. 9. see there.) It is certain, that in ver. 10. another use of them is assigned.

Ver. 3. And when they.] i. e. The priests, (ver. 8.)

Shall blow.] With an equal and continued sound.

With them.] With both the trumpets, as appears from ver. 4.

All the assembly shall assemble themselves to thee.] By this kind of sound, with both the trumpets, the people understood that the whole congregation was called to meet together.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Which seems to have been the usual place where they assembled; and made their meeting the more solemn, because it was before the Lord.

Ver. 4. And if they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes which are heads, &c.] If only one trumpet made the sound beforementioned, it was intended to summon only the princes of Israel to attend Moses.

Shall gather themselves to thee.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as was said before.

Ver. 5. When ye blow an alarm.] When they did not simply blow with a long, even, and plain blast; but with an interrupted, and a broken or trembling sound: which had, as the Jews say, a plain note before, and after that a quavering. We generally explain it by a tara-tan-tara: but that word (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) signifies a blast, which put the quavering sound before and after, and the plain note in the midst; which is contrary to the Jewish description of it. (See Temple Service, chap. 7. sect. 2.) Hottinger makes no other distinction between the foregoing sound, (ver. 3.) called tekiah, and this called teruah; but that the former was equal, and this was quick and concise, (Analect. Dissert. iii. p. 152.)

Then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward.] viz. If this alarm was blown only once, (as appears from ver. 6.) then the hosts that were under the standard of Judah began to march: (see chap. ii. 3.)

Ver. 6. When ye blow an alarm the second time, &c.] Having ceased for awhile, if the alarm was blown again, then those tribes which were under the standard of Reuben (chap. ii. ver. 10, 11, &c.) began to move, who lay on the south side.

They shall blow an alarm for their journeys.] That is, they shall blow a third and fourth alarm, for the moving of the other two standards. So the LXX. rightly explain it, in so many words at length; Ye shall blow an alarm the third time, and the camps that lie towards the sea (i. e. on the west side) shall take their journey; and ye shall blow the fourth alarm, and they that lie towards the north, &c. In what order the camp of the Levites moved, is related afterward, ver. 17. 21.

Ver. 7. And when the congregation is to be gathered together, you shall blow, but you shall not sound an alarm.] Here is a manifest distinction between plain blowing and sounding an alarm; which were for different purposes, and accordingly to be used, (ver. 3. 5.)

Ver. 8. And the sons of Aaron the priests shall blow with the trumpets.] None else were permitted to use them, either for calling the assembly together, or for their march, or at their feasts: because God would have the greater regard paid to the sound which was made by his ministers; as if he himself called upon them to attend his summons.

And they shall be to you for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations.] These trumpets shall be used by you, not only while you stay in the wilderness, but in future ages, as long as you are a nation.

Ver. 9. And if you go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresseth you, &c.] This is thought to be a third use of the trumpets; when they were going to give battle to their enemies. Which may be confirmed from chap. xxxi. 6. and from 2 Chron. xiii. 12. But this doth not exclude another meaning; which is, that they called the people together to fast and pray to God before they went out to battle. For it is certain that a fast was proclaimed by blowing of the trumpet, (Joel ii. 15, &c.) Which justifies what Maimonides saith in Taanioth, cap. 1. that they blow with the trumpet, not only when they were in danger from their enemies; but in all other distresses, by famine, or pestilence, &c. For he makes this blowing with the trumpets in this place, to be the same with that precept, Psal. l. 14. "Call upon me in the day of trouble," (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36.) The only objection that I can find against this exposition (which is very ancient) is, that Moses speaks here of blowing an alarm with the trumpets; which was not used (ver. 7.) for calling the assembly together, but for the motion of the camps, (ver. 5.) Yet one cannot conceive how they should be gathered together to make an army to fight with their enemies, but by some sort of sound with the trumpet, (see Judg. iii. 27. vi. 34.) and being met, it is highly probable they called upon God by prayer and fasting for good success; as the latter part of this verse intimates. Besides, these silver trumpets seem to have been used only at the sanctuary; and other trumpets were used when they went to war. For at the siege of Jericho, the priests blew with horns, not with these silver trumpets. Therefore, they may well be thought here to have called them to the sanctuary to pray to God before they went to war; and that by blowing an alarm, whereby they understood the meaning of the summons. And if we may believe the Jews, they used, when the temple was built, to blow an alarm every morning at the opening of the gates of it; particularly at the opening of the east gate, called the gate of Nicanor (as Dr. Lightfoot observes in the place abovenamed); for which, though there was no express command, yet it was grounded on this reason, that the Levites, who were God's host, as they are often called in this book, (chap. iv. 3, &c. viii. 24.) might be awakened to come and attend their service in the house of God.

And ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God.] He will be merciful to you, and grant your request; as the next words explain it.

And ye shall be saved from your enemies.] Which is to be understood with this condition, that they turned to him with unfeigned repentance; which was the proper intention of their prayer and fasting.

Ver. 10. Also in the days of your gladness.] Here is the fourth use of these trumpets, which were blown when they rejoiced for the good success, suppose, of their arms, or any other great deliverance; like that mentioned Esther ix. 19. when they feasted upon the peace-offerings, which were then offered. And thus it was when Solomon built the temple, (2 Chron. v. 12. vii. 6.) and at the laying the foundation of the second temple after the captivity, (Ezra iii. 10.) and at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem, (Nehem. xii. 27. 35.)

And in your solemn days.] Mentioned in Levit. xxiii. which were proclaimed by sound of trumpet; (see there, ver. 2.) and there were great feasts upon many of them, at which the Levites, the poor, and the widows were entertained, (Deut. xvi. 11. Nehem. viii. 10. 12.) But they were not all feasts which are there mentioned; for one of those solemn days was a fast, viz. the great day of atonement. And therefore the Hebrew word mode should rather be translated days of assemblies, as our Mr. Thorndike observes; who (in his book concerning the Service of God at religious Assemblies) notes, that Moses here distinguishes three sorts of solemnities. First, The days of your gladness; which signifies solemnities to be celebrated with cheerfulness of heart, i. e. feasts. Then, The solemn days of assemblies (as he translates it); containing, besides those, assemblies for humiliation, as the day of atonement. And lastly, The beginnings of your months; to which there was a peculiar service appointed, (chap. xxviii. 11.)

And in the beginning of your months.] On the new moons, which the Jews observed, not like those other festivities and days of assemblies, upon which they abstained from all servile work; but with special sacrifices, which God appointed to be offered to him upon them, (Numb. xxviii. 11. 14.) and with the solemnity of blowing with trumpets, (Psal. lxxxi. 3.) And they were the more careful to observe the new moons, because their great festivals depended upon them; though they are not reckoned among their festivals or solemn assemblies, (Levit. xxiii.) but only the first day of the seventh month was a memorial of blowing of trumpets, (ver. 24.) which gave occasion, perhaps, for observing all the new moons in the year. And there being no express command for observing the first day of the month, but only for peculiar sacrifices upon it, and blowing of trumpets, some argue from thence, that, in the most ancient times, before the law of Moses, new moons were observed with festival joy (it being plain that they were so in the days of Hesiod); of which, though we can have no certainty, yet it is very probable, that the idolatry of worshipping the sun, moon, and stars, being then in the world, they were wont, at the appearance of every moon, to express much joy, and offer sacrifices to it. From which God intended to preserve his people, by appointing special sacrifices (with blowing of trumpets) to be offered unto himself at that time. And it is manifest the Jews were so observant of the new moons, that they seem to have regarded them next to their sabbath, as times of religious worship of the Divine Majesty, (2 Kings iv. 23. Isa. lxvi. 23. Amos viii. 5.)

And thus I find, that, among the Athenians (whose laws are observed by many to have been derived from Moses), the first day of the month was ἱεροτάτη ἡμέρα, as Plutarch speaks, a most holy day; and yet it was not a festival: nor was it consecrated to any particular god, but unto all. And there was a law, ταῖς Νουμηνίαις θύειν, that they offer sacrifices upon the first day of the month; when they went up to the acropolis (as Demosthenes tells us) to pray for the public welfare of the city, and for their own private happiness: (see Sam. Petitus in his Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. i. tit. 1. p. 85.)

Over the burnt-offerings.] Especially the morning sacrifice; at the offering of which the trumpets began to sound, (2 Chron. xxix. 27.)

And over the sacrifice of your peace-offerings.] Which, being sacrifices of thanksgiving, it was very proper to have them attended with the sound of the trumpets.

That they may be to you for a memorial before your God.] i. e. That he may graciously accept your offerings, and bless you (as the phrase signifies in the foregoing verse), when he sees his service to be your delight and joy.

I am the Lord your God.] By whose sovereign authority these commands were given; and in the observance of which they might be assured of his blessing.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year.] After their coming out of Egypt, as appears from chap. i. 1.

That the cloud was taken up.] In token that they were to begin to move, as the cloud did, (chap. ix. 17.)

From off the tabernacle of the testimony.] i. e. The most holy place, over which it resided, (chap. ix. 15.)

Ver. 12. And the children of Israel took their journeys.] After the cloud was taken up, it stood still for some time, till they had taken down the tabernacle, and packed up their own tents and household-stuff. Or else, while those under the first standard moved, they took down the tabernacle: but still the three tribes which first moved, upon the going up of the cloud, must have some time allowed to take up their own tents, &c.

Out of the wilderness of Sinai.] Where they had stayed near a year.

And the cloud rested.] After three days' motion, (ver. 33.)

In the wilderness of Paran.] Where they had several stations, besides this; which was the midway between the Red Sea and the land of Canaan; and, from the graves of those that lusted, was called Kibroth-hattaavah, (chap. xi. 33. xxxiii. 16.) where they stayed a month; and from thence went to Hazeroth: and were still in the wilderness of Paran, (chap. xii. 16.)

Ver. 13. And they first took their journey.] In the Hebrew the words are, they journeyed at the first; i. e. at their first removal; which was this.

According to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.] Not whither they pleased themselves, but according as God had before directed, when the cloud was taken up; and in such order as he appointed: (see chap. ix. 18.) and there seems to have been a special direction, by an express command, for this first removal, (Deut. i. 6, 7.)

Ver. 14. In the first place went the standard of the children of Judah, &c.] By this it appears, that the foregoing words, concerning their removal according to the commandment of the Lord, relate to the order of their march, as well as to the way they went. See, concerning those that marched under his standard, and their commanders (which are here mentioned, and in the two next verses), chap. ii. 1. 3. 5. 7.

Ver. 17. And the tabernacle was taken down.] By the Levites, (chap. i. 51.) who went about this work as soon as the cloud went up from the tabernacle; while the three tribes under the standard of Judah were setting themselves to move.

And the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari set forward.] They immediately followed the three tribes, which encamped on the east of it, under the standard of Judah.

Bearing the tabernacle.] Such parts of it, as were committed to each of their charge, (see chap. iv. 24, &c. 31, &c.)

Ver. 18. And the standard of the camp of Reuben set forward, according to their armies, &c.] Of this and the two following verses, see chap. ii. 10. 12. 14.

Ver. 21. And the Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary.] That is, the ark, the holy table, the candlestick, &c. and other things belonging to the sanctuary, (chap. iv. 15, 16, &c.) which the Kohathites carried in the middle of the four camps, for their greater security.

And the other.] i. e. The Gershonites and the Merarites beforementioned, (ver. 17.)

Did set up the tabernacle against they came.] When the cloud rested, the two foregoing camps under the standards of Judah and Reuben rested also; and settled themselves in their tents: which while they were doing, the Gershonites and Merarites (who marched between them) set up the tabernacle, that it might be ready to receive the ark, and the other holy things, which followed immediately, under the care of the Kohathites. This shews the excellent order wherein they always moved; not only without any tumult or confusion, but with such a discipline, as signified they were under the conduct of a most skilful leader.

Ver. 22. And the standard of the children of Ephraim set forward according to their armies.] After the Kohathites followed three other tribes, who were under this standard: see chap. ii. 18. 20. 22. 24. where all that was needful hath been said of the two following verses.

Ver. 25. And the standard of the children of Dan set forward, &c.] See concerning him, and those mentioned in the two next verses, chap. ii. 25. 27. 29.

Which was the rere-ward of all the camps throughout their hosts.] The Hebrew word measseph (which we translate was the rere-ward), comes from a word, which every where signifies to gather together, or collect. And therefore is here to be so understood; and the whole sentence thus rendered: Then set forward the standard of the camp of Dan, gathering to it all the camps, throughout their hosts: or, according to their armies, as we here translate the last part of these words, (ver. 14. 18. 22.) So Forsterus translates it; the meaning being, that all the rest of the people, who were not a part of the four beforementioned camps, all under twenty years old (who were not able to go forth to war), together with the mixed multitude that came with them out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 38.) and all the unclean persons, who were shut out of the camp, (chap. v. 2.) came after this hindermost standard of the children of Dan.

Ver. 28. Thus were the journeyings of the children of Israel, &c.] In this order they marched, when they removed from one station to another.

Ver. 29. And Moses said unto Hobab.] His wife's brother, as Theodoret understands it.

The son of Raguel the Midianite.] The son of Jethro, priest of Midian; for Raguel and he are thought by many to be the same person; (Exod. ii. 18. iii. 1.) or one was the father, and the other the son, and Hobab was the grandson of Raguel.

Moses' father-in-law.] These words may either refer to Raguel, who is supposed to be Jethro; and then it is rightly translated father-in-law: or they may as well refer to Hobab, and be translated brother-in-law; for so the Hebrew word choten sometimes signifies, a very near kinsman. It cannot, without great straining, be otherwise expounded in Judges i. 16. and iv. 11. After Jethro, therefore, was gone back to his own country, (Exod. xviii. 27.) Hobab, his son, stayed still with his sister Zipporah, and accompanied Moses all the time he stayed near Sinai, which was not far from Midian, whither he thought to return, now the Israelites were marching away from that neighbourhood; but Moses was desirous to have his company further, even to the land of promise.

We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you.] i. e. To the land of Canaan; for thither God intended to have brought them, shortly after this removal; as appears from Deut. i. 6, 7.

Come thou with us, and we will do thee good.] See ver. 32.

For the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.] Promised to bestow a noble country upon us for our inheritance.

Ver. 30. And he said, I will not go.] This was his present resolution, till Moses had further persuaded him.

But I will depart to my own land.] Which he was loath to leave, merely in hope of what the Israelites had not yet in possession.

And to my kindred.] With whom all men love to live and die.

Ver. 31. And he said.] i. e. Moses replied.

Leave us not I pray thee.] Do not persist in that resolution, but be persuaded to go along with us.

Forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness.] He being a borderer upon this wilderness, was well acquainted with every part of it, and the better able to advise them how to secure their camp (for the cloud only served to direct them where it should be pitched), and defend themselves from the people, on all sides, that might be injurious to them; which made Moses so earnest with him to stay with them, while they had such need of his assistance.

And thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.] To give them advice and counsel in any difficulty they might meet withal in the places where they stayed; or to direct them how to provide themselves with such things as they wanted: for he, having lived long thereabouts, could not but understand the neighbouring countries. The LXX. understand this passage, as if he desired him to continue to be what he had been hitherto in the wilderness (viz. a good adviser, like his father Jethro), assuring him, they would look upon him as an elder; that is, have him in great honour.

Ver. 32. And it shall be, if thou go with us.] Not only stay with us, while we are here in the wilderness, but go along with us into Canaan.

Yea, it shall be.] Depend upon it.

That what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee.] Give thee some part of the possession which God shall bestow upon us. Accordingly it appears, that, as Moses prevailed with him to accompany them, so he and his posterity were settled among the Israelites, Judges i. 16. and iv. 11. (where either he or his father is called the Kenite), who lived in tents, not in houses, after the manner of their forefathers in Midian.

Ver. 33. And they departed from the mount of the Lord.] viz. Horeb, in the wilderness of Sinai, where they had stayed a long time, (Deut. i. 6.)

Three days' journey.] They travelled three days before the cloud settled again upon the tabernacle; though it stood still sometimes (but did not descend) to give them time for necessary refreshment, and for sleep. (See chap. xi. 1.)

And the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey.] It is said, ver. 21. that the sanctuary was carried between the two first standards, and the two last; i. e. in the midst of the camp, as we expressly read, chap. ii. 17. which Abarbinel thinks is to be understood of all their journeys, but only this: That was the constant order of their march; first went the standard of Judah; next that of Reuben: after this, the tabernacle of the congregation; then followed the standard of Ephraim; and last of all, that of Dan. But now, in their first removal, God did them the honour to appoint the ark to go before them, in the front of all the camps; as he did when they passed over Jordan; (Joshua iii. 6.) that is, in their first and last journeys this extraordinary favour was shewn them; but in all the rest the ark went in the midst of them. And thus Aben Ezra upon this place: "This first removal was not like the rest of their removals." But I see no good ground for this exposition. The plain meaning seems to be, that the Lord, as their king and governor, led them by the cloud, which was always over the ark; just as a general leads his army, though he be not in the front of it, but in the midst, from whence he issues out his orders.

To search out a resting-place for them.] There was no need of inquiry after a fitting station for them; but he speaks after the manner of generals, who send officers before them, to take up the most convenient quarters for their army. (See Deut. i. 33.)

Ver. 34. And the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day, when they went out of the camp.] It seems this removal of their camp from Sinai was in the day-time; (as sometimes they removed in the night, chap. ix. 21.) and the cloud being taken up from off the tabernacle, so moved over the ark, as to overspread them all by day, as the pillar of fire was over them by night, to give them assurance of the Divine protection. (See note upon Exod. xiii. 21. and Psal. cv. 39.)

Ver. 35. And when the ark set forward.] There being the letter nun turned the wrong way in the Hebrew word for set forward; as there is in the word for complained, in the first verse of the next chapter; the Jewish doctors fancy it denotes here God's gracious converting his face towards them, at the prayer of Moses; and, in the following story, the people's aversion to God, and ungrateful turning away their hearts from him.

Moses said.] It was his custom to pray in this manner upon such occasions; as R. Levi ben Gersom expounds it.

Rise up.] This is an expression (saith Abarbinel) like that in Isa. xxxiii. 10. "Now will I rise, saith the Lord, and will be exalted," &c. where his taking vengeance upon his enemies is called his rising; according to Job xxxi. 14. "What shall I do, when God riseth up," &c. The next words, "Let thine enemies be scattered," &c. justify this sense.

Lord.] It seems very strange to me, that any should allege this place as a proof that the ark is called Jehovah; when the prayer of Moses is so plainly directed to the Lord himself (who was there in a glorious symbol of his presence), and not to the ark; considering also, that, in other places where this very form of speech is used, the Lord and the ark are most manifestly distinguished the one from the other, (see 2 Chron. vi. 41. and Psal. cxxxii. 8.) And yet an anonymous anti-trinitarian writer (confuted by Joseph de Voisin fifty years ago), observing that the Chaldee here, instead of the Lord, hath the Word of the Lord, is so absurd, as to say, that the ark is called the Word; because God, (saith he, p. 234.) "ante illam responsa vel oracula sua dabat," &c. before the ark gave his answers or oracles, when the priest, in dubious matters, consulted the mouth of the Lord: which exposition carries its own confutation in it; for, if the high-priest consulted the mouth of the Lord (as he speaks), then, by the Word which gave the answer, must be meant the Lord himself; to whom Moses here directs his prayer, as the Jerusalem Targum excellently paraphrases this verse; "And it came to pass, when the ark was taken up, that Moses lifted up his hands in prayer, and said, Rise now, O Word of the Lord, in the strength of thy power, and scatter the enemies of thy people," &c.

And let thine enemies be scattered.] This is a prayer, that God would put all those to flight (as he had done the Amalekites, Exod. xvii.) who opposed their passage to the promised land: as, after they came thither, they used this prayer, (Psal. lxviii. 1.) for his aid against all those who sought to dispossess them of it.

And let them that hate thee flee before thee.] This is a repetition of the same prayer, as is usual; for thine enemies, and those that hate thee, signify the very same, (Psal. xxi. 8. Dan. iv. 19. Luke i. 71.)

Ver. 36. And when it rested.] As it did wheresoever the cloud stayed, and moved no further.

He said.] He prayed again. So the Jerusalem Targum understands both this and the former verse, "Moses lifted up his hand in prayer, and said," &c. And Jonathan Uzielides, "Moses stood in prayer, and begged mercy of God, saying," &c.

Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel.] Which Onkelos thus paraphrases, Come again, and dwell with thy glory in the midst of us. And so he did; the cloud, wherein the Divine Majesty resided, settling upon the tabernacle, over the ark of the testimony, as soon as it was again pitched. Others translate it, Give rest, O Lord (which the Hebrew words will bear); secure us, that is, in peace against the incursions of our enemies, and all other dangers. R. Levi ben Gersom expounds it, Bring back the Israelites into the land of promise, where their forefathers dwelt when they were few in number; whose posterity was now increased to ten thousand thousands, as the last words are in the Hebrew. And there are those who will have this to be a prayer for their increase and multiplication into many more thousands than they were already. And thus the Jerusalem Targum (who still by the Lord understands his Word), Return now, O Word of the Lord, from the vehemence of thy anger, and come back to us in thy merciful goodness; bless the myriads, and multiply the thousands of Israelites.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND when the people complained.] Or, as it is translated in the margin, were as it were complainers, or mutterers. Which words, D. Kimchi, in his Michol, brings as an instance to prove that the particle caph (which we translate as), doth sometimes serve only to signify the truth of a thing, and to confirm it, and imports nothing of likeness. For the discontent of the people did not rest in their minds, but broke out into open murmurings and undutiful complaints. The like he observes Gen. xxv. 31. 33. and Hosea v. 10. "The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound:" where we make it to signify a similitude, but should only have taken it as a strong affirmation of the truth of the thing. (See Theod. Hackspan Disput. iv. de Locutionibus Sacris, n. 4.)

Complained.] Of their long march for three days together, with their little children, cattle, and all their baggage. So it is commonly thought; but I can see no good ground for it. For, no doubt, the cloud stood still, (though it did not come down and settle, as I said, chap. x. 33.) that they might make some convenient rests in their journey; else, how should they gather the manna that fell every night about their tents, and would keep but one day, as we read Exod. xvi.? I conclude, therefore, that this muttering was the beginning of those loud complaints which were made a little after, (ver. 4, 5, &c.) because they were not brought by this removal to a place where they might have had other food than manna, of which they now grew weary, having lived upon it near a whole year.

It displeased the Lord.] In the Hebrew, it was evil in the ears of the Lord; that is, though it was only a muttering, which did not come to the ears of Moses (as this complaint shortly after did), yet the Lord took notice of it, and was much offended at it; as it here follows.

And the Lord heard it, and his anger was kindled.] Or, when the Lord heard it, he demonstrated he was highly offended, by sending a fire among them.

And the fire of the Lord burnt among them.] Some take this phrase, fire of the Lord, to signify a great fire; as mountains of the Lord are high mountains; which came either from heaven like lightning, (as in 2 Kings i. 12.) or from the pillar of cloud and fire over the tabernacle; where the glory of the Lord appeared sometimes like unto fire.

And consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camps.] Where the mixed multitude was (as I observed, chap. x. 25.) who came out of Egypt; and may well be supposed to have stirred up the Israelites to complain of their tedious journey, which had not yet brought them near to the land of Canaan. And perhaps some of them lagged behind on purpose, that they might complain of weariness (as some take it), or rather of want of stronger food. But Bochartus hath demonstrated, that this word which we translate the uttermost parts, signifies in all, or throughout. Of which he gives many instances out of Lud. de Dieu, upon Ezek. xxxiii. 1. (See Gen. xix. 4. and xlvii. 2, &c. Hierozoicon. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.) And therefore so it should be here rendered, consumed some in every part of the camp; where they began to make complaints one to another, of their being still in a wilderness.

Ver. 2. And the people cried unto Moses.] Of whose power with God they had great experience; but had reason to distrust their own interest in him, because of their murmuring humour: for it is likely they are the same people that cried now to Moses, who before complained, (ver. 1.)

And when Moses prayed unto the Lord.] As they begged he would.

The fire was quenched.] Went out; and no signs of it appeared. So the Hebrew phrase signifies, it sunk. What number of them was burnt we are not told: it is likely not many, because the terror of it instantly made them deprecate God's displeasure, by Moses their intercessor; which put a stop to it.

Ver. 3. And he called the name of the place Taberah.] Which, for another reason, was also called Kibroth-hattaavah, (ver. 34.) They are mentioned, indeed, in Deut. ix. 22. as if they were two distinct places; but it is plain, by the story, that the things which occasioned both these names, happened in one and the same station. And therefore they were only different names for the same place; unless we suppose Kibroth-hattaavah to have been the name of that particular piece of ground in that place where the lusters were buried.

Because the fire of the Lord burnt among them.] This is the reason of the name of Taberah (which signifies a burning), which was imposed on this place, to preserve the memory both of God's judgments and of his mercy.

Ver. 4. And the mixed multitude that was among them.] The Hebrew word hasaphsuph is well translated by Bochartus, "populi colluvies undecunque collecta," the dregs or scum of the people gathered together from all parts. For the doubling of words increases their sense, in the Hebrew language, and makes the same with the superlative degree in other tongues: of which he gives many instances in his Hierozoicon, (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6.) See Lev. xiii. 19. where adamdameth signifies exceeding red; as hasaphsuph here doth a very great collection of all sorts of people, both Egyptians and other neighbouring nations, who were invited, by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt, to join themselves to the Israelites, as proselytes to their religion. (See Exod. xii. 38.) The Jews, in Tanchuma, say, there were forty thousand of them, and Jannes and Jambres at the head of them.

Fell a lusting.] He doth not say for what; and the Jews have taken the liberty to fancy what they please. Some of them say that they lusted after such women, as Moses had lately forbidden them to marry. So the paraphrase of Uzielides: Moses heard the people weeping, because those that were near of kin to them were forbidden in marriage. And he makes as if these proselytes petitioned Moses to abrogate those laws about incest. Such conceits others have indulged to themselves, (as Mr. Selden shews, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. p. 202.) when the words (in the end of this verse, and ver. 13. 18.) plainly shew they lusted for flesh to eat.

And the children of Israel also.] Though the mixed multitude were the first fomenters of this discontent, yet it run among the children of Israel throughout the whole camp; and rose so high that they fell into a great passion.

Wept again.] They had shed some tears, it seems, before, (when they complained, ver. 1.) but now they wept aloud, out of anger, vexation, and grief. Or else this weeping again refers to their first murmuring a year ago, like unto this, (Exod. xvi. 3.)

And said.] They could not refrain from bursting out into such discontented language; as argued they were extremely angry, or rather enraged.

Who shall give us flesh to eat?] It is an expression of a vehement impatient desire (mixed with despair) after flesh-meat; which they needed not to have wanted, if they would have killed their cattle, which they brought with them out of Egypt in great abundance: (Exod. xii. 38.) but they preserved them for breed when they came to Canaan; and if they killed them daily, they would not have lasted long to suffice six hundred thousand people, besides women and children. (See ver. 21, 22.) Besides this, while they continued in the wilderness, they were not permitted to eat any flesh, but only their share of the peace-offerings that were offered at the altar, (Levit. xvii. 3—5.) Which lasted, the Jews think, till they came to the land of Canaan, when this restraint was taken off, (Deut. xii. 15, 16.) And, indeed, the wilderness was so barren a place, that they could there have no great increase of cattle, scarce sufficient for sacrifice. They were angry, therefore, that they were not yet brought to a country where they might have had all sorts of flesh, without killing their own cattle; and have taken their fill of that and all other food (as appears by the next verse), at as easy rates as they had done in Egypt: whereas now they despaired, as I said, of getting any such food; for so such questions as this signify, (Psalm cxiii. 5. Isai. liii. 8. John viii. 16.)

Ver. 5. We remember the fish.] This shews, that all kind of food is comprehended under flesh, for which they longed; particularly this, which is one sort of flesh, (1 Cor. xv. 39.)

Which we did eat in Egypt freely.] Or, for nothing: for they could easily catch them in the river of Egypt, which abounded with them, (Isai. xix. 8.) and in the sea also, which was not far from them; wherein was exceeding great plenty of excellent fish.

The cucumbers, and the melons, &c.] None of which grew here in the wilderness, but were there in such plenty and perfection, that they were the common food of the Egyptians; who were noted anciently for the meanness of their diet, as Casaubon observes, in lib. ix. Athenæi Deipnos. cap. 11. p. 674. Some fancy these things were the cheaper there, because the Egyptians durst not eat either fish, or leeks, or onions; as is said by Juvenal, Sat. xv. Pliny, lib. xix. cap. 6. and Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 37. where he saith, it was not lawful for the Egyptians to taste of fish. But, in my opinion, these words of the people demonstrate rather, that they were not so superstitious in the days of Moses; for they were not the words merely of the Israelites, but of the mixed multitude, who were the beginners of this mutiny, and of this sort of undutiful language; which, one would think, they put into the mouths of the Israelites, who could not otherwise have had the impudence to magnify their condition in Egypt, where they groaned under the sorest slavery.

It is a strange fancy of one of the doctors in the Talmud (in the title Jona), who by fishes understands harlots; whom this crew of mixed people lusted after.

The onions.] The Hebrew word chatzir properly signifies grass; which being no part of human food, the LXX. here render the word onions; as agreeable to the other words that accompany it. But the learned Ludolphus thinks they had no other reason for it; and therefore, out of the Arabian language, rather interprets it lettuce, or sallads, in general, which were most excellent in Egypt. (Dissert. de Locustis, par. ii. cap. 14.)

Ver. 6. But now our soul is dried away.] They speak as if they were starved; and, as we speak, had neither life nor soul left in them. Such is the vile nature of discontented ingratitude, which makes men that are advanced from a poor to a plentiful condition contemn their present enjoyments, and praise their former wretched state.

There is nothing at all besides this manna before our eyes.] They were angry that they were come to a place, where they found nothing but that of which they were now grown weary; and therefore speak of it with disdain.

Ver. 7. And the manna.] Upon this occasion he describes more fully what kind of thing it was which they despised, that it might appear how justly God was displeased with them for their ingratitude.

Was as coriander-seed.] Not in colour (for that was like bdellium, as it here follows), but in its shape and form, being round, (Exod. xvi. 14.)

And the colour of it as the colour of bdellium.] Of a pure white colour, and bright like pearl; so that it was very grateful to the eye, as well as pleasant to the taste, (see Exod. xvi. 31.)

Ver. 8. And the people went about.] Round their camp, (Exod. xvi. 13.)

And gathered it.] Fresh every morning; which made it still more acceptable, (Exod. xvi. 18, 19.)

And ground it in mills.] Into flour, with a hand-mill.

Or beat it in a mortar.] Bruised it with a pestle in a wooden or stone mortar.

And baked it in pans.] Or else boiled it (as R. Bechai expounds it) in a pot.

And made cakes of it.] Or made cakes of it in an oven, or in a pan; that is, saith the same R. Bechai, it was of such an excellent composition, that it might be dressed divers ways, or eaten as it fell. For, if they would, they might use it, saith he, for food immediately, as they gathered it; or they might grind it, or bruise it, and then either boil it or bake it; and it was agreeable in what way soever it was prepared: which Moses mentions, to shew how ungrateful they were to God, who, by one thing, entertained them with great variety.

And the taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil.] When it was newly fallen, it tasted like honey; but when it was prepared by boiling, or baking, it tasted like fresh oil, (see Exod. xvi. 31.) Or to some it had the taste of honey; to others, of fresh oil. The Jews, indeed, say it had all sorts of tastes, according to every man's desire. So the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks, (chap. xvi. 20, 21.) from the ancient tradition of the Hebrews: whereby, I suppose, they meant no more, but that it pleased every man's palate; and had in it all that could be desired in any meat; being grateful to the taste of young and old, and refreshed the spirits, and kept up the flesh of their bodies in good plight. For it is not unreasonably observed, by the aforesaid R. Bechai, that it is compared by Moses to fresh oil, which is fat as well as sweet, to shew how unjust their complaint was, that they had no moisture left in them, but were dried away, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 9. And when the dew fell upon the camp in the night.] There was a great providence of God in this, saith the same Bechai, which sent it in the night, while they slept quietly in their beds; that when they rose in the morning they might find their food ready for them. And thus, saith he, it was when they came to Canaan; the rains were wont to fall in the night-season, and not in the day-time; that they might not be hindered from their work in the fields, and in their plantations.

The manna fell upon it.] That is, upon the dew; for it did not fall upon the camp, but round about it: (see Exod. xvi. 14.) This is a further aggravation of their ingratitude, that they despised this rare food, which came not out of the earth, or the waters, but from above out of the air; and therefore was more pure and spirituous than cucumbers and leeks, &c. which crude and gross sort of food their depraved minds preferred before this celestial nourishment, which by falling on the dew was kept clean and pure for their use.

Huetius observes, that several authors, both ancient and modern, mention manna as a thing which sometimes falls in those countries (particularly in Arabia, and upon Libanus), which they call aerial honey, or dewy honey, and Syrian dew; which was fit for food. But it never fell in such quantity, nor so constantly, every day, for the space of forty years; and so delicious and hearty. All this was miraculous; as was also its melting when the sun shone upon it; and that it putrefied before the next day, except on the sabbath, and yet kept in an urn many years: (see Alnetanæ Quæst. lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 17.)

Ver. 10. And Moses heard the people weep, throughout their families.] Or, for their families: or, about the state and condition of their families, as some of the Jews understand it, though to a foolish sense: (see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. p. 203.) who they pretended could not live any longer upon manna.

Every man in the door of his tent.] It may be understood of Moses's tent, about which the heads of the several families were gathered; as mutinous soldiers are wont to be, about the door of their chief commander.

And the anger of the Lord was kindled greatly.] Which brake forth shortly after, in a great plague upon them, (ver. 34.)

And Moses also was displeased.] The same phrase with that, ver. 1.

It was evil in the eyes of Moses.] i. e. Grieved him so, that it made him wish himself rid of the burden of their government.

Ver. 11. And Moses said unto the Lord.] I suppose he went into the sanctuary to bewail himself, and pray God to relieve him, (see ver. 24.)

Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant?] By committing this people to his charge.

And wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight.] By granting the prayer which he made at his first call to this office, (Exod. iii. 2. iv. 10.)

That thou layest the burden of this people upon me?] i. e. The principal care of such an untractable multitude upon one man, to whom they resorted in all difficulties, (Exod. xviii. 22. 26.)

Ver. 12. Have I conceived all this people, have I begotten them?] Are they my children, that I should make provision for the satisfaction of all their desires?

That thou hast said unto me, Carry them in thy bosom (as a nursing father beareth the sucking child) unto the land, &c.] Take a tender care of them, as a parent doth of a little infant, and conduct them into Canaan, &c. Nothing can more lively express the affection that princes ought to have for their people (if they have any regard to the will of God), than this Divine command to Moses.

Ver. 13. Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people?] It is impossible for me to do what they desire.

For they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh that we may eat.] And yet they will not be satisfied without it. He seems to be affected with their weeping, as the most loving parents are with the tears of a sucking child, when it cries for that which they have not for it.

Ver. 14. I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me.] Let me have some joined to me to take part of this trouble with me, and help to manage them in such mutinies; for it is beyond my strength to undergo the toil of hearing all their complaints, and appeasing their tumults. Some may imagine there was no reason for this request; he having several persons already appointed to assist him, by the advice of Jethro, (Exod. xviii.) But Rasi thinks those men were burnt in the late fire; because they did not suppress the beginning of this mutiny, (ver. 1.) but perhaps join in it: and so Bechai. But the true account is rather this, that they were set only to hear and judge smaller causes; all the weighty and difficult causes being still brought before Moses, to whom also the last appeal was made in every cause: which was so great a burden, that he complained for want of help in those great things which lay wholly upon him: (see Exod. xviii. 22.)

Ver. 15. And if thou deal thus with me.] If thou leavest me still alone in this office.

Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy sight.] I shall take it for the greatest kindness to be taken immediately out of the world.

And let me not see my wretchedness.] Live to be a most miserable creature. For to see wretchedness is to be wretched; as to see death is to die, (Psalm lxxxix. 48.) And what could make such a tender parent as he was more miserable than their perpetual untowardness, together with the intolerable trouble it would give him to see heavy punishments continually befal them for their wickedness, and the enemies of God rejoice in their ruin?

Ver. 16. And the Lord said unto Moses.] Here is not the least sign of God's dislike of this expostulation of Moses with God; which seems not very dutiful: because the vexation this stubborn people gave him was really so great, that he had reason to desire to be eased of it: which, though he begged with much earnestness, yet, no doubt, with no less submission to God's holy will and pleasure.

Gather unto me.] These words are interpreted by the Talmudists, as if the meaning was, that they may be a Sanhedrin to my land; i. e. a holy, perpetual, standing council, to endure throughout all generations. For wheresoever we meet with this word li unto me, they think it signifies a thing to be established by God to all generations. The examples they allege of it are these: of Aaron and his sons he saith, They shall minister unto me in the priest's office, (Exod. xxviii. 41.) and of the Levites he saith, (Numb. iii. 12.) They shall be mine, or unto me; and of the Israelites, (Lev. xxv. 55.) Unto me the children of Israel are servants. The like is said of the first-born, (Numb. iii. 13.) of the sanctuary, (Exod. xxv. 18.) of the altar, (Exod. xx. 24.) of the holy ointment, (Exod. xxx. 31.) of the kingdom of David, (1 Sam. xvi. 1.) and of the sacrifices, (Numb xxviii. 2. See Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. n. 2.)

Seventy men of the elders of Israel.] This number is generally thought, both by the Jewish and Christian writers, to be derived from the number of persons that came down into Egypt with Jacob, (Gen. xlvi. 27.) who, saith R. Bechai, were a kind of prototype of this number in future ages. For hence they were governed by so many elders when they were in Egypt, Exod. iii. 16. (where there is no mention indeed made of seventy, but he gathers it from what followed), and those were the seventy whom we find at the giving of the law, a little after they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xxiv. 1. 9.) who are called nobles, or great men, (ver. 11.) So that this number was not now first constituted; but rather continued and confirmed.

Whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people.] For there were many elders, out of whom seventy were chosen: (see Exod. xxiv. 1.)

And officers over them.] That is (saith R. Bechai) whom thou knowest to be of the number of those who, when they were officers in Egypt over the people, were beaten by Pharaoh's taskmasters, (Exod. v. 14.) Which word officers doth not signify men that had any judicial authority; but only such as had an inspection over others, to see they did their work, and to give an account of them. But it is very likely they were persons of note, who had more than ordinary understanding and breeding, which advanced them to be inspectors of others. And therefore the Talmudists rightly observe, that the elders and officers here mentioned were, no doubt, men of wisdom and judgment; who knew how to use the authority that was committed to them. And it is not improbable (as some of them affirm) that they were chosen out of those lesser courts which were erected by the advice of Jethro. See Selden in the same place, (sect. 5.) who at large confutes Baronius and others; who say, that the number of the great Sanhedrin (which derived its original from hence) was seventy-two; and makes it appear they were only seventy; and with Moses, their head, seventy-one, (sect. 8.) And it is not unworthy our notice, that about the same time (as he observes, sect. 12.) that this number of seventy judges was here constituted in the wilderness, the great judicature in Areopagus was constituted among the Greeks, viz. in the reign of Cecrops, the first king of Athens after the Ogygian flood: when, according to Eusebius, the people of Israel were brought out of Egypt. The Marmora Arundeliana indeed say, this court was erected in the time of Cranaus; but that makes no great difference, for he was the successor of Cecrops. We do not find of what number it consisted, but it is certain it was the highest πάντων τῶν ἐν τοῖς Ἕλλησι Συνεδρίων, of all the courts among the Greeks. And it is no less observable, that, as that court began about the same time with the constitution of this among the Hebrews, so they both ended in the reign of the emperor Vespasian; as the said Mr. Selden shews in that book, (cap. 16. sect. 10.)

And bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation.] That there they might be, as it were, consecrated unto God; and that the people might know they received their authority from him.

That they may stand there with thee.] As those men who were to be sharers with him in his authority, and were like to him in wisdom, piety, and descent. So Maimonides glosses upon these words in Hilk. Sanhedr. cap. 2. where he saith, none were made members of the Sanhedrin but priests and Levites, and such of the Israelites as were descended from the noblest families; and quotes these words to prove it.

Ver. 17. And I will come down.] In a visible manner, (ver. 25.)

And talk with thee there.] To declare (perhaps in their audience) that he appointed them to the office of being the assistants of Moses in the government.

And I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and put it upon them.] He did not take away from Moses any of the gifts which he had bestowed upon him; nor did he diminish them: but conferred upon these men some of the gifts (which are here meant by spirit), viz. of wisdom, and judgment, and courage; with all others that were needful in a governor. This R. Solomon Jarchi illustrates by the comparison of a great lamp set up in a room, at which many others are lighted, without the least diminution of its light. (See further, ver. 25.)

And they shall bear the burden of the people with thee.] By this it appears it was the spirit of government which God intended to give them, that they might ease Moses, by assisting him, with the same authority that he had, to hinder or to appease such mutinies as now the people were fallen into.

That thou bear it not thyself alone.] That all the murmurings of the people might not be only against him; but some of their complaints might be diverted unto others: who might also help him in the judging of such causes as had hitherto been reserved to him alone. For it is plain that these seventy persons made a higher court than any of those constituted by the advice of Jethro.

Cornelius Bertram indeed fancies, that these rulers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, not being sufficient for the business committed to them (though he likewise conceives they had some of their several families joined with them), God appointed these seventy for their assistance, to whom they were to bring all causes which they could not determine, before they troubled Moses with them, (lib. de Repub. Jud. cap. 6.) But our learned Mr. Thorndike, in his Rights of the Church, chap. 2. hath well observed, that those captains were to be in place only during the pilgrimage of the wilderness; for when they came to the land of promise, the law provided that judges and ministers should be ordained in every city, (Deut. xvi. 18.)

who, if there fell any difference about the law, were to repair to the place where God dwelt, to the successors of Moses, and these seventy, for resolution in it, (Deut. vii. 11, 12.) For, as he judiciously notes in his Review, p. 69. (suitable to what is here delivered), they were assumed to assist Moses in his great office of judging the hardest causes; and, by that law, (Deut. xvii. 8, &c.) were afterwards made a standing court, resident at the place of the tabernacle; to judge the last result of all causes concerning the law, and to determine all matter of right not determined by the letter of the same.

Ver. 18. And say thou unto the people.] All that he said hitherto concerned Moses himself, in answer to his request. Now he tells him what he should say to the people, in answer to their complaint.

Sanctify yourselves.] Here the word sanctify seems to signify no more, but to prepare and make themselves ready to receive what they desired. So the Chaldee expounds it; and so the word is translated by us several times in the book of Jeremiah, (chap. vi. 4. xii. 3. li. 28.)

Against to-morrow.] He seems at the same time to gratify Moses and satisfy them: for his setting the seventy elders before the Lord, and their eating flesh, succeed one another. Or else, he immediately gathered the elders; and the next day the quails came for their food.

And ye shall eat flesh, for ye have wept in the ears of the Lord, &c.] You shall have what you long for with such vehemence, that it hath made you utter complaints against the Lord.

Ver. 19. Ye shall eat not one day.] As they did about a year ago, (Exod. xvi. 12, 13.)

Nor two days, nor five days, &c.] Not for a short time only.

Ver. 20. But even a whole month.] So long (the Hebrews gather from hence) they stayed in this part of the wilderness of Paran; or rather, a little longer. For they came hither on the twenty-third day of the second month, in the even; on which, if we suppose the fire to have burnt among them, (ver. 1.) and that the next morning, which is scarce credible, they lusted after flesh, and in a tumultuous manner demanded it of Moses, who promised they should have it; we must allow a little time for the constituting of the seventy elders: and suppose it was done on the twenty-fifth day, and that the next day the quails came (as we translate it), they were two days in gathering them: from whence, if we begin this month, it will appear they stayed here longer than that space.

Until it come out at your nostrils.] Till you be glutted with it, and vomit it up so violently, that it come not only out at your mouth, but at your nostrils.

And it be loathsome to you.] Which was both the cause and the effect of vomiting.

Because that ye have despised the Lord.] Forgetting all that he had done for them, as if it had been nothing; and slighting his servant Moses.

Which is among you.] By a visible token of his glorious presence in the sanctuary, where he dwelt among them, (Exod. xxv. 8.)

And have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?] As if he had undone them by their deliverance from thence.

Both Onkelos and Jonathan translate this verse in such a manner, that one cannot but think they had a notion in their days of more persons than one in the Godhead. For these are the words of the latter of them, Because you have despised (or rejected, as Onkelos), the Word of the Lord, for glorious is his majesty which dwelleth among us. For I cannot see how the word Memri can signify any thing in this place (whatsoever it may do in some others), but a person equal to Jehovah. And yet the anonymous writer against the Trinity (confuted by de Voisin), hath the strange unaccountable boldness to pass it by with this silly gloss, "Proprie de lege accipi potest," &c. It may be properly understood of the law, which may be contemned or transgressed: as if this could be called the glorious majesty of the Lord, which dwelt among them. What will not men say or do to serve a cause?

Ver. 21. And Moses said, The people among whom I am.] Over whom I preside, as their governor.

Are six hundred thousand footmen.] Who were able to carry arms; besides women, and children, and slaves, and the mixed multitude; who in all may well be supposed to have made thirty hundred thousand.

And thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month.] i. e. How can this be? Which is a downright distrust of God's promise, if we regard merely the words, and do not consider that they were spoken hastily, and something inconsiderately, while his mind was very much disturbed by the tumult which the people made: for which reason a severe notice is not taken of it; but he only put in mind of God's eternal power, (ver. 23.) Which may make it probable, that they were only words of admiration, how such a provision should be made for such a vast number; and those uttered on a sudden.

Ver. 22. Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them?] In the Hebrew the words are, If the flocks and the herds be slain for them, will they be sufficient for them? That is, there will not be enough for a whole month. And so the next passage is to be translated, If all the fish of the sea be gathered for them, will they be sufficient for them?

Ver. 23. And the Lord said unto Moses, Is the Lord's hand waxed short?] i. e. I need not tell thee that my power is as great as ever.

Thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee, or not.] For thou shalt be convinced of it by the speedy performance of my promise.

Ver. 24. And Moses went out.] I supposed, ver. 11. that Moses went into the sanctuary to make his addresses to God for relief; and if that be true, then that is the place from whence he now went out. But there is this objection against it, that if he had gone to consult God in the sanctuary, (as he did on some occasions, chap. vii. 89.) it would not have been said that he went out; but that he came out. For that is the usual expression in this matter. Therefore we may rather think he now went out of his own tent, where the people stood murmuring, (ver. 10.)

And told the people the words of the Lord.] Both concerning them and concerning himself.

And gathered the seventy men of the elders of the people.] That is, sent out his summons to them to attend him; though two of them, it appears afterward, did not come, (ver. 26.)

And set them round about the tabernacle.] That is, required them to come thither, and there place themselves; that the people might understand they received their authority from God; and that from thence he might send his Holy Spirit upon them. For God alone, who was their king, could appoint who should bear rule among them. There also were the great assemblies held. (See chap. xxvii. 2.)

Ver. 25. And the Lord came down in a cloud.] The Schechinah, or Divine Majesty, appeared from heaven in a cloud; or, in the pillar of the cloud, as it is in chap. xii. 5.

And spake unto him.] As he had promised, ver. 17. declaring, it is likely, the reason and intention of his appearing on this occasion.

And took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders.] See there, ver. 17.

And it came to pass, that when the spirit rested upon them.] i. e. As soon as they received it.

They prophesied.] Either by setting forth the praises of God in such a strain as none else could imitate, or giving such admirable instructions to the people, as manifested they were raised above themselves; or perhaps by declaring things to come (particularly that they should have quails, as we render the word, in great abundance very shortly, as some of the Jews take it), though that could not gain them such credit as the other gifts, till their predictions were fulfilled. And these the Jews call the second degree of prophecy: concerning which Maimonides speaks in his preface to his More Nevoch. but more fully in his second part of it, cap. 45. where he saith the first degree was, that which moved and enabled men to some heroic undertaking, with assurance they were put upon it from God; as to deliver men from tyranny and oppression: which was the Spirit of the Lord that came upon Gideon and Samson, and the rest of the judges of Israel; who were carried by an extraordinary power to perform such things, as otherwise they thought not themselves fit to undertake. And the second degree was, when a man found a power upon him, exciting him to speak either psalms, or hymns, or wholesome precepts of living; or about political affairs, and civil government, far beyond his natural capacities; and all this waking, and in the full vigour of his senses. This is also called the Holy Spirit; and in this number he places these seventy elders, who were endued with the spirit of Moses, for the government of the people with him, in such measure that they attained to be prophets. Just as in the New Testament the prophets are placed next to the apostles; so these men were next to Moses.

And ceased not.] In which translation we follow the Chaldee paraphrasts, as several others do: but the LXX. translate it, and they added no further (which the Hebrew words will well bear), taking the meaning to be, that they prophesied that day, but not after. And this is the sense of the Talmudists, particularly of Jarchi, who, in his gloss upon this place, saith: "All these elders prophesied only this first time that the Spirit rested on them, as they stood about the tabernacle; but they did not prophesy after that." The like say several others mentioned by Mr. Selden, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. sect. 2.) And indeed the Spirit was not sent upon them to make them prophets, but to make them governors and judges. And therefore the gift of prophecy, which God gave them for the present, was only to procure them reverence from the people; as an evident sign that they were chosen by God to be coadjutors to Moses, in the exercise of his supreme authority over them. And thus I find Theodoret understood it: (Quæst. xx. in Num.) The seventy did not prophesy beyond this day, ὅτι οὐ προφητείας χάριν ἀλλ' οἰκονομίας, &c. because God promoted them not to prophesy, but to govern: which St. Paul also reckons among other gifts bestowed upon Christians, (1 Cor. xii. 26.) Now, that it might appear God had conferred this Divine gift of government upon them, they also prophesied the first day that they received it. And I do not see why our translation [did not cease] may not be interpreted to this sense; that is, they did not cease all that day while they stood about the tabernacle.

Ver. 26. And there remained two of the men.] Of the seventy elders, whom Moses ordered to appear, and set themselves about the tabernacle. So the Jerusalem Targum: these were "of the number of the seventy wise men, neither did the seventy wise men go from the tabernacle while Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp." And so R. Levi ben Gersom notes: "It seems to be plain out of the text, that these two were of the seventy elders." Which our translators thought necessary to express by adding those words of the: for in the Hebrew there is no more said, but only there remained two men.

In the camp.] Among the rest of the people; from whom they would not come, out of modesty, saying, They were not equal to such a dignity; as the words are in the Gemara Babylonica, tit. Sanhedrin. Or perhaps they loved a private life; and were afraid of being envied by the people, whom they saw to be so unruly, that it made them decline the burden; as Saul did, when he hid himself among the stuff.

The name of the one was Eldad, and the name of the other Medad.] We do not find the names of any other of the seventy elders, but only these two; who, Jonathan saith, were Moses's brothers by the mother's side. And St. Jerome himself mentions such a tradition, that they were his brethren. But there is no certainty of this; nor of what others of the Jews say concerning them. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. sect. 3.)

It may be they are mentioned in honour of their virtuous modesty, which made them think themselves unworthy of so high a dignity.

And the spirit rested upon them.] As it did upon those who were about the tabernacle, (ver. 25.) Whereby God marked them out to be in the number of those whom he had chosen to be assistants unto Moses.

And they were of them that were written, &c.] Whose names Moses put into the summons, which he sent to those whom he judged fit to be advanced to this authority. The Jews (particularly Solomon Jarchi) say, they were chosen by the way of casting lots; and, according to their manner, they tell the story thus, in the place mentioned before in the Gemara:—Moses, say they, was in doubt how he should execute God's command, (ver. 16.) because, if he did not choose an equal number out of every tribe, it might be ill taken: and if he chose six out of each of the twelve tribes, they would exceed the number of seventy; if but five, they would fall short of it. He resolved, therefore, at last, to choose six out of each tribe, which, in all, were seventy-two persons: and in seventy schedules he wrote the name of elder, but the other two were blanks. Then mixing all these in an urn, he bade them come and draw: and to every one who drew a schedule, that had the name of elder in it, he said, God hath sanctified thee; but to him that drew a blank, he said, God hath not chosen thee. And those two blanks, some of the Jewish doctors say, came into the hands of Eldad and Medad; who, therefore, were left behind in the camp. And this conceit our very learned Dr. Lightfoot himself entertained, saying (in his short account of this chapter), "that six of a tribe made up the number of the Sanhedrin (which was chosen), and two over. And those two were Eldad and Medad, who were written for elders, but the lot cast them out; that there might be but seventy. Yet did the Lord honour them with the spirit of prophecy."

But as this whole story of the manner of choosing the elders is very doubtful; so other Jews, of great authority, say, that Eldad and Medad were of the number of the seventy that were chosen. Particularly Jonathan saith expressly, they were of the number of those whose schedules came up with the name of elder in them; but they did not go to the tabernacle, because they had no mind to be governors. Nay, the Talmudical gloss upon the forenamed place of the Gemara, saith, that when seventy of the seventy-two had drawn, two of them had blanks; whereby Eldad and Medad knew that the two remaining schedules had the name of elder in them, and therefore would not draw them, because they were sure not to have blanks. The very same Mr. Selden shews is in other noted books of theirs. So that it is generally received, they were in the number of those seventy which were chosen to be joined with Moses in the government. (See lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4. sect. 7.)

And they prophesied in the camp.] Which was a greater thing than if they had prophesied at the tabernacle: denoting them to be men so highly in the favour of God, that he would distinguish them from other men wheresoever they were, and not want their service. The Jerusalem Targum relates what each of them foretold (for to that he restrains their prophesying), and what they both foretold; but it is not worth the mentioning.

Ver. 27. And there ran a young man, and told Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp.] The Jews, who will seem ignorant of nothing, say it was Gershon, the son of Moses, who carried these tidings to his father.

Ver. 28. And Joshua the son of Nun.] From whence some conclude, that he was none of the seventy elders; though a man of a most excellent spirit. And indeed this is likely enough, he being to succeed Moses, and so to become the head of them.

The servant of Moses.] Who ministered to him, as a constant attendant on his person, (Exod. xxiv. 13.)

One of his young men.] The word one is not in the Hebrew, which may be translated from among his young men: i. e. the rest of those that waited on him.

My lord Moses, forbid them.] Perhaps he thought they could have no authority; not being at the tabernacle: or rather, that their prophesying too much lessened the authority of Moses; by whose consent, and in whose presence, the rest were joined to him; but these two, without his knowledge, and being absent from him, became his consorts in spiritual gifts. This he thought tended to the diminution of his master; for whom he expressed a great honour. The two Targums say that they prophesied of the death of Moses, and the advancement of Joshua to be the leader of God's people; which made Joshua the more concerned to have them suppressed. But this is like the rest of their conceits; several of which are mentioned by Mr. Selden in the place beforenamed, sect. 3.

Ver. 29. And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake?] This shews that Joshua thought it a disparagement unto Moses, that they should have the gift of prophecy bestowed on them, and be no way indebted to Moses for it; as the others were, who were brought by him to the tabernacle, where he presented them to God, as men fit to partake of it: but these two seemed to have no dependance on him for what they received.

Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets.] This shews also that the gift of prophecy was a distinct thing from the gift of government: for he did not wish they might all be made rulers; than which nothing could have been more absurd.

And that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them.] That they might all break forth, by his inspiration, into his praises: which is a high demonstration of that most excellent spirit that dwelt in Moses; which had nothing of envy, pride, or vain-glory in it: for he sought not himself in the least, but purely the glory of God, and the good of his people: which admirable temper of mind St. James from hence commends to all Christians, when he saith, (chap. iv. 5.) "Do ye think, that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? But he giveth more grace." Where doth the Scripture (by which word the apostles commonly mean the Old Testament) say any thing like this, unless it be in this place? the sense of which is fully expressed by James, as Hermannus Witzius well explains this meaning, "Doth that spirit, whereby we are regenerated and governed, move us to envy, or any such-like vicious desire? No, far from that; it giveth greater grace, and makes us rejoice in the good of our neighbours," &c. as Moses did, when he said, Dost thou envy for my sake? and thereby excitest me to the like envy? Is that suitable to the Spirit that is in us? which I wish God would bestow upon all his people. This agrees with what St. James saith, "But he giveth more grace." (Miscell. Sacr. lib. i. cap. 18. n. 27.)

Ver. 30. And Moses gat him into the camp.] From the tabernacle where the elders had been presented unto God, and endued with his Spirit.

He and the elders of Israel.] That they might exercise their authority jointly with him. And there, I suppose, Eldad and Medad were assumed into the same authority; for we do not read that they were brought to the tabernacle; being sufficiently approved by God in the camp.

Ver. 31. And there went forth a wind from the Lord.] At the prayer (it is likely) of Moses and the elders, who promised the people flesh enough, a mighty wind of an extraordinary force was raised beyond the common course of nature. The Psalmist informs us from what quarter this wind blew, when he saith, (Psalm lxxviii. 26.) "He caused the east wind to blow in the heaven, and by his power he brought in the south wind:" which some understand, as if sometimes an east wind blew, and sometimes a south; that these quails (as we call them) might be brought from several coasts. But the Hebrews wanting compound words, make use of these two words, to express that which we call a south-east wind. Or, as Bochartus will have it, the Hebrew word kadim, which properly signifies the east, doth sometimes signify the south; and is by the LXX. often so translated; of which he gives a great many instances. And therefore the Psalmist (as the manner of the Hebrew language is) repeats the same thing in other words. (See Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 15.) And so the famous Ludolphus, both in his commentary upon his Ethiopic History, and in his dissertation De Locustis, saith, they were brought in by a south wind blowing from all points of that quarter.

And brought quails.] Nobody, that I have met withal, hath laboured so much to give a clear explication of this whole following discourse as Job Ludolphus, in his most learned commentary upon his Ethiopic History, lib. i. cap. 13. n. 96. where he hath a long discourse (to which I refer the reader), to shew that the Hebrews do not take the word selau (here used) to signify quails: but we take that translation of it only from Josephus. (See what I have noted on Exod. xvi. 13.)

The no less learned Bocar, indeed, hath said a great deal to justify Josephus; and hath shewn that Egypt and the neighbouring regions abound still with quails; from whence this wind blew fair to bring them to the Hebrews. And every one knows that there are certain winds called Ornithias, from their bringing great flights of birds along with them. Quails also, he observes, are wont to fly from the southern countries to the northern, in the spring-time (as it now was), and to fall sometimes in such vast quantities as to sink a ship. Notwithstanding all which, and a great deal more which he alleges, with great learning, there are several things said in the following relation, which by no means can be brought to agree to quails; and therefore Ludolphus rather takes selau to signify locusts; by which it is easy to give a plain explication of all that is said of them. It is certain they were not only used for food in those parts of the world, but that some of them were very delicious meat in several countries; for they that have eaten them (see Lev. xi. 22.) compare them to young pigeons, or to a fresh herring, or to a crab, or lobster (like to which they are in shape and figure), and they are several ways prepared, and accounted very wholesome food, when they have thrown away the heads, and wings, and legs. Pliny saith that some parts of Ethiopia lived upon them; and that they were preserved fumo et sale, by being dried in the smoke and salted, for their nourishment, throughout the whole year. Now all that is said in this, and in the following verses, will have a plain and easy meaning (as I said), if we follow this interpretation; but not, if we take them for quails, or pheasants, or sea-fowl. As, for example, what was said before, concerning God's sending a mighty wind, is not hard to understand, if we suppose him to speak of locusts; which all authors say are brought with a wind: but it was never heard to bring quails, which cannot fly high, nor far; much less so far as from the sea to the middle of Arabia Petræa. Nor would the locusts have come this way, had not this wind brought them from their ordinary course.

From the sea.] viz. From the Red Sea, yet not excluding the Persian Gulf; which must not be understood as if they came out of the sea, but from the sea-coast; and it is very probable out of Africa, where they abound. So the aforesaid Ludolphus expounds it, in his late Dissertatio de Locustis, par. ii. cap. 39, &c.

And let them fall by the camp.] Or poured them down upon the camp, as dust or rain falls thick upon the ground. For both these comparisons the Psalmist uses in the place beforenamed, (Psal. lxxviii. 27.) And this is expressed in Exod. xvi. 13. by covering their camp.

As it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side.] A day's journey, as Bochartus makes account, is at least twenty miles. See the place beforenamed, Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 15. p. 105.; or, as Ludolphus makes the computation, sixteen miles, in his Dissertation de Locustis, par. ii. cap. 44, &c. Take it either away, it shews there was a vast number of them: for he adds,

Round about the camp.] So that which way soever they went for sixteen or twenty miles together, there lay heaps of them upon the ground: which, if we understand this of quails, cannot be conceived without a heap of miracles. And if we resort to that, what need was there of a wind to bring them, when God must be supposed miraculously to have created them as he did manna. And yet such a quantity of quails was not to be found any where, without a miracle, as would cover the heavens forty miles (according to Bochartus) on all sides. But that which would have been on many accounts miraculous, if we understand it of quails, will be found less wonderful, or rather natural, if it be understood of locusts: who come in very great and thick clouds, which darken the sky; as all authors tell us. (See Ludolphus Comment. in Histor. Ethiop. p. 188.)

And as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth.] This interpreters look upon as impossible: for then the quails would have been choked and stifled; if they had been heaped so deep one upon another. And therefore they have devised the addition of a new word; and refer this, not to their falling upon the ground, but to their flying in the air, two cubits high above the earth; that so they might the more easily be taken by their hands. So the Jews, and so Val. Schindler in his Lexicon upon the word selau. But, besides that there is nothing of this in the text; and it is contrary to what the Psalmist says, that they fell in the midst of their camp, (ver. 28.) and that they came down like rain, which always falls upon the ground; there are many other difficulties in this interpretation, (as he shews p. 189. and defends what he there asserts in his Dissertation de Locustis, par. ii. cap. 49, 50.) And therefore it is better to expound it of locusts; who, though they fall one upon another to a great depth, are not thereby suffocated, by reason of the length of their feet, and the thinness of their wings.

Ver. 32. And the people stood up (or rather, rose up) all that day, and all that night, and all the next day.] They were intent upon the gathering of them for thirty-six hours.

And they gathered the quails.] By this it is evident that they gathered something lying upon the ground, and not flying in the air: for we do not gather things there, but take or catch them.

He that gathered least.] viz. The master of every family for himself, and for those belonging to him. For we are not to suppose that every man in Israel gathered so many as follows.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Gathered ten homers.] A vast quantity if they were quails; which would have served them, not for a month, but for a year or two: as Ludolphus observes, (p. 190. of his Commentary on his Ethiopic Hist.) besides, we do not use to measure fowl, but to number them. And therefore Bochart, being sensible of this impropriety, takes the word homer here to signify a heap: which is confuted by Ludolphus in his Dissertatio de Locustis, (par. ii. cap. 54, 55, &c.)

And they spread them all abroad for themselves, round about the camp.] This is another plain indication that they were locusts; which they spread to be dried in the sun: but if they had been quails would have been very preposterous; for it would have made them the sooner stink. Interpreters therefore commonly pass by this, and give no account why they spread them abroad; and the Vulgar Latin omits this word spread: whereas all authors tell us, this is the principal way of preparing locusts, and preserving them for a month or more: which they boiled, or otherwise made fit to eat, when they had occasion. (See Ludolphus in his forementioned Commentary; and in his defence of it lately in his Dissertatio de Locustis, par. ii. cap. 97, 98, &c.)

Ver. 33. And while the flesh was yet between their teeth.] While they were eating; and therefore were in good health, and had a good stomach.

Ere it was chewed.] Before they had swallowed it.

The wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people.] They felt unexpected effects of God's displeasure; being taken, perhaps, with a sudden vomiting, of which they died, (ver. 20.) This was in the conclusion of the month; for so long (he there saith) they should eat flesh.

And the Lord smote the people with a very great plague.] He sent a pestilence among them, as Aben Ezra supposes; or, as others think, they wasted away in a consumption: the vomiting, perhaps, continuing so, that they could never retain any meat, till they died. This they gather from Psal. cvi. 15. where the Psalmist saith, "He sent leanness into their soul." But Bochartus and Menochius think he burnt them up with a fire from his presence, as at the beginning of this murmuring, ver. 1. where it is said, as it is here, "The anger of the Lord was kindled." But Bochartus grounds this chiefly upon Psal. lxxviii. 21. where it is said, "A fire was kindled in Jacob;" which he refers to this story.

It may seem strange to some, that now they should be punished so heavily, when about a year ago they murmured for flesh as they did now; and he gave it them in the even, together with manna in the morning, without any punishment at all. But it is to be considered, that, as it was a greater fault to fall into the same sin again, after God had been so good to them; so they were not in such necessity now as they were then, when they were really pinched with hunger: whereas now they were fed with bread from heaven; and therefore cried for meat, not out of need, but wantonness. And it may be added, that they were not then so well taught as they had been since; by the giving of the law to them at Mount Sinai, and many other instructions from the house of God.

Ver. 34. And he called the name of that place Kibroth-hattaavah.] That is, the Graves of Lust: because their wanton appetites threw them into those graves; for there, as it follows, they buried those that lusted.

For there they buried the people that lusted.] Not all that lusted, for then all the people who were guilty of this sin would have been buried; but all that died of the plague, which was inflicted for this sin; who, perhaps, were those that began and headed this mutiny; or were most violent in it.

Ver. 35. And the people journeyed.] When the cloud was taken up, (chap. ix. 17.)

From Kibroth-hattaavah.] From whence they departed about the beginning of the fourth month, called Tammuz.

Unto Hazeroth.] Another place in the wilderness of Paran; but how far from the former station, whether a day's journey or more, we do not find.

And abode at Hazeroth.] There the cloud rested, and accordingly there they encamped. But we do not read how long: only we are sure they stayed there at least a week, (chap. xii. 15.)

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses.] I can see no good reason that can be given why Miriam is put here before Aaron; but because she, it is highly probable, was the beginner of this sedition, and drew her brother Aaron into it.

Because of the Ethiopian woman.] Or rather Arabian woman: (see Gen. x. 6.)

Whom he had married.] Whom most both of the Jewish and Christian writers take to have been Zipporah; though some few fancy he speaks of another woman, whom he had lately married; Zipporah being either dead, or divorced. The only difficulty is, why they should quarrel with him about Zipporah; who, if she had been dead, or divorced, it is not likely he would have married a Cushite, but a Jewish woman. The Hebrew doctors have devised strange stories about his forbearing her company; which may be read in many authors; particularly in Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 26. where he recites many of their opinions about this matter. The most common is, that they were angry at his marriage with a woman of another nation; whom they would have had him put away, and taken another wife. So they interpret the following words, for he had married an Ethiopian woman: as if his mere marriage with her was the thing which they spake against. Which is not at all probable, if this be meant of Zipporah; for he had been married to her forty years; which, if they had disliked, one would think should have long before now been charged upon him as a fault. I rather think that they were jealous of his being ruled too much by her, and by her relations. For it was by her father's advice that he made the judges, mentioned Exod. xviii. 21, 22. and perhaps they imagined she and Hobab had a hand in choosing the seventy elders lately made, as we read in the foregoing chapter. With which this story being immediately connected, it makes me think it hath some relation to that. For those elders were nominated, it is evident, by Moses alone; without consulting Aaron or Miriam: who, taking themselves to be neglected, in so great an alteration made of the government without their advice, were very angry: and not daring to charge Moses directly with this neglect of them, they fall upon his wife; whom in scorn they call a Cushite or Arabian woman; which in aftertimes were accounted a vile people, as appears from Amos ix. 7. For that country was inhabited by divers nations, mingled together, viz. Ishmaelites, Midianites, Amalekites, and such-like: who, from thence, some think, were called by the general name of Arabians; because of their mixture. For Ereb, in Hebrew, signifies a miscellaneous company, or mixture of many people: see Jeremiah xxv. 20. 24. where he calls this very people by this name.

Ver. 2. And they said, Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses?] Here it appears that it was really Moses with whom they were offended; who alone had called what men he thought good to be presented unto God, to be constituted by him his assistants in the government, (chap. xi. 24.)

Hath he not also spoken by us?] Are not we also acquainted with God's mind, being prophets? For so Aaron was made, (Exod. iv. 14, 15.) and Miriam so acknowledged, (Exod. xv. 20.) And moreover the prophet Micah (chap. vi. 4.) mentions them as conductors of the people, while they were in the wilderness, together with Moses. Which might make them stomach it, that he took no notice of them when he chose the seventy elders, who were to be his coadjutors, but did it of himself.

And the Lord heard it.] Observed their ill behaviour towards him; though he himself took no notice of it.

Ver. 3. Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth.] This is added as the reason why he passed by the affront they put upon him, and why God avenged it; because he was so exceeding meek and patient (or, as others translate it, so humble and lowly), that he would have been exposed to further affronts, if God had not chastised their insolence. Moses also might think fit to set this down, as a confutation of their charge against him; being so far from that pride which they imputed to him, that he did not resent (though he was so very much above them) their undutiful behaviour towards him; who had conversed immediately with God himself, and been with him in the holy mount many days together; who sent several commands to Aaron, as well as to the people by him alone: which made such a difference between him and all others, that, as it was an unaccountable arrogance in them to equal themselves unto him, so he demonstrated how far he was from being proud of his superiority, by meekly bearing their haughty behaviour towards him.

So little cause there is for their cavils, who from hence argue that Moses was not the author of these books, because he commends himself in them: for this is not so much a commendation, as a necessary account of himself, to shew how causeless their charge against him was. To such vindications of themselves the humblest souls may be constrained, by the calumnies of wicked men: as we see not only in St. Paul, but our blessed Saviour, who were put upon glorying and magnifying themselves by the malignity of their enemies. (See John x. 36. 2 Cor. xi. 10. 23, &c.) And this is the more allowable, when men know, not only that they write the truth, but that it is notorious to all that are acquainted with them, and cannot be contradicted. The holy writers also are not to be confined to our rules, being moved by the Holy Ghost to set down such things, which, if they had been left to themselves, they would not have mentioned. And men, who have a due reverence to the Holy Scriptures, will look upon this rather as the Holy Ghost's testimony concerning Moses, than Moses's testimony concerning himself. But we have to do now with a generation of men that write upon these books, not as of a Divine original, but as they do upon common authors.

Ver. 4. And the Lord spake suddenly unto Moses.] The Lord thought fit immediately to stifle their insurrection; which might have proved dangerous if it had spread among the people. And perhaps the word suddenly may relate to the manner of his calling to them with a quick and hasty speech, as one provoked and highly displeased.

And unto Aaron, and unto Miriam.] It is uncertain whether God spake to these two by himself or by Moses. It is likely he spake to them all together (while Aaron and Miriam were expostulating with Moses), with such a voice as he was wont to use when he communicated his mind to the prophets.

Come out ye three.] It is likely they were all in Moses's tent, whither his brother and sister were come to utter their complaint.

Unto the tabernacle of the congregation.] Which was God's tent, wherein he dwelt among them, and from whence he declared his will to them.

And they came out.] To attend the pleasure of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 5. And the Lord came down in the pillar of the cloud.] The pillar of the cloud, which was wont to be over the most holy place, where the Lord dwelt, came down from thence, and the Schechinah in it; and stood, as it here follows, at the door of the tabernacle.

And stood in the door of the tabernacle.] As if it would leave them; as it did, ver. 9.

And called Aaron and Miriam.] Who were at some distance, I suppose; and are commanded to come nearer.

And they came forth.] From the place where they were when he called them; or from Moses, with whom they came from his tent, and are now required to stand by themselves.

Ver. 6. And he said, Hear now my words.] Mark what I say to you.

If there be a prophet among you.] This doth not make a doubt of it, but supposes that they, and others among the people, were prophets; as they alleged, (ver. 2.) But God would have them to understand, that he did not communicate his mind to all alike, nor in the same way and manner; but so differently, as to make a remarkable distinction between Moses and others.

Whether there were, in those days, men brought up and trained to be made fit to receive this gift bestowed upon them, we do not know: but, in aftertimes, it is evident there were certain colleges of prophets, wherein disciples of prophets were bred. Such was that, 1 Sam. x. 5. and xix. 18, &c. where the sons of the prophets, i. e. their scholars or disciples (as Jonathan always translates that phrase), were brought up: and, for the most part, such only were endued with this gift, who were so educated in those schools, in the study of the law and in piety. Though God did not tie himself to dispense it to such persons alone, but bestowed it upon whom he pleased, though they had spent no time in those schools of the prophets. This is apparent, from that proverbial speech, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 Sam. x. 11. and xix. 24.) This had been no wonder (as this saying imports), if it had been usual for persons to be endowed with this gift on a sudden, who were never bred up in such a course as led to it. But to shew how this came to pass, one of that place answered and said, (as it there follows, ver. 12.) But who is their father? that is, this is no such wonder, if it be considered who makes men prophets, viz. God, who is the father of all the children of the prophets, and therefore may inspire whom he pleases: as he now might have imparted this gift to meaner persons than the seventy elders presented to him by Moses; and made them equal, if he had thought fit, with Aaron and Miriam. For this was the case of Amos, in after-ages; who was no prophet, nor a prophet's son (as he himself relates, chap. vii. 14.) but a herdsman; and yet the Lord took him as he followed the flock, and bade him go and prophesy unto his people Israel.

I the Lord.] Here is the original of prophecy; will make myself known unto him, communicate to him my mind and will.

In a vision.] This was one way of discovering his mind to the prophets; by representing things to them, when they were awake, as if they had perceived them by their senses; which at that time were locked up, and all transacted by a Divine operation upon their mind and imagination: (see Gen. xv. 1. and Dan. viii. 1. 15.) Abarbinel mentions one, who observes, that the word marah (the plural of which, maroth, signifies looking-glasses, in Exod. xxxviii. 8.) is a different word from mareh, which is commonly used for vision; and teaches us, that all the representations made in this way to the prophets, were only as the images of things represented in a glass; in which we behold the outward shape, or shadow, as we may call it, but not the thing itself. And so St. Paul seems to have understood this word (if he alludes to this place, as Grotius thinks he doth), when he saith, Now we see, δι ἐσόπτρου ἐν αἰνίγματι, through a glass darkly, (1 Cor. xiii. 12.)

And I will speak unto him in a dream.] This was another way of God's revealing his mind unto the prophets, in their sleep; when they not only saw things represented to them, but also heard a voice. And both these seem sometimes to have been mixed together, or to have followed one another; as in Gen. xvi. 12. Dan. vii. 1. and viii. 16—18. And it is a maxim among the Jews, that there is no degree of prophecy, but it is comprehended under one of these, visions or dreams. So Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 32. and 41. and again, cap. 43. where he saith, "There is no third degree of prophecy besides these two." For as for that Divine Spirit, which moved men to speak of things appertaining to the knowledge of God and his praises, beyond their natural or acquired abilities, without seeing any figures, asleep or awake, though with assurance that it was from God, they will not have it called prophecy; though they acknowledge those parts of Scripture which they call Cetuvim, and the LXX. ἁγιόγραφα, i. e. written by the Holy Ghost, were indited by that Divine Spirit; and therefore we cannot reasonably deny those that were inspired by it the name of prophets.

Ver. 7. My servant Moses is not so.] Doth not receive my mind in either of those ways; and therefore is more than a prophet, having it communicated to him in a far more noble and clearer manner, which placed him in a higher rank than any other inspired person.

Who is faithful in all my house.] Because he was entrusted (so the word may be understood) with God's whole family; that is, with all the children of Israel, and faithfully discharged the trust reposed in him, by acquainting them with all God's will, and executing all his commands; and doing nothing of himself (as now he was falsely accused), but only what God required. This is a high testimony to him; and the Jews, when they are in the humour of exalting Moses, say he was more faithful than the angels of the ministry: they are the words of R. Jose in Siphri; and if he had said, as faithful as the angels of the ministry, it might have passed for a good explication.

Ver. 8. With him will I speak, mouth to mouth.] In a most familiar manner, as one friend discourses with another. So it is explained, Exod. xxxiii. 11. From whence Abarbinel, in his Rosch Amana, gathers, that Moses's prophecy differed from others in these four things: first, that God spake to others by a mediator (that is, as he explains it, by some angel), but to him by himself, without the intervention of any other. Secondly, that they never prophesied, but their senses were all bound up, either in visions or in dreams; whereas he was as perfectly awake, as we are when we discourse one with another. Thirdly, that after the vision was over, they were often left so weak and feeble, that they could scarce stand upon their feet; as appears from Dan. x. 8. 11. but Moses spake with the Divine Majesty, without any consternation or alteration; his conversation with him being like that of one friend with another. And lastly, no prophet but he could understand the mind of God when they pleased; for he communicated himself to them only when he thought good; whereas Moses might at any time resort to God, to inquire of him, and receive an answer: (see chap. ix. 8.) To the same purpose also Maimonides writes, in his book De Fundamentis Legis, (cap. vii.)

Even apparently.] Plainly, clearly, and distinctly; so that there was no difficulty to apprehend his meaning, nor need of an explication. Thus he proclaimed his name to Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

And not in dark speeches.] Or, in parables and enigmatical representations, such as the ladder which Jacob saw in a dream, the boiling-pot which was shewn to Jeremiah, the wall, the plumb-line, and the basket of summer-fruits which Amos saw; the beasts which were represented to Daniel, the lamps, mountains, horses, and chariots to Zachariah, the roll of the book which Ezekiel was to eat. By all which the prophet (as Maimonides observes, whose illustrations these are of these words) was given to understand some other thing, which was intended to be made known to him by these figures; (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 43.) who, in his book concerning the Foundations of the Law, further observes, that some of these prophets had both the parable (as he calls it) and its interpretation represented to them: others, the parable only without any exposition; and to some was only delivered the explication.

And the similitude of the Lord shall he behold.] I am apt to think the word not should be here again repeated, (as it must be in some places to make out the sense, as Prov. xxv. 27.) which will make the meaning plainly this, he shall not behold the Lord in similitudes and resemblances, as other prophets did. For the Hebrew word temunah signifies the shape of a thing represented either to the outward senses or to the imagination, not the thing itself. Therefore it would be to equal Moses with the rest of the prophets to say he should see the similitude of the Lord; for so did they. Amos, for instance, saith he saw the Lord standing upon the altar, (chap. ix. 1.) that is, some angelical appearance in a glorious shape. And Eliphaz saith, that a spirit passed before him, the form (or aspect) whereof he could not discern; only the temunah (we render it an image) was before his eyes, (Job iv. 15, 16.) But God did not thus reveal himself to Moses by images and similitudes of things, but spake to him himself, as it goes before, mouth to mouth. Which led Maimonides into the opinion (which he often repeats) that when God is said to speak to any other man, it was by an angel; and that he never spake to any one himself, but only to Moses. Nor did any man before him say that God spake to him, or that he sent him on a message unto others; but Moses was the first that had this honour. (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 63. and par. ii. cap. 39.)

But if we follow our translation, which should run thus, But the similitude of the Lord shall he behold, it relates to that wonderful apparition of God to him in the bush, (Exod. iii. 6.) as Maimonides thinks, More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 5. where he saith, "God poured upon him as much as he could contain," but especially to that revelation which God made of himself to him, when he told him that he could not see his face, but should behold his back parts, (Exod. xxxiii. 20. 23.) which was a privilege granted to none but him. And thus the similitude of the Lord, or his likeness, signifies the Lord himself, (Psal. xvii. ult.) When thy likeness shall awake (that is, thou thyself appear for me), I shall be satisfied.

Wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?] Who is my prime minister, employed by me in the highest services.

Ver. 9. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against them.] As appeared by what follows.

And he departed.] He withdrew his presence from the door of the tabernacle, immediately before they could make an answer: which was a token of exceeding great displeasure; as it is in us when we will not so much as hear what men say for themselves, when they have highly and notoriously offended us, and we reprove them for it, but turn away from them.

Ver. 10. And the cloud departed from off the tabernacle.] It was not merely taken up from it (as it was wont to be when they were to remove their camp), but quite disappeared for a time; or stood at a great distance from them, till Miriam was removed from the tabernacle, and carried out of the camp: for that was one reason of its departure; the Divine Majesty not designing to stay where so impure a creature was. And this was also a manifest token of God's high displeasure against them, which moved him to forsake them.

And behold, Miriam became leprous.] Or, was become leprous; a proper punishment for pride and evil-speaking: which was not inflicted upon Aaron, because he was to judge of leprosy, and was not the first in the transgression. And besides, it is likely, God would not have one that was but newly made his high-priest become vile and contemptible.

White as snow.] Which was a mark of an incurable leprosy, when all the body was overspread with it, (Exod. iv. 6. 2 Kings v. 27.)

And Aaron looked upon Miriam.] As he was bound to do; whose office it was to inspect it, and judge whether it was a leprosy or not, (Lev. xiii. 2, &c.)

And behold, she was leprous.] He could not but judge her to have a leprosy, and consequently pronounce her unclean.

Ver. 11. And Aaron said unto Moses.] He was made sensible that Moses had greater interest in God than himself, and therefore desires his intercession for them.

Alas! my lord.] Have pity upon us, miserable wretches.

I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us.] He supplicates him as his superior, and humbly begs his pardon; and that he would obtain remission of the punishment which they had justly deserved by their sin: for he was afraid he himself might suffer, as he saw she did.

Wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned.] He prays him to look upon their offence as proceeding from folly and weakness, though in itself a great sin.

Ver. 12. Let her not be as one dead, &c.] For so she was not only legally, being to be separated from the living, but naturally also; this being, as I said, the worst kind of leprosy, which ate into the very flesh, and made her look like an abortive (as it here follows) or still-born child, which had lain long dead, and was half wasted away in its mother's womb.

Ver. 13. And Moses cried unto the Lord.] Most earnestly petitioned the Lord for her; such was his meekness and piety. And his crying, perhaps, supposes the Divine Majesty to be gone afar off, if not out of sight.

Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee.] For it was beyond any other power but his to recover her.

Ver. 14. And the Lord said unto Moses, If her father had spit in her face.] An expression of extreme anger, abhorrence, and contempt, (Job xxx. 10. Isa. lii. 6.)

Should she not be ashamed seven days?] She could not have had the confidence to come presently into his presence; but be ashamed for a great while to look him in the face.

Let her be shut out of the camp.] Much more is it fit that Miriam should avoid my presence, and not presume to come before me; who have set a greater mark of my indignation and detestation upon her. For spittle might soon be wiped off; but the leprosy stuck to her, and made her unfit for all conversation with God or man.

Seven days.] Which was the time for legal cleansing from such great impurities, (Lev. xiv. 8. Numb. vi. 9. xxxi. 19.

And after that let her be received in again.] I suppose she was presently freed from leprosy; but kept out from the camp so long, to declare God's displeasure against her; and to humble her, by exposing her to shame.

Ver. 15. And Miriam was shut out of the camp seven days.] That her offence might be known to all, by her open punishment.

And the people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.] For the cloud was gone which should have directed them in their motions. And besides, this respect, perhaps, was shewn unto her because she was a prophetess; and hereby she had time given her to humble herself before God, and to beg his pardon for her sin.

Brought in again.] When one would have expected that such sacrifices should have been offered for her cleansing, as are required in Lev. xiv. But this was an extraordinary case; she being on a sudden miraculously struck with the highest degree of the plague of leprosy, and as suddenly cured by the same hand that struck her.

Ver. 16. And afterward the people removed.] Which shews that the cloud, which departed from the tabernacle, (ver. 10.) returned again to it, together with Miriam, that it might guide them in their removal to another station; for till it was taken up from the tabernacle, they stirred not from the place where they were, (chap. ix. 17, 18.)

From Hazeroth.] After they had abode there seven days at the least.

And pitched in the wilderness of Paran.] Where they were before, (see chap. x. 12.) but now were brought into another part of it, called Rithmah, (chap. xxxiii. 18.) which was called also by another name, Kadesh-barnea, (chap. xiii. 26. Deut. i. 19.) Or else we must suppose these two places to have been so very near together, that they might be said to have pitched either in the one or the other. This station was at the foot of the mountain on the south part of Canaan, (Deut. i. 20.) so that their next removal was to have been into the land promised to them, if they themselves had not hindered, by their renewed rebellion. This removal was in the fourth month of the second year after they came out of the land of Egypt. (See chap. xi. 20. 35.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] They being now come to the borders of Canaan, the Lord ordered Moses to exhort them to go up, and take possession of it, and not to fear nor be discouraged; as we read in Deut. i. 21. But the people (out of a distrust of God's power, as Moses seems to intimate, Deut. ix. 23.) desired they might first send some to search out the land, before they attempted its conquest, (Deut. i. 22.) About which, it is likely, Moses consulted the Divine Majesty, who gave them leave so to do.

Ver. 2. Send thou men.] For their greater satisfaction, God ordered them to have their desire. For there seems to have been a general fear upon them (every one of them coming to Moses with this request, Deut. i. 22.) which could not be removed, but by sending some to bring them intelligence what kind of country it was, and what people they had to deal withal, (ver. 18—20.)

That they may search the land of Canaan.] To make a discovery, both of the country and of the inhabitants, and the best way to invade it, (Deut. i. 22.)

Which I give unto the children of Israel.] To the possession of which God now intended to introduce them. For he had already brought them to the confines of it, and bidden them go up and possess it, (Deut. i. 20, 21.) but they would needs make this delay, for a discovery of the condition of the country; which was their own contrivance at the first, and not a Divine counsel.

Of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man.] That there might be no suspicion or partiality in their report.

Every one a ruler among them.] Men of authority and prudence, who might be the more believed; yet not of the highest rank, (for such are called by the name of princes, chap. i. 16.) but rulers perhaps of thousands, who were very considerable in their tribes: for they are called by the same name in the Hebrew, every one being said to be a nasi and a rosch, a leader and a head, in their tribes; which may incline one to think, that there were higher and lower persons of this sort, who had the same title in every tribe.

Ver. 3. And Moses, by the commandment of the Lord.] Which was given him in the fifth month (called Ab, as St. Jerome notes from the Jews) of the second year after they came out of Egypt: it is not certain upon what day; but it is likely in the beginning of the month, which answers to the nineteenth of our July.

Sent them from the wilderness of Paran.] From Kadesh-barnea, (chap. xxxii. 8. Deut. i. 19, 20. ix. 23. Josh. xiv. 7.)

All those men were heads of the children of Israel.] So the rulers of thousands and hundreds are called, (Exod. xviii. 25.) as well as the princes, (Numb. i. 16.) But these were a lower sort of heads, or great men, in the several tribes of Israel.

Ver. 4. And these were their names: Of the tribe of Reuben, Shammua the son of Zaccur.] There is little to be observed concerning this verse, and those that follow to the sixteenth, but that it is evident these were not the same men, who, in the first chapter of this book, are called the heads and princes of the tribes; being inferior persons, who ruled over some part, not over a whole tribe. The three first tribes also that are here mentioned, sprang from the three eldest sons (for Levi did not make a tribe in Israel) of Jacob: but, in the enumeration of the rest, there is not any order observed, of which I can give an account. Perhaps they being to disperse themselves, when they entered the country they were to search, (see ver. 22.) and thinking it not prudent to go above two (at the most) in company, cast lots who should be associated: and the first lot fell to those of the tribes of Reuben and Simeon; the next to those of Judah and Issachar; and so to the rest.

Ver. 11. Of the tribe of Joseph.] i. e. Of the other branch of Joseph's family, viz. of the tribe of Manasseh, as it here follows.

Ver. 16. These are the names of the men that Moses sent to spy out the land.] He would have their names remembered (which is the reason of this remark), for the sake of those two worthy men, Caleb and Joshua, whose virtue was very illustrious in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation.

And Moses called Oshea, the son of Nun.] So he is called, ver. 8. being named for the tribe of Ephraim.

Jehoshua.] He was called by this name presently after they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xvii. 9.) when he went to fight with Amalek: whom he having overcome, Moses looked upon it as a token that he should save and deliver the people of Israel, and then called him by this name: which imports something more than Oshea; for that denotes only a prayer for salvation (as Menochius observes), but this carries in it a promise of it. And some think the addition of the first letter in the name of Jehoshua was from the name Jehovah; implying that the Lord would employ him in leading and conducting his people into the land of promise: wherein he was a type of the Saviour of the world, the Lord Jesus (whose name is the same with this), who conducts those that believe on him to a heavenly inheritance.

If I could find the like comfortable signification in the rest of the names of these men, I should think there might be some ground for their opinion, who fancy Moses chose Joshua because there was a good omen in his very name. For all nations took great care that no man should be employed in affairs of moment, whose name carried any unlucky signification in it. So Cicero observes, in his first book of Divination, that the generals of armies, and the censors, took care that none should so much as lead the sacrifices to the altar but who were bonis nominibus, of names that signified good: of which the consuls also were very observant, ut primus miles fiat bono nomine, that the first soldier whom they listed should be of a good name; such as Valerius, Salvius, Statorius, or the like. On the contrary, the name of Nævius was deemed so bad, that in his oration pro Quinct. Sext. he saith, having named the man, methinks I have said enough.

Ver. 17. And Moses sent them to spy out the land, and said unto them.] That is, when he sent them to spy out the land (as was said in the foregoing verse), he gave them the following directions.

Get ye up this way southward.] This south part of Canaan fell afterward to be part of the lot of the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 1—3.) and was very dry, and consequently barren, (Judg. i. 15.) and, therefore, fittest for their entrance to spy out the land unobserved, being less inhabited than the better parts of the country. Besides, it was nearest to the place where they now were encamped.

And go up into the mountain.] Where the Amorites dwelt, (Deut. i. 19.) together with some Amalekites, and other people, (chap. xiv. 43. 45.) From whence they were to go down into the valleys.

Ver. 18. And see the land what it is, and the people that dwell therein.] These are the general directions which he gave them, to inform themselves both of the country and of its inhabitants.

Whether they be strong or weak, few or many.] In particular, with respect to the latter, he directs them to inform themselves whether the inhabitants were strong-bodied or feeble; and whether their number was great or small.

Ver. 19. And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad.] And, with respect to the former, he would have them bring an account; first, what sort of country it was, whether healthful and delightful, or unwholesome and unpleasant.

And what cities they be, that they dwell in.] And then how large their cities were, and of what strength.

Whether in tents, or in strong holds.] Whether they lived in tents, as the Arabians did (and the Israelites while they were in the wilderness), or in houses; and whether they were fortified. Or rather (as we would say in our language), whether in open villages or in walled cities: for so the word mahanaim signifies, not tents (as we here translate it), but hosts or camps, (Gen. xxxii. 1.) and here towns without walls, as the LXX. interpret it; and the Vulgar, also, only inverting the order of the words, whether in walled towns, or without walls.

Ver. 20. And what the land is, &c.] And last of all, what is the soil of the country; whether rich and fertile, or poor and barren; and also, whether it be a woody country, or otherwise.

And be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land.] In which discoveries, there being some hazard, he bids them be confident God would preserve them; so that they might venture to bring away with them some of the fruit which the country produced.

Now the time was the time of the first ripe grapes.] Towards the vintage.

Ver. 21. So they went up, and searched the land, from the wilderness of Zin.] Which was on the south of the land of Canaan, (chap. xxxiv. 3. Josh. xv. 1. 3.) being different from the wilderness of Sin, which lay near to Egypt, (Exod. xvi. 1.)

Unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.] The city of Rehob lay in the north of the land of Canaan, and fell to the lot of the tribe of Asher, (Josh. xix. 28.) And it lay not far from Hamath (which, in aftertimes, was called Epiphania), a city which we very often read of afterward, as the bounds of Judea northward; which Moses saith was unto the entrance of Hamath, (chap. xxxiv. 8.) So that they took a survey of the whole country, from one end of it to the other, south and north; and also, as they passed along, observed those parts that lay east and west. For they gave an account of the Canaanites, as dwelling by the sea (which was westward), and by the coast of Jordan, which was on the east, (ver. 29.) Or, if by the sea we understand not the Western Ocean, but the Dead Sea (as some do); yet it appears by these very words, that they bent their course, as they passed from south to north, unto the western and eastern parts also. For Rehob and Hamath both lay at the foot of Libanus; one to the north-west (towards Sidon), and the other to the north-east.

Ver. 22. And they ascended by the south.] In their return from searching the country.

And came unto Hebron.] That is, some of them. For the word in the Hebrew is not they came (as it is they ascended), but he came; which demonstrates that they did not go all of them together in a company (for that had been dangerous, and might have made them taken notice of), but dispersed themselves; some going to discover one place, some another. And it is a probable conjecture of some of the Hebrew doctors, that Caleb was the man that went to take a view of Hebron; and was so little affrighted at the sight of the giants there, that he was the very person that afterward drove them out; and had this place given him for his portion: for it was in the south part of the lot of the tribe of Judah; being formerly called Kirjath-Arba, (Josh. xiv. 9. 12. 14.)

Where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the children of Anak were.] These were the grandchildren of Arba (from whom Hebron had the name of Kirjath-Arba, i. e. the city of Arba), who was the father of Anak, whose family was more eminent than any other in Canaan; these three sons of his being men not only of great bulk, but prowess and valour. Bochartus thinks (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1.) that Anak signifies as much as the Roman name Torquatus; being like to that Gaul whom Manlius vanquished. And Ahiman signifies as much as, who is my brother? importing there was none to be compared with him. Sheshai he takes to be as much as Sixtius, viz. six cubits high, as Goliath was. And Talmai he derives from talam, furrow: as if he seemed in length to equal a furrow in the field. These were the people that made the Israelites tremble; for it is likely their whole family was of a very large stature, though not so big as these. And, indeed, they were so very terrible to all their neighbours, that it became a proverbial saying in those countries, Who can stand before the children of Anak? (Deut. ix. 2.)

Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.] The Egyptians boasted of the great antiquity of their nation and cities: but Moses shews that Hebron was built before the capital city of their country: for so Zoan was; and called in after-ages Tanis; lying not far from that mouth of the river Nile, which from thence was called by Plutarch τανιτικὸν στόμα. R. Solomon will have it that Hebron was built by Cham, one of the three sons of Noah, and the father of Mizraim; from whom the Egyptians descended. But of this there is no certainty; and the Gemara upon Sota (cap. 7.) saith, It is not likely that a man would build a house for his younger son, before he had built one for his elder; for Canaan was the youngest of all the sons of Cham, (Gen. x. 6.) Yet those doctors are willing to suppose that Cham built both these cities; and therefore interpret the word banah, which is rightly translated built, as if it signified fruitful, (according to Gen. xvi. 2.) and make the sense to be, that Hebron was seven times more fruitful than Zoan: which is very foolish; as, upon other accounts, so on this, that Hebron was a stony place, and therefore not fertile.

Ver. 23. And they came unto the brook Eshcol.] A place which lay in a valley at the foot of the mountain, (Deut. i. 24.)

And cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes.] This was done, no doubt, in some private place, upon the southern borders of Canaan; just as they were returning to the camp of Israel again. For it would have given the country too great an alarm, if they had marched in the highway with this bunch upon their shoulders.

And they bare it between two.] A great many authors mention vines and grapes of an extraordinary bigness in those eastern and southern countries. I need only refer to Strabo, who says, the vines in Margiana, and other places, were so big, that two men could scarce compass them with their arms, and that they produced βότρυν δίπηχυν, a bunch of grapes of two cubits, (lib. ii. Geograph. p. 73. and lib. xi. p. 516.) Which is in part justified by Olearius, in his late travels into Persia, book iii. where he saith, not far from Astracan, he saw vines, whose trunks were so thick, that a man could do no more than grasp them about with both his arms. And Forsterus, in his Dictionarium Hebraicum, p. 862. saith, there was a preacher at Nuremberg called Achaicus, who lived as a monk eight years in the holy land (as they call it), who told him upon his sick-bed, that in his time there were clusters of grapes at Hebron of such bigness, that one single kernel was sufficient to quench his thirst a whole day, when he was sick there of a tympany. J. Conradus Dieterius hath collected a great deal more to this purpose out of Leo Africanus and Nic. Radzivillius, and other authors, in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 249. And since him the most learned Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 24. where, among other things, he observes, that Crete, Chios, and other islands in the Archipelago, afford bunches of grapes of ten pound weight, sometimes of thirty-six, yea, of forty. And he mentions grapes of a prodigious bigness in the island of Madeira.

Upon a staff.] See chap. iv. 10.

And they brought of the pomegranates and figs.] Which grew in the parts nearest to the place where the Israelites were encamped.

Ver. 24. The place was called the brook Eshcol, because of the cluster of grapes which the children of Israel cut down from thence.] That is, when the Israelites got possession of the land, they called this brook (or valley) by the name of Eshcol, in memory of this bunch of grapes, for so Eshcol signifies.

Ver. 25. And they returned from searching of the land.] Came back to the camp of Israel.

After forty days.] This shews that they did not take a cursory view of the country; but took time enough to make their observations. And the ripe fruit which they brought with them, after they had been forty days from the camp, demonstrates that their return was in the latter end of the sixth month, very near to the seventh; that is, in the end of the year, according to the old style of that nation. For on the fifteenth day of the seventh month God ordered the feast of tabernacles to be celebrated; a little before which they gathered both their harvest and their vintage, (Exod. xxiii. 16. Lev. xxiii. 39. Deut. xvi. 13.)

Ver. 26. And they went and came to Moses, and to Aaron, &c.] They went up the mountain from Eshcol; and came down on the other side of it, to Moses and Aaron, and all the congregation, (Deut. i. 24, 25.)

Unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh.] Unto the place from whence they were sent; which was Kadesh-barnea, (see ver. 3. and Deut. ix. 23.) which is here in short called Kadesh; but is quite different from that Kadesh we read of afterward, (chap. xxi. 1.) For that was in the wilderness of Sin; and they did not come to it till the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt, (chap. xxxiii. 37, 38.) whereas they were at this Kadesh in the second year; before they were doomed to wander forty years in the wilderness.

And brought back word unto them, and unto all the congregation.] Gave a public account before Moses and Aaron of what they had discovered.

And shewed them the fruit of the land.] And at the same time presented to them the cluster of grapes, the pomegranates, and figs, which they had brought with them.

Ver. 27. And they told him, and said.] They address their relation to Moses; because he sent them, (ver. 2.)

We came unto the land whither thou sentest us.] I suppose they chose some of their number to speak in the name of the rest: and, first, they give an account of the land, as he required, (ver. 19, 20.)

And surely it floweth with milk and honey.] Their report of the condition of the land was as honest as could be desired; for they testify it to be such as God promised to bestow upon them, (Exod. xxxiii. 3.)

And this is the fruit of it.] They prove what they say by a sample of the product of it: which was so large, that some of the Jews fancy there were eight men employed to carry this one cluster, as they say in the Gemara Sotæ, cap. 7. Of which the spies made this wicked use, as from thence to tell their brethren, "You see this goodly fruit, how vast it is: but believe us, the inhabitants of the country exceed us, and all other men in stature, as much as this fruit exceeds all other of the same kind, throughout the world." So Wagenseil explains the sense of their discourse in that place, sect. 4.

Ver. 28. Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land; and the cities are walled, and very great.] This is an account of the other part of the inquiry Moses commanded them to make, concerning the inhabitants and their cities, (ver. 18.)

And moreover we saw the children of the Anakims there.] See ver. 22. All this was true; but spoken in such a manner, as to represent the conquest of the country exceeding difficult, if not impossible. So they explain their meaning in downright words, (ver. 31.) and so the people understood them, Deut. i. 28. where these frightful people are called the sons of the Anakims: for they saw, not only those three mentioned before, (ver. 22.) but others also that were descended from them; who, as I there noted, were gigantic persons. So the LXX. translate these words υἱοὶ γιγάντων, and so the Chaldee; and so the Jews use the word Anakim, to signify giants; particularly Benjamin Tudelensis, p. 3. of his Itinerary: where L'Empereur thinks it probable they were called Anakims, "à torque quo colla superbe cingebant," from a collar or chain, which they proudly wore about their necks: for the word Anak properly signifies collum torque cingere, (p. 136.) to wreath a chain about the neck. But it is evident they had their name from their progenitor, Anak, the son of Arba: whence he was so called we do not know.

Ver. 29. The Amalekites dwell in the land of the south.] They do not represent the Amalekites as inhabitants of the land of Canaan; but they observe that they lay on the south border of it: where, if they went about to enter, in all probability, that nation (which were their early enemies when they came out of Egypt) would help to oppose them in their attempt, as much as the people of Canaan. For that is their intention, in the following report, to shew what a stout people they must encounter, which way soever they endeavoured to enter into Canaan.

And the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites.] An account of all these see Gen. xv. 20, 21.

Dwell in the mountains.] Which were in the entrance of the land of Canaan, on the south-east part of it. Particularly the Amorites, it is evident, were planted there, upon the mountains of the borders of Canaan, (Deut. i. 27. 44.) And many of them had made an expedition into the country beyond Jordan, where they had possessed themselves of Bashan and Heshbon, and all the land between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon. For they were a very warlike people, and of great stature, (Amos ii. 9.) which made these searchers of their land afraid of them; and bid their brethren consider whether they thought they should be able to dispute their passage with them: which they plainly suggest, in their opinion, they could not. For the Jebusites were another mighty people, whom, after the conquest of Canaan, they could not of a long time dispossess of Mount Sion. I need not say how terrible the Hittites were; for it is probable from thence came the word hittha, which signifies a fright and sudden consternation; as Bochartus hath observed in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36.

And the Canaanites.] Those who were particularly called by this name: see Gen. xv. 21.

Dwell by the sea.] It is certain that the Canaanites dwelt by the ocean, called the Midland Sea; for they seem to have had their names from merchandizing; for which that situation was most proper; and for that reason others of them were seated near Jordan. This, I think, is plain from Deut. i. 7. And, besides, the word sea alone commonly signifies that great ocean. But, it being plain that they were also seated, as it here follows, upon the river Jordan, it is possible that by sea may be meant, in this place, the Dead Sea, or the Lake of Genesareth, or both of them; because they were near Jordan, which ran into them.

And by the coast of Jordan.] Where the Canaanites were also seated, as is evident from Deut. xi. 30. For there were both western and eastern Canaanites, as appears from Josh. xi. 3. and they are frequently joined with the Perizzites, (particularly Judg. i. 4.) who were a fierce sort of rough people, that dwelt in the woody part of the mountains. So that the intention of the men, who made this report, was, to represent to the people, that whether they invaded the land by the southern parts, or the eastern, they would find both strongly guarded by a mighty people, much superior to them in force: which account, the following verse shews, put the people into a tumult.

Ver. 30. And Caleb stilled the people.] It is plain by this, that the people understood, by their way of speaking, countenances, and gestures, that the meaning of these men who made this report (which was not false in itself) was, that, though the country indeed was very rich and desirable, yet it was impossible for them to drive the inhabitants out of it: which put them into a mutinous disposition, as Caleb perceived by their looks and their muttering; and therefore stepped forth, before it brake out, to quiet their spirits with his account of the country and inhabitants, in which Joshua, no question, joined with him. It is not indeed here mentioned, because Caleb, perhaps, stood next to those who began to make a commotion, and therefore spake first: but he was seconded by Joshua, we may be sure; because we find him mentioned in the next chapter, and, in the first place, together with Caleb, as endeavouring to appease the tumult. And he is not only exempted from the punishment inflicted upon the people for their rebellion, (chap. xiv. 30. 38.) but is expressly said to have followed the Lord fully, as well as Caleb, (chap. xxxii. 12.)

Before Moses.] The Hebrew phrase el moscheh may signify that he stilled them, as they were coming towards Moses in a seditious manner; or quieted them so far as to make them hearken to Moses; or, as we render it, in his presence, when they were ready to fly in his face. One of the doctors in the Gemara beforementioned, (cap. 9.) saith, that Joshua being about to speak, they bitterly reproached him, and would not suffer him to proceed: and therefore Caleb thought good to give them a great many blandishing words, and to call Moses this son of Amram, which looked like contempt of him; whereby he stilled them, and disposed them to listen to him. And then he said, "Is not he the person that brought us out of Egypt; that divided the Red Sea for us to pass through it; that gave us manna from heaven? What if he should bid us make ladders and climb up into the skies, should we not obey him?"

And said, Let us go up at once.] Or, go up immediately, without a stop.

And possess it.] He speaks as if it were already their own (as indeed it was, by God's gift), and they needed only enter and take possession of it.

For we are able to overcome it.] There will be no such difficulty, as these men represent, in the conquest of it.

Ver. 31. But the men that went up with him.] The rest of the company that went to search the land; who if they had not persisted in their unbelief, the people perhaps might have been perfectly appeased by Caleb and Joshua.

Said, We be not able.] Now they open their minds more plainly, in their reply to Caleb, whom they oppose directly; and declare their opinion downright, that they were not an equal match for their enemies.

To go up against the people.] To beat them out of the mountains which they inhabited.

For they are stronger than we.] These men had no confidence in the promise and power of God, on which Caleb and Joshua relied; but measured all things by human strength.

Ver. 32. And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel.] In the heat of their opposition, they now disparage the country which they had before praised, (ver. 27.) and also stretch their report of the inhabitants beyond the truth.

Saying, The land, through which we have gone to search, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof.] Unless we suppose that there was a great plague at this time in the country, as the Hebrews do (who love to excuse their forefathers' sins), this was a gross lie. But take it as they suppose, yet this was a very malignant report. For if they saw the people of the country every where, as they passed along, carrying their neighbours to their graves (as the Jews tell the tale), this, which they should have ascribed to the providence of God, who sent this mortality, that they might have fewer enemies to oppose them, and that these spies might pass more freely, and less observed, they most wickedly ascribe to the badness of the air: which being very unhealthful to the natives, might well be thought would be much more so to strangers. Thus bad minds (as the aforesaid Gemara glosses well enough upon this story) turn that which God intends for their benefit into their hurt. And if we had any better authority for this story, the word achal (which we translate eat up) would well enough agree with it. For, as Maimonides observes, in the first part of his More Nevoch. (cap. 30.) it is used in the Holy Scriptures concerning any kind of consumption, destruction, or desolation: as here in this book, chap. xi. 1. Lev. xxvi. 38. 2 Sam. ii. 26, &c.

And all the people that we saw in it were men of great stature.] The Hebrew phrase is, men of measures, ἄνδρες ὑπερμήκεις, as the LXX. translate it, men of larger size than the rest of mankind. Which we have no reason to think was true: but having seen the sons of Anak in one part of the country, they imagined all the rest of the people to be near unto their stature. For this is the description of that giant of Gath, mentioned 1 Chron. xx. 6. where he is called a man of measure; and 2 Sam. xxi. 20. where he is called in the plural number (as they are here), a man of measures, ἀνὴρ ὑπερμεγέθης, a man above the common bigness. And thus very great houses are called houses of measure, (Jerem. xxii. 24.)

Ver. 33. And there we saw giants.] Men of greater bulk and strength than the biggest of those very great men, (see Gen. vi. 4.) which they spake of in the foregoing words.

The sons of Anak.] They had mentioned this once before, (ver. 28.) and now repeat it again; because they were struck with such a terror at the sight of them, that they were always at their tongue's end. Just as Homer mentions, Τρῶάς τε καὶ Ἕκτορα, as Bochartus makes the comparison, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1.)

Which came of the giants.] Who were descended from a gigantic race of men; particularly from Arba, who was their grandfather, as Joshua tells us, chap. xiv. 15. xv. 13, 14, &c. where he shews how Caleb drove these Anakims out of their cities, and made them fly to the Philistines; where there were some remainders of them till the days of David. And others of them, perhaps, fled into Greece; for there was a race of men among the Greeks called Ἀνακες; who Vossius thinks it probable might descend from these children of Anak, (lib. i. de Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 13.)

And we were in our own sight as grasshoppers.] Their fear magnified them above measure; though, no doubt, they were men of such an extraordinary height, that they might look upon themselves to be as small and contemptible, as grasshoppers are compared with us. And such very tall men there are still in some parts of the world, as Job Ludolphus observes, in his Commentary upon his Histor. Ethiopica, lib. i. cap. 2. n. 22.

And so we were in their sight.] One of the Jewish doctors makes bold to call these men liars: for, though their fear might make them appear as grasshoppers, yet how could they tell, saith he, that they were so in the sight of the children of Anak? Here the Gemarists (in the place I mentioned above, cap. 10.) endeavour to help them out, by continuing the tale of the great mortality which was then in those countries. Where a funeral-feast (as the manner was) being one day made under certain cedar-trees, which are very shady; the spies got up to the top of them, to hide themselves among the thick boughs: but the people below happening to look up, the spies heard them say, There are men got up into the trees, who look like grasshoppers. But there needs no such inventions to defend them, when an hyperbole will do it: their plain meaning being this, that the Anakims looked down upon them with the utmost contempt.

By all which it appears, that they had not only a sight of the Anakims, but the Anakims also saw them, and looked upon them, it is likely, as they did upon other travellers; who were wont to come thither, either for their pleasure, or to traffic in their country; or in their way to other places: whom it was not their custom to examine strictly, whence they came, and what their business was; but let pass to and fro among them freely.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AND all the congregation.] By all the congregation may be here meant, all the great men (for so the phrase sometimes signifies), except Caleb and Joshua, and, perhaps, some few others.

Lifted up their voice, and cried.] Shrieked, and made loud lamentations.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And the people wept.] Which put all the people into tears.

That night.] Which followed after the report made by the spies.

Ver. 2. And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses, and against Aaron.] As they had frequently done before; but now in a more tumultuous manner.

And the whole congregation said unto them.] The great men spake in the name of the whole body of the people.

Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt!] In a fit of fury and despair, they quite forgot how miraculously God had brought them from thence; and consequently could as easily bring them into Canaan.

Or, would God that we had died in this wilderness!] When several of their brethren were burnt, and smote with a very great plague, in this very wilderness of Paran, (chap. xi. 1. 33.)

Ver. 3. Wherefore hath the Lord brought us into this land.] Having vented their passion against God's ministers, they most undutifully accuse him, as if he had dealt deceitfully with them.

To fall by the sword.] Of the children of Anak, who they fancied were irresistible.

That our wives and children should be a prey.] To the people of Canaan, after all the men of Israel were killed.

Were it not better for us to return into Egypt?] Their rage deprived them of the use of their reason.

Ver. 4. And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.] They knew that Moses would not conduct them thither; and therefore they thought of choosing another leader. But, though they might in a raging fit speak of returning to Egypt, yet it is an amazing thing that they should continue in this madness, and deliberate about it; nay, actually appoint them a captain, as Nehemiah saith they did, chap. ix. 17. For how could they get thither without food? which they could not expect God would send them from heaven, when they had forsaken him. Or how could they hope to find their way, when his cloud, which directed them, was withdrawn from them? Or hope to deal with those that might oppose their passage, if they hit upon the right way? And after all, if they came into Egypt, what entertainment could they look for there, among a people, whose king, and princes, and first-born, had lately perished on their account? Nothing can be said in answer to these things, but that outrageous discontent will not suffer men to consider any thing, but that which grieves them; and that foul ingratitude and forgetfulness of God's benefits, throws them into such discontents.

Ver. 5. And Moses and Aaron fell on their faces.] To deprecate God's displeasure; which lately arose against them, upon a less occasion than this, (chap. xi. 33.) and they might justly fear would now destroy them all, for their incurable infidelity; as Josephus explains it.

Before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel.] Some fancy, that their falling down before them, was to beseech them to desist from their murmuring; and to trust in God, who would go before them, and fight for them; as he saith he told them, Deut. i. 29, 30. But falling on their faces being the posture of the most humble supplicants to God, and not to men, (as all understand it in other places, particularly chap. xvi. 4. xx. 6.) their falling down before the assembly signifies no more, but that in their presence Moses and Aaron humbled themselves deeply before the Divine Majesty; and prayed to him with the greatest earnestness to forgive them, and to bestow a better mind upon them. Which they did in their presence, to awaken them to consider the danger they were in by their heinous sin; that they themselves might cry to him for mercy. For the usual posture of prayer in that nation was standing; but in very great distress, and anxiety of mind, when they were exceeding solicitous to obtain their petition, they kneeled down, and sometimes fell on their faces; which was still a sign of greater ardour and concernment, as appears from our blessed Saviour, (Matt. xxvi. 39. Luke xxii. 41.)

Ver. 6. And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes.] As the manner was, on any sad and doleful occasion; especially when they heard any man blaspheme the Divine Majesty; in detestation of the impiety, and to declare their sorrow, and indignation, and dread of God's judgments; as appears from Jerem. xxxvi. 24. where the stupidity of Jehoiachim and his servants is represented by this, that when they heard the words which the prophet declared in God's name against Judah, they were not afraid, nor rent their garments.

Ver. 7. And they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying.] This shewed great courage, that they durst declare their opinion, contrary to the sense of so great a multitude.

The land which we passed through to search it is an exceeding good land.] This is opposed to what their fellows had said, that it was a land which ate up its inhabitants, (chap. xiii. 32.) Quite contrary they assure them it was very, very good, as the words are in the Hebrew; and so expressed by the Chaldee, and the LXX. exceeding, exceeding good: that is, every way desirable; for thus the Hebrews express the superlative degree.

Ver. 8. If the Lord delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us.] If we do not forfeit his favour, he will make us so happy, as to drive out the Canaanites, and settle us in the possession of this land.

A land which floweth with milk and honey.] As their companions themselves had confessed, (chap. xiii. 37.)

Ver. 9. Only rebel ye not against the Lord.] By slighting his goodness, by murmuring, and discontented speeches, and talking of going back to Egypt, (ver. 2—4.)

Neither fear ye the people of the land.] This is opposed to what the rest of the spies had said, concerning the mighty power and strength of the inhabitants of Canaan, (chap. xiii. 28, 29. 31, &c.)

For they are bread for us.] We shall as easily vanquish them as we eat our meat.

Their defence is departed from them.] In the Hebrew the words are, their shadow; whereby men being defended from heat in those countries, it signifies the protection which God gives men from those things that might hurt them: which Divine protection, they tell the people, was now withdrawn from the Canaanites, who had filled up the measure of their iniquities, (Gen. xv. 16.) and now were exposed as a prey to the Israelites.

And the Lord is with us.] For, on the contrary, they entreat the people to consider that God, who was departed from the Canaanites, was with them, to aid and assist them in the conquest of the country: and for both these reasons they needed not to fear them. So they conclude their speech, like men of an undaunted spirit, in these words; fear them not.

Ver. 10. But all the congregation.] The Hebrew words col ha edah, as I observed, ver. 1. signifies all the great men; the rulers of the rest.

Bade stone them with stones.] Ordered the people to stone them to death; as they had done, it is likely, if they had not been deterred from the attempt by the appearance of the Divine Majesty. For the Hebrew word amar (as Maimonides observes in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 65.) is used, not only concerning that which is spoken or thought, but of what is decreed and resolved. And he produces these words as an instance of it, together with Exod. ii. 14. 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

And the glory of the Lord appeared.] The Schechinah which resided within the tabernacle, upon the mercy-seat, now openly appeared, in a bright flaming light, like fire: and, in all probability, after such an amazing manner, as terrified them from their design. Thus it appeared on Mount Sinai, to fright them from approaching near unto it, Exod. xxiv. 17. (from whence Moses saith, the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24.) and thus it appeared afterward, Numb. xvi. 19. 42.

In the tabernacle of the congregation.] Or rather upon the tabernacle (for in the tabernacle the people could not have seen it, as now they did), over the most holy place; which the cloud constantly covered, over the mercy-seat, where the Divine Glory dwelt: (see chap. ix. 15.)

Before all the children of Israel.] Both to fright them, as I said, from their purpose of stoning Joshua and Caleb; and to shew his anger and displeasure at their rebellion, which, it is likely, appeared by the flashes that came from the glorious flame.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto Moses.] In answer, I suppose, unto his prayer, (ver. 5.)

How long will this people provoke me?] Shall I always bear with their most undutiful behaviour; which will provoke the greatest patience unto anger?

How long will it be ere they believe me.] Dost thou not see that their unbelief is incurable?

For all the signs which I have shewed unto them?] Since they continue in it, notwithstanding all the wonders I have done, to convince them of my power and faithfulness.

Ver. 12. I will smite them with the pestilence.] Send a pestilential disease among them to sweep them away at once, as the fifteenth verse interprets it, (see Exod. xxxii. 10.)

And disinherit them.] And so deprive them and theirs of the country which I promised to their fathers for an inheritance, (Gen. xv. 7.) This was not an irrevocable decree, but a threatening which God changed into another severe punishment.

And will make of thee a greater nation, and mightier than they.] Fulfil my promise to Abraham, by making thee the father of a more numerous people, and more powerful than they whom I reject.

Ver. 13. And Moses said unto the Lord, Then the Egyptians will hear it, (for thou broughtest up this people by thy might from among them.)] It is an abrupt kind of speech, proceeding from the great disturbance which this threatening made in his mind; being as much as if he had said, If thou thus destroy them, the Egyptians, when they hear of it, will triumph; and thou wilt lose all the honour thou hast got, by the wonderful deliverance thou didst work for thy people from their bondage.

Ver. 14. And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land.] Or rather, they will say to the inhabitants of this land, i. e. the Canaanites, with whom the Egyptians had frequent commerce.

For they have heard, &c.] The word for is not in the Hebrew: and the sense will be more plain if we omit it, and translate the whole thus; They will say to the inhabitants of this land, they have heard that thou Lord art among this people: that is, that there was a glorious token of thy presence among us.

That thou Lord art seen face to face.] And spakest to us from Mount Sinai out of that glorious cloud, which there appeared unto all the people, (Exod. xix. 18. xx. 1. xxiv. 16, 17. Deut. iv. 12.)

And that thy cloud standeth over them.] Numb. x. 34.

And that thou goest before them by day-time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night.] Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 15. Now if thou shalt kill all this people.] Or rather, but thou hast killed all this people.

As one man.] On a sudden, with one stroke; as if they had all but one life.

Then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying.] Of which the nations that have heard the forenamed report of thy majesty will make this construction.

Ver. 16. Because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land.] Because he whom they called Omnipotent, was indeed defective in his power; which at last failed him, so that he could not complete what he had undertaken.

Which he sware unto them.] Gen. xv. 17, 18. xxiv. 7.

Therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness.] Killed them all, before they came to the land he had solemnly promised to them; for that was an easier work than to make good his word.

The sum of this argument is, that it would be a great disparagement to the Divine Majesty if he now destroyed this nation; because his enemies would conclude, he had deluded them with false promises, which he wanted power to effect.

Ver. 17. And now, I beseech thee, let the power of my Lord be great.] That is, let it appear to be unlimited, by bringing them into the land which he sware to give them, (ver. 16.) or by pardoning their sin, which had provoked his high displeasure against them, (ver. 11.) For by power may be meant either that which is properly called by that name, viz. his omnipotence, which can conquer all opposition; or his mercy and clemency, in overcoming his anger, and bearing with an ungrateful people: which agrees very well with what follows; but both tend to the same meaning, that he would not destroy them, but bestow the land of Canaan upon them according to his intentions.

According as thou hast spoken.] Which will be suitable to thy blessed nature, which thou didst proclaim to me when thy glory passed by me, (see Exod. xxxi. 22. xxxiv. 5, 6.)

Ver. 18. The Lord is long-suffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity, &c.] In these very words (though something more largely) God proclaimed his name to Moses; when he shewed him his glory, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. where they are explained.

And by no means clearing the guilty.] Even these words (according to the interpretation I have there given of them) are a plain argument to move the Divine goodness to pardon their sin. But the next words [visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, &c.] seem to be directly contrary to the intention of his petition, till it be considered, that they had not now committed idolatry, against which sin, God, in these words, particularly declares his severity; and that Moses did not now plead for an absolute pardon without any punishment at all, but only that he would not destroy the whole nation as one man, and utterly disinherit them, as he seemed resolved to do, (ver. 12. 15.) This threatening he hoped his gracious nature would incline him to revoke; notwithstanding which he might visit the sin of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation; that is, punish them and their posterity a long time. And so this latter part of the verse is to be interpreted, (according to what I observed, Exod. xxxiv. 7.) in making desolate he will not make quite desolate, though he visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, &c.

Ver. 19. Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people.] So far as not to destroy them utterly.

According to the greatness of thy mercy.] Which God himself had proclaimed, (ver. 18.)

As thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt even until now.] This looks like an argument against them: for they having provoked him so often as they had done since they came out of Egypt, in the space of one year and little more, (see ver. 22.) and been as often forgiven, it might seem more reasonable that he should now punish them, and not forgive them any more. But he appeals to that long-suffering goodness which he mentions as the prime character of the Divine Nature, (ver. 18.) which, though it had been exercised by them many ways, yet he hoped would still bear longer with them.

Ver. 20. And the Lord said, I have pardoned, according to thy word.] Granted thy desire, not to destroy them utterly and altogether, (ver. 12. 15.)

Ver. 21. But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord.] In the Hebrew the words run plainly thus, As true as I live, and that all the earth shall be (or hath been) filled with the glory of the Lord. For so the Egyptians themselves confessed, (ver. 14.) that the fame of it was come to them; and afterward he did many more wonderful things when he brought them into Canaan: unto which (if these words be taken in the future tense) he hath respect, when he saith, as true as that he would in a most glorious manner subdue the Canaanites, not one of these murmuring Israelites should come into that good land.

Ver. 22. Because all those men, &c.] The sense would have been clear if we had left out the word because, as we might have done, the Hebrew particle ki being sometimes only an expletive, or if we had translated it that, as it signifies in Gen. xxii. 17. and many other places. For the meaning plainly is, though the words be something intricate, that all the men of whom he is speaking should perish, and not one of them come into Canaan.

Which have seen my glory.] Which appeared to them in the cloud upon Mount Sinai, and resided in the tabernacle.

And my miracles which I did in Egypt.] Mentioned in the fourth, seventh, eighth, and following chapters of the book of Exodus.

And in the wilderness.] Where he divided the Red Sea for them to pass through on dry land, and gave them manna constantly from heaven, with water out of a rock, which followed them whithersoever they went, &c.

And have tempted me now these ten times.] That is, very oft, as this phrase ten times signifies, (Gen. xxxi. 7. 41. Nehem. iv. 12. Job xix. 3.) But some of the Hebrews will not be satisfied with this explication, but endeavour to find out precisely just ten provocations of which they were guilty: though, to do this, they are forced to begin with one which fell out before they came to the Red Sea, (Exod. xiv. 11, 12.) and all the other nine they find in the wilderness. (See Pirke Avoth. cap. 5. and Paulus Fagius's Scholia upon it; with Genebrard upon Psal. lxxviii. 46.) Mr. Mede hath observed, that to tempt God, in Scripture language, is to provoke him by some presumptuous fact to anger; as it were, to try whether he will punish or not; or, in fewer words, to dare God, (book i. Discourse 26. p. 153.) And the following words in the next verse justify this notion in this place.

And have not hearkened to my voice.] This seems particularly to refer to their disobedience, when he bade them go up, and possess the land of Canaan; notwithstanding, they would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord their God, (Deut. i. 21. 26, &c.)

Ver. 23. Surely they shall not see the land, &c.] The Hebrew particle im, when it follows an oath, is to be simply translated not. And so the words run clearly here, they shall not see the land which I sware unto their fathers.

Neither shall any of them that provoked me see it.] This is but an explication of the foregoing words, and might have been better translated, even all that provoked me (by their discontent and murmuring, &c. ver. 1—3.) they shall not see it. This heavy doom was passed upon them on the ninth day of the month Ab (which answers to our July), as Moses Kotzensis reports the opinion of their doctors: on which day, they say, both the first and second temples were levelled with the ground; and Bitter, likewise, a great city, was taken on the same day, in which were many thousand Jews; who, with their king (as they called him), Ben Cosiba, and his whole army, were cut in pieces. And to make this day still more dismal, Turnus Rufus, one of the Roman captains, ploughed up the ground on which the temple and buildings about it stood upon this very day. (See Wagenseil upon Gemara Sotæ, cap. 7. sect. 10. annot. 8.)

Ver. 24. But my servant Caleb.] He alone is here particularly mentioned, because this is the first proof we read of his sincerity and resolution. But Joshua is as much concerned in this character and promise, whose faith and courage were tried, as soon as they came out of Egypt, by fighting with the Amalekites. And therefore there was no need to speak here of his integrity: though afterward it is expressly remembered, in the very same words used in this place concerning Caleb, (chap. xxxii. 12.) And here below in this chapter, (ver. 30.) he is assured of coming into the land of promise as well as Caleb, with whom he joined in opposing the mutinous multitude, (ver. 6.) where he is named first in that heroic action.

Because he had another spirit with him.] Was otherways affected (as we now speak), trusting in the power and promise of God, and not at all afraid of the strength of their enemies.

And hath followed me fully.] The Hebrew phrase is, hath fulfilled after me; i. e. completed his obedience to me; or fulfilled my will and commands in every thing: being not only full of courage himself, but endeavouring to put it into others, (Deut. i. 36.)

Him will I bring into the land whereunto he went.] Into Canaan: particularly to Hebron, and the parts about it; which were bestowed upon him by the order of Moses himself, (Josh. xiv. 9. 13, &c, see chap. xiii. of this book, ver. 22.)

And his seed shall possess it.] Or, as some translate it, shall expel it; i. e. drive out the inhabitants of that place, and the parts adjacent, as we read he and his brother did, (Josh. xv. 13—15, &c.)

Ver. 25. Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwelt in the valley.] These words being read without a parenthesis, in conjunction with those that follow, are very plain, being thus translated; both the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valley: that is, at present lie in wait for you at the bottom of the other side of the mountain. For they were not far from one another, (chap. xiii. 29.) and the Hebrews use the word jashah for any abode in any place, though it be not a settlement, but for a short time. (See ver. 45.)

To-morrow turn you.] Therefore, do not go forward, as I formerly commanded you, lest you fall into their ambushes; but face about, and return from whence you came, &c. This he bade them do to-morrow, i. e. hereafter; at their next removal: for they did remain some days in Kadesh before they turned about, (Deut. i. ult.) And so the word to-morrow is used in Exod. xiii. 14. for the time to come.

And get you into the wilderness, by the way of the Red Sea.] Into that wilderness which led to the Red Sea, and so to Egypt, whither they desired to return, (ver. 3, 4.) This command was so grievous to them, that it set them, as I take it, into a new fit of murmuring: which is the occasion of what follows in the next verses, 26, 27.

Ver. 26. And the Lord spake unto Moses, and unto Aaron, saying.] He now speaks unto Aaron, what he only spake to Moses before, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 27. How long shall I bear with this evil congregation.] It is a short imperfect sort of speech in the Hebrew, such as men use when they are very angry; how long to this evil congregation, i. e. shall I shew mercy: which is the same with bear with them, as we translate it, to supply the sense.

Which murmur against me?] Whom nothing will please, unless they have their own will in every thing.

I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me.] This seems to signify that there was a new discontent; which, in all likelihood, arose, because God would not conduct them forward to Canaan; but bade them go back from whence they came: which order he tells them, in the following words, he would never revoke.

Ver. 28. Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the Lord.] This oath made what he had resolved unalterable.

As ye have spoken in mine ears.] See chap. v. 2.

So will I do unto you.] Give you your own wishes, to die in the wilderness; which was exactly fulfilled, (chap. xxvi. 65.)

Ver. 29. Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness.] He repeats their own desire.

And all that were numbered of you.] Which number was taken about half a year ago; as we read in the first chapter of this book, (ver. 3. 18, &c.)

According to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward.] Which amounted in all to six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty, (ver. 46.) besides the Levites, who were not numbered at this time, as we read in the next verse, 47. And when they were numbered, their number was not taken from twenty years old; but from a month old and upward, (chap. iii. 15.) And therefore, the Levites are not comprehended in the heavy sentence here denounced, no more than the children under twenty years old, or the wives of the men that murmured; but only the men of war, who were above twenty years old. And accordingly we find Eleazar, who is mentioned at the numbering of the Levites, (chap. iii. 32.) alive at the dividing of the land of Canaan, (Josh. xiv. 1.)

Ver. 30. Doubtless ye shall not come into the land.] He would not have them retain the least hope of having this sentence reversed, being established by God's oath.

Concerning which I sware to make you dwell in.] Not to make these particular men, but the seed of Abraham inhabit it; as Grotius rightly observes, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 3.) The land was promised by oath, non personis, sed populo, not to persons, but to the people; viz. to the posterity of those unto whom God sware to give it, (ver. 23.) Now such a promise, as he observes, may be performed at any time, because it is not tied to certain persons.

Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.] They are excepted, because they had distinguished themselves from the rest, by their eminent faith and courage, in the midst of a perverse generation.

Ver. 31. But your little ones.] All under twenty years old.

Which ye said should be a prey.] He upbraids them with their discontented and distrustful language, (ver. 3.)

Them will I bring in, and they shall know the land.] That is, enjoy it.

Which ye have despised.] See chap. xiii. 32.

Ver. 32. But as for you, your carcasses, they shall fall in this wilderness.] He repeats it again, to make them sensible of the certainty of it; and, in their own words, (ver. 2.) to humble and put them to confusion.

Ver. 33. And your children shall wander.] So the Chaldee interpret what in the Hebrew is shall feed, or graze, as sheep do in the deserts. Or rather, after the manner of the Arabian shepherds, who could not stay long in one place, but were forced to remove their tents to another, that they might find pasture for their flocks. So R. Solomon interprets it.

Forty years.] Reckoning from their first coming out of Egypt; from whence they were brought into the wilderness a year and a half ago; and now are condemned to make up their time of wandering in it full forty years.

And bear your whoredoms.] That is, the punishment of their whoredoms; as idolatry is peculiarly called, (chap. xv. 39. Exod. xxxiv. 15. Jerem. iii. 14.) of which they had been guilty presently after they came out of Egypt, when they made the golden calf and worshipped it; and continued other idolatrous practices, (Lev. xvii. 5. 7.) which God punishes now that he visits their present rebellion. For it was not that alone to which he threatens this punishment, but he reckons with them for all the rest of their iniquities, (Deut. ix. 18. 24.) especially for the greatest of them all, which he declared he would not forget to punish upon any new occasion, (see Exod. xxxii. 34.) which they now gave him. It must be acknowledged, also, that other heinous sins are called by this name of whoredoms in Scripture, as well as idolatry, (Psalm lxxiii. 26.) See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 23. p. 489.

Until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness.] This is the third time he reflects upon their foolish wish, (ver. 29. 32.)

Ver. 34. After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days.] See chap. xiii. 25.

(Each day for a year) shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years.] Reckoning the time past, since they came into the wilderness, which was a year and a half: so that the meaning is, they should wander forty years in the wilderness before they got out of it. Which is not to be understood so precisely as to want nothing at all of it: for they came out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the Passover, (chap. xxxiii. 3.) and they came into Canaan and pitched in Gilgal, upon the tenth day of the first month of the one-and-fortieth year after their departure from Egypt; (Josh. iv. 19.) and, consequently, there wanted five days of full forty years.

And ye shall know my breach of promise.] In the Hebrew the words are no more than these, ye shall know my breach: which the ancients understand of God's breaking in upon them, to take vengeance of them for their sin. So the LXX. γνώσεσθε τὸν θυμὸν τῆς ὀργῆς μου, ye shall know the fury of my anger; and the Vulgar translates it, ultionem meam, my vengeance: that is, you shall find that I am the avenger of iniquity. And it is the same, if we understand my breach to signify God's departure from them, who had so shamefully departed from him. Or, according to our translation, it signifies, a revocation of the blessing promised to them: which was so nullified, that they were left without any hope of having the like promise of entering into Canaan renewed to them.

Ver. 35. I the Lord have said.] Decreed and pronounced this sentence.

I will surely do it to all this evil congregation.] Break from them; or break in upon them, to consume them, and utterly disinherit this untoward generation.

That are gathered together against me.] Whom they accused, as well as Moses and Aaron, (ver. 2, 3.)

In this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there shall they die.] The repetition of this so frequently (ver. 29. 32, 33.) was to convince them the decree was peremptory and irreversible.

Ver. 36. And the men which Moses sent to search the land.] That is, ten of them.

Who returned.] See chap. xiii. 25, 26.

And made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land.] See chap. xiii. 31, 32. xiv. 2.

Ver. 37. Even those men, &c. died by the plague.] Either by the pestilence, threatened ver. 12. or by lightning, or some other sudden death: about which there is a dispute among the Hebrew doctors, in the Gemara on Sota, cap. 7. sect. 11. where some of them say they died of a quinsy, which choked them; or, as others, their tongues swelled, and hung out of their mouths down to their navels, and were full of worms, &c. So that their punishment was suitable to their sin (as they conclude); with their tongues they offended, and in their tongues they suffered.

Before the Lord.] Whose glory appeared upon the tabernacle, before them all, (ver. 10.) unto which I take these words to relate; signifying that they died in his presence (and perhaps by a flash of fire from thence), on that very day upon which this murmuring was raised by their false report.

Ver. 38. But Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of the men that went to search the land.] Here Joshua is mentioned with Caleb, and placed first (as in the sixth verse), as Caleb was in ver. 30. Which shews there was no difference made between them.

Lived still.] This is set down to shew God's faithfulness in his promise to them: who, I suppose, were now in the company of the rest of the searchers of the land, before the Lord, and had no hurt, when all the other ten fell down dead on a sudden; which made their preservation the more remarkable.

Ver. 39. And Moses told all these sayings unto all the children of Israel.] Acquainted them with the doom which God had passed upon them.

And the people mourned greatly.] Were extremely afflicted at the news; but did not beseech him to pray for them, (as at other times, chap. xi. 2.) because he had told them the doom was irreversible.

Ver. 40. And they rose up early.] Or, but they rose up.

In the morning.] The next morning after they were told what God had decreed against them.

And gat them up into the top of the mountain.] They resolved they would go up; or they prepared themselves for it: for they did not yet actually go up; as appears by the following words.

Saying, Lo, we be here.] We are ready to do as Joshua and Caleb exhorted us, chap. xiii. 30. xiv. 9. They seem now to be as forward, as before they were backward to go to possess the land: which their rising early signified.

And we will go up to the place which the Lord hath promised.] They pretend now to depend upon his promise, and to trust he will make it good.

For we have sinned.] Are sensible of our sin, and repent of it. Or, though we have sinned, yet we hope he will make good his promise.

Ver. 41. And Moses said, Wherefore now do you transgress the commandment of the Lord.] Why do you still continue in your disobedience to God; who commands you to return, and not to go forward? (ver. 25.)

But it shall not prosper.] You shall not succeed in your enterprise; which these words shew they stood ready to take in hand.

Ver. 42. Go not up.] Though they sought the renewal of God's promise with tears, (ver. 39.) and now were ready to testify their repentance with the hazard of their lives, he would not recal the sentence passed upon them.

For the Lord is not among you.] The cloud did not stir to conduct them; by which they might have understood that their attempt was presumptuous.

That ye be not smitten before your enemies.] Who, without God's help, would be too strong for them.

Ver. 43. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you.] Either they were removed out of the valley where they were before, (ver. 25.) or, their main body being there below, they sent a strong party to possess themselves of the top of the mountain, and to make good the pass against the Israelites.

And ye shall fall by the sword.] Lose your lives in the attempt.

Because ye are turned away from the Lord, therefore the Lord will not be with you.] This was a powerful reason to check their motion, and to restrain them from their attempt: but, after the manner of obstinate sinners, they go on still in their unbelief; as the next words inform us.

Ver. 44. But they presumed to go up to the hill-top.] They audaciously endeavoured to ascend the mountain, against the Divine command: which is a strange instance of hardened infidelity.

Nevertheless, the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and Moses, departed not out of the camp.] The cloud stood still over the tabernacle; and therefore Moses, and the Levites, and the ark (which went before them, when they first removed from Sinai, chap. x. 33.) did not stir out of the place where they were encamped to conduct them. But this seems to signify that all the other camps, except that of the Levites, i. e. the whole body of armed men, moved without the guidance of God; who would not favour them, because they moved against his express command.

Ver. 45. Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites.] With whom the Amorites also joined, (see Deut. i. 44.)

Which dwelt in that hill.] Who had posted themselves there, and possessed themselves of the top of the mountain, (ver. 43. and see ver. 25.)

And smote them.] Having a great advantage of them that were climbing up the hill: from whence they came pouring down upon them.

And discomfited them.] It is not said how great a slaughter they made of them; but it is likely it was not small, because they chased them a good way. Thus began God's threatening to be immediately fulfilled, (that their carcasses should fall in that wilderness, ver. 29.) by their own wilfulness.

Even unto Hormah.] A place in the confines of Canaan, near the Dead Sea: so called from the destruction that was here made of the Israelites, and afterward of the Canaanites, (chap. xxi. 3. Judg. i. 17.) And upon the occasion of this calamity which befel the Israelites, and the great mortality which followed, while they stayed in the wilderness, Moses is thought to have penned the ninetieth Psalm; in which he signifies the life of man was now shortened, and reduced to seventy or eighty years; that is, made but half as long as their forefathers'.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] We read in Deut. i. ult. that they abode in Kadesh (where the foregoing murmuring was) many days: during which time (and in the latter part of this second year after they came out of Egypt), it is very probable all that we read in this chapter, and in the four following, was transacted.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] These words were not directed to the whole congregation, but to the younger sort, who had not forfeited the favour of God, as their fathers had done; several of which, it is likely, were already dead, according to the doom God had passed upon them; and the rest looked upon themselves as disinherited: (chap. xiv. 12.) and therefore these precepts were not delivered to them.

When ye come into the land of your habitations, which I give unto you.] This shews he speaks to the children of the murmurers, whom he promised to bring into the land of Canaan, (chap. xiv. 31.) and would therefore have well instructed in the manner of sacrificing, wherein God's worship and service very much consisted; which is the reason why he further explains what he had heretofore said about this matter. But hence it appears, that they were not bound to observe these laws till they came to Canaan.

Ver. 3. And will make an offering by fire unto the Lord.] This comprehends all the sacrifices which were burnt upon the altar, either in the whole or in part.

A burnt-offering.] This was the principal, and most ancient sacrifice of all other; which was wholly burnt upon the altar, every morning and every evening, (Exod. xxix. 40.) of which he treats in the first of Leviticus.

Of a sacrifice.] This undoubtedly signifies peace-offerings, as appears from ver. 8. and from the words here following; and likewise from the use of the word sacrifice in other places, (Exod. xviii. 12. Levit. xvii. 5. 8.) and from this consideration also, that sin-offerings had no meat-offerings attending on them, but only in the case of a leper, (Lev. xiv. 10.)

In performing a vow, or in a free-will-offering.] These words explain what he means by a sacrifice, viz. peace-offerings; which were offered in performance of some vow, or freely of their own accord, (Lev. vii. 16. xxii. 21.) or by God's command upon their solemn feasts; as it here follows.

And in your solemn feasts.] Mentioned Levit. xxiii. (See there, ver. 37. and Numb xxix. 39.)

To make a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Levit. i. 9.

Of the herd or of the flock.] Under the word flock is comprehended both kids and lambs: for the Hebrew words tson and seh signify both; as many have observed, particularly Bochart in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 42.)

Ver. 4. Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the Lord.] Of any of the forenamed sorts.

Bring a meat-offering.] As a necessary appurtenance to such sacrifices.

Of a tenth-deal of flour.] That is, the tenth part of an ephah, (as is expressly declared, chap. xxviii. 5.) which was an omer: (see Exod. xvi. 36.)

Mingled with the fourth part of a hin of oil.] See Exod. xxix. 40. In this, such meat-offerings as were accessaries to other offerings, and a part of the sacrifice, which went before, differed from those meat-offerings which were not dependant upon a foregoing sacrifice, but offered alone by themselves: for in these latter the oil was only poured upon the meat-offering, (Lev. ii. 1, &c.) and not mingled and macerated with the flour; as it is here ordered: and there was this further difference between them, that those meat-offerings which were accessary to other sacrifices, were all burnt on the altar, in honour of God, as Josephus observes, lib. iii. cap. 10. but when a meat-offering was solitary (as we may call it), as the principal offering which a man then made, a little part of it only was burnt upon the altar, and the priest had the rest; as appears from the second chapter of Leviticus.

Ver. 5. And a fourth of a hin of wine for a drink-offering shalt thou prepare.] See Exod. xxix. 40.

With the burnt-offering or sacrifice.] Whether it were a whole burnt-offering, or a peace-offering, (ver. 3.) this wine was wholly poured upon the altar; and the priest had none of it.

For one lamb.] It was the same for one kid. If there were more than one, the drink-offering, as well as the meat-offering, was increased; particularly upon the sabbath, (chap. xxviii. 9.) And the true reason why meat-offerings and drink-offerings are required to attend upon the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, was, because these sacrifices were a feast, and are called the bread or food of God, (chap. xxviii. 2.) And therefore, as bread and wine, as well as flesh, are our refection; so God required them at his table. And salt, though not here named, was also added, (because it was to be omitted in no sacrifice, Lev. ii. 13.) as also frankincense; because it is said both ver. 7. and ver. 10. this drink-offering was for a sweet savour unto the Lord; which seems to allude to the fragrancy of frankincense.

This was a thing so well known, that the heathen imitated this practice, in all their sacrifices, which were ever accompanied with a meat-offering: insomuch that Pliny saith, without this mola salsa, no sacrifice was thought to be good: "Nullum sacrificium ratum fieri existimant," (lib. xxx. cap. 5.) And long before him we meet with it in Homer, in those known words of his,

———Οὐλοχύτας προβάλοντο.

And as for wine, Brentius, in his paraphrase to Leviticus, takes notice of that phrase in him, no less obvious,

———ἐπὶ δ' αἴθοπα οἶνον
Λείβε———

which they not only poured upon the sacrifice, as it stood at the altar ready to be offered, but upon its flesh, when it was burning there: as we find in Virgil, Georg. iv.

"Ter liquido ardentem perfudit Nectare flammam."

And in many other places. (See Dilherrus, in his Dissert. Specialis de Cacozelia Gentilium, cap. 10.)

Ver. 6. Or for a ram, thou shalt prepare for a meat-offering two tenth-deals, &c.] This being a nobler sacrifice than a lamb, a larger meat-offering (and drink-offering also, as appears by the next verse) is required to attend it.

Ver. 7. And for a drink-offering, thou shalt offer a third part of a hin of wine, &c.] Whereas for a lamb a fourth part was sufficient, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 8. And when thou preparest a bullock.] This is a sacrifice of the herd, as the former of the flock, mentioned ver. 3.

For a burnt-offering, or for a sacrifice in performing a vow, or peace-offerings unto the Lord.] That is, free-will-offerings; which were one sort of peace-offerings, as those for performance of a vow were the other: (see ver. 3.) But free-will-offerings are peculiarly called by the name of peace-offerings, because they were the most acceptable of this sort; being offered purely out of love and affection to God, and not as a payment which was due upon a vow.

Ver. 9. Then shall he bring with the bullock a meat-offering of three tenth-deals of flour, &c.] The meat-offerings increased proportionably to the sacrifices upon which they attended: one tenth-deal, with a fourth part of a hin of oil, being sufficient for a lamb, (ver. 4.) and two tenth-deals, with a third part of a hin of oil, for a ram, (ver. 6.) but three tenth-deals of flour, and half a hin of oil, is here required to accompany the sacrifice of a bullock.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt bring for a drink-offering half a hin of wine, &c.] The same was to be observed in the drink-offering; which is larger in this sacrifice than in the two former, (ver. 5. 7.)

Ver. 11. Thus shall it be done for one bullock, or for one ram, or for a lamb, or a kid.] He repeats what he had said more distinctly, proceeding from the sacrifice last mentioned unto the first: which (ver. 5.) is said to be one lamb; but here explained to comprehend also a kid. For so the last part of this verse runs in the Hebrew; for a young one (which he calls seh) either of the sheep, or of the goats.

Ver. 12. According to the number that ye shall prepare, so shall ye do to every one, according to their number.] This I take to be a general rule, by which these offerings were to be governed; that, proportionable to the number of bullocks, rams, sheep, or goats that were offered, should be the quantity of the meat-offering and drink-offering; for bread and wine must bear proportion to the meat set on the table.

Ver. 13. All that are born in the country shall do these things after this manner.] i. e. All Israelites.

In offering an offering made by fire, &c.] When they offer any of the forenamed sacrifices, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 14. And if a stranger sojourn with you.] There were two sorts of strangers, it is vulgarly known, among the Israelites: some that entirely embraced and professed the Jewish religion, into which they were admitted by circumcision, &c.; others that were permitted to live among them, having renounced all idolatry, but did not submit to their whole religion. The Talmudists expound this place of the former sort.

Or whosoever be among you in your generation.] One would think this should signify the other sort of strangers; but they make it only an explication of the former: whether he were a proselyte that sojourned for a time, or were settled among them.

And will offer an offering made by fire of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Any of the forementioned offerings, which could be offered, as is here directed, by none but one that was subject to their law. For though another proselyte, who worshipped the true God, but was not circumcised, might bring a burnt-offering; yet they say it was without a meat-offering and drink-offering; and no peace-offerings were accepted from him.

As ye do, so he shall do.] Offer according to the rules above given; which is farther explained in the following verses.

Ver. 15. One ordinance.] viz. About sacrifices.

Shall be both for you of the congregation.] i. e. For you Israelites.

And also for the stranger that sojourneth with you.] Here the LXX. translate it, Προσηλύτοις προσκειμένοις ἐν ὑμῖν, proselytes that are added, or joined to you; or are juris vestri participes, as Mr. Selden expounds it, (lib. ii. Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 147.)

An ordinance for ever, &c.] Never to be repealed as long as your religion lasts.

As ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord.] In matters of religion and Divine worship, though not in all civil things: for no proselyte, they think, could be chosen a member of the Sanhedrin, or great council at Jerusalem. The Jews extend these words to the way and manner of being made proselytes, by circumcision, baptism, and sprinkling of blood; as the Jews were originally, they say, initiated into their religion. (Selden, lib. i. de Syned. cap. 3. p. 34.)

Ver. 16. One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you.] This general rule was made to invite and encourage strangers to become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and to engage the Jews to be kind to them; they being admitted to an ἰσοτιμία, as Philo calls it, an equal privilege with those who were born Jews. Yet this, the Jews say, is to be received with some distinctions; for the laws of Moses, either concerning the duties they owed to God and one to another, or concerning magistracy and marriages; they say, those of the first sort belonged to proselytes, as much as to original Jews, yet with some temperament; (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4.) but in those of the second sort they had not an equal privilege; for they were not to have any sort of command, either civil or military: and though they might marry with the Jews, yet not with the priests; and some marriages were permitted to them, which were forbidden to the Israelites: (see there, p. 167.)

Ver. 17. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] These commands were given, in all likelihood, at the same time with the foregoing.

Ver. 18. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] See ver. 2.

When ye come into the land whither I bring you.] See there also; only add this, that the Jews acknowledge such kind of offerings, as here follow, and first-fruits, were due by the law only from the corn, &c. that grew in the land of Canaan; but by the decree of their wise men, they were to bring them out of Syria, and out of the land of Og and Sihon; as Maimonides saith in his treatise called Biccurim, cap. 2.

Ver. 19. When ye eat.] i. e. When it is ready to be eaten; for they offered it before they ate of it.

Of the bread of the land.] So corn is called, (Psalm civ. 14.) and the meaning seems to be, that when they made bread of the new corn of the land, they should out of the dough first make a cake, and offer it to the Lord, before they baked bread for their own use.

Ye shall offer up a heave-offering unto the Lord.] This is explained in the next verse, of offering a cake out of the first dough, whether it were of wheat, or barley, or rye, or oats, or that which they call cusemim (which they describe to be a kind of wheat, or barley, different from that which is commonly known by those names); for of these five kinds of grain, the Talmudists say, this cake was to be offered; and that out of the gleanings, and the sheaf left in the field, and out of the corners of the field.

Ver. 20. Ye shall offer up a cake of the first of your dough for a heave-offering.] Not upon the altar; but it was given to the priests, on whom God bestowed all their heave-offerings, (chap. xviii. 8.) yet they are said to be offered unto the Lord, because they were heaved, or lifted up to him, as the Creator of heaven and of earth; and then given to his ministers, who had it in his right.

As ye do the heave-offering of the thrashing-floor, so shall ye heave it.] That is, as the first-fruits of the harvest were given to the priests, and not offered upon the altar, so should this be given them, (Lev. xxiii. 16, 17.) and so were the first-fruits of their oil and their wine, &c. (Numb. xviii. 12, 13.) All which the Jews call the great terumah, or heave-offering.

Ver. 21. Of the first of your dough shall ye give unto the Lord a heave-offering in your generations.] This being a new law, not given before, he repeats it, that they might be the more observant of it: as we may see they were by this; that it was one of the things which rendered a woman infamous (though not so as to give her the bitter water), if she did not separate this cake from the first dough of the new corn to be presented to God; but either made her husband believe she had done it, when she had not, or ate it herself; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 17. and therefore at this very day the Jews are so nice in this point, that they take enough to make a cake, as soon as the meal is mingled with water. The proportion is not mentioned in the law; but their wise men say, it was to be the forty-fourth part of the whole dough: (see Buxtorf. Synagog. Jud. cap. 34.) The cabalists observing that this verse begins with the letter mem, and ends with mem, conclude (after their way), that therefore they were to give the fortieth part, because mem is the numeral letter for forty.

Ver. 22. And if ye have erred, and not observed all these commandments which the Lord hath spoken unto Moses.] Which have been now given concerning sacrifices; for to such commandments these words seem to have respect. Maimonides, in his treatise of the worship of the planets (and the Jews generally), saith this concerns idolatry.

Ver. 23. Even all that the Lord hath commanded you by the hand of Moses.] That is, all the commandments in the book of Leviticus, about such matters of God's worship and service.

From the day that the Lord commanded Moses.] The word Moses is not in the Hebrew, and the sense is plainer without it, as the Vulgar hath translated these words, from the day he began to command.

And henceforward.] Or rather thenceforward, until now; or until he made an end of commanding. So this phrase is used in Lev. xxii. 27. From the eighth day, and thenceforth, creatures were clean to be offered. (See Ezek. xxxix. 22.)

Among your generations.] In the Hebrew, to your generations. And so the LXX. εἰς τὰς γενεὰς, to be observed throughout all generations.

Ver. 24. Then it shall be, that if aught be committed by ignorance, without the knowledge of the congregation.] It is commonly said, that Moses here speaks concerning sins of omission (as we call them), as in Lev. iv. 13. he doth of sins of commission, or doing that which ought not to be done; as here not doing that which ought to be done; for which different sorts of sacrifices are appointed. But others think that he speaks in both places of the same errors; only in that law, (Lev. iv. 14.) concerning those committed by the whole congregation, here of such as were committed by some lesser number of them, called the congregation; suppose the seventy elders, or the rulers of thousands and hundreds, &c. who are sometimes called by this name, (chap. xxv. 7. xxxii. 12. Josh. xxiv. 4.) But the Jews generally think Moses here speaks of strange worship, which was to be expiated by this sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering. And therefore an excellent person of our own, after long consideration of this matter, comes to this conclusion: that in Leviticus he requires a young bullock to be slain for a sin-offering, when the whole congregation, though adhering to the true worship of God in every thing, were led ignorantly to do something against some negative precept (as they call it); to practise, that is, what God had forbidden, (so those words seem to import, Lev. iv. 13, 14.) but this kid of the goats here mentioned for a sin-offering, together with a young bullock for a burnt-offering, was to be sacrificed, when all the people, forgetting the holy rites prescribed by Moses (which often happened under bad kings), fell by a common error into idolatrous worship; which agrees very well with what is said in the two verses beforegoing; where he speaks, as I noted, of not observing these holy rites about sacrifices: (see Dr. Outram, lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 14. sect. 2.)

Then all the congregation shall offer one young bullock for a burnt-offering.] Having neglected these laws ordained by Moses, and worshipped God in a wrong manner, according to the rites used in other countries (or at least mistaking the proper sacrifices and rites belonging to them, which they ought to have offered), this burnt-offering, I suppose, is commanded to be offered, when they saw their error, in token that they returned to God's true religion, and that way of worship which he had prescribed.

With his meat-offering, and his drink-offering.] Prescribed above, ver. 8—10. Which, perhaps, they had neglected to offer formerly with the burnt-offering.

It is well observed by Mr. Thorndike out of Maimonides, that all the congregation (if we understand thereby the whole body of the people), could not possibly offer these sacrifices; but the great consistory offered them as often as they occasioned the breach of the law, by interpreting it erroneously. (Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 159.)

And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] To expiate for what had been done after the manner of the heathen, contrary to the laws of God's worship here delivered by Moses; or otherwise than he directed: from whence it was (which adds much probability to this), that when Hezekiah restored the true worship of God, after the temple had been shut up, and the daily sacrifice omitted, and many idolatrous rites there used, by the ignorance of the people, in the days of his father, (2 Chron. xxviii. 24. xxix. 3.) he caused seven bullocks to be offered for a burnt-offering; and as many goats for a sin-offering; and so Ezra did at the restoration of the Divine service after they came out of Babylon, (Ezra viii. 35.) And it makes no difference, that Moses here requires only one of a sort to be offered, whereas Hezekiah offered seven, and Ezra twelve; for this only proves that one was absolutely necessary, but more than one was acceptable; especially when exceeding great errors had been committed in God's worship.

Ver. 25. And the priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation.] Who had thus committed an error in the worship of God out of ignorance: being misled by the great interpreters of the law; who therefore were to bring this sacrifice in the name of them all. For it is apparent by this, as well as the former verse, that all the congregation were concerned in this sacrifice, as much as in that Lev. iv. 13. And the same appears from the next verse, where he saith, all the people were in ignorance.

And it shall be forgiven them, for it is ignorance.] Proceeding from an erroneous interpretation of the law, or some other mistake; not from contempt of God and of his laws: for then they were to be utterly cut off, (ver. 30, 31.)

And they shall bring their offering, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.] That is, a burnt-offering: which is not prescribed in Leviticus (as I observed before), and therefore was a different sort of offering, for a different offence.

And their sin-offering before the Lord.] Prescribed in the foregoing verse.

For their ignorance.] Which made them capable of a pardon; though not without these sacrifices.

Ver. 26. And it shall be forgiven all the congregation of the children of Israel.] He repeats it again, that they might not doubt of reconciliation to him, when they repented as soon as they understood their error, and acknowledged it, and begged his pardon by these sacrifices.

And the stranger that sojourneth among them.] Who were obliged to the same laws with the Israelites, and had the same privileges, (ver. 14—16.)

Seeing all the people were in ignorance.] It was a common error; and therefore no wonder strangers were carried away with it.

Ver. 27. And if any soul.] i. e. Any particular person.

Sin through ignorance.] Offend in matters of religion; by not observing the rites here prescribed, or by doing contrary to them through mere ignorance. To this, I think, these words are to be limited; wherein they differ from that law, Lev. iv. 27. which speaks of all manner of offences through ignorance.

Then he shall bring a she-goat of the first year for a sin-offering.] This sin-offering differs from that in Leviticus, (chap. iv. 28.) which was only a female kid of the goats.

Ver. 28. And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly.] As he was to do for the whole congregation, (ver. 25.)

When he sinneth by ignorance before the Lord.] These words, before the Lord, seem to me to import, that he speaks of sins committed about the worship of God; and confirms what I have said upon ver. 24. For in Lev. iv. both ver. 13. and ver. 27. he speaks in general of sins committed, either by the congregation, or by particular persons, against any of the commandments of the Lord, not before the Lord; i. e. (as I understand it) in his worship and service.

To make an atonement for him, &c.] He repeats it again, to shew them that he would no more have a particular person suffer for his error than the whole body of the people.

Ver. 29. You shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.] See ver. 15. This must necessarily be meant of a proselyte of justice, as they called him that was circumcised, and undertook to keep the whole law; for he speaks of such, whether natives or others, as erred in not observing all his commandments, (ver. 22, 23.)

Ver. 30. But the soul that doeth aught presumptuously.] Not merely knowingly, but wilfully and audaciously; in contempt of the Divine Majesty and his authority: for so the Hebrew phrase, with a high hand, signifies, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim. par. iii. cap. 41. where he saith, it imports a sin, not only publicly and openly committed, but with pride and insolence; it proceeding, not merely from an ill custom a man hath got of doing amiss, but from an express intention to contradict the law of God, and to set himself in defiance of it: which is the reason of what follows, the same reproacheth the Lord.

Whether he be born in the land, or a stranger.] Here the word stranger is simply used, without the addition of that sojourneth among them (as in the preceding verse), and therefore Mr. Selden well concludes, that even the proselytes of the gate were concerned in this law (as it related to idolatry and blasphemy), though not in the foregoing; and that they were liable to be cut off by the hand of Heaven; but whether to be punished by the judges or not, it doth not appear, (lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11.)

The same reproacheth the Lord.] "No man sinned thus (saith Maimonides in the place forenamed), but he who had a settled opinion in his mind, contrary to the law of God; in which he dissented from it. And the common received exposition of this place is, that it speaks of an idolater; because he opposed the chief and principal foundation of the law. For no man worshipped a star, or a planet, but he that believed its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy, (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 6. p. 101.) but a certain manner of sinning, with despite to the commands of God, and contempt of his authority, in any kind of sin whatsoever. And this Maimonides himself afterward acknowledges, in the words following: "There seems to me to be the same reason in all other transgressions, which are committed contemptuously against any law of God; as, if an Israelite seethed a kid in its mother's milk, or wore heterogeneous garments, or rounded the corners of his head, or his beard, in contempt of the law. For the consequence of this is, that he believes this law not to be true; which, in my judgment (saith he) is the meaning of these words, He reproacheth the Lord."

And that soul shall be cut off from among his people.] No sacrifice could make an atonement for such a man; but he was to die, either by the hand of Heaven, or of the judges. Sometimes God saith, he will cut off idolaters, and such as consulted familiar spirits, (Lev. xx. 5, 6.) Sometimes he only saith certain offenders shall be cut off; as here in this, and many other places. Of which phrase I have given an account, Gen. xvii. 14. where the reader may see the several opinions that have been about it; and that its meaning must be determined by the matter in hand. Accordingly, Maimonides hath judiciously resolved, that, in this place, it signifies cutting off by the hand of the magistrates, as in the case of apostacy to idolatry, (Deut. xiii. 13, &c.) Not that all their goods were to be destroyed, and nothing left to their heirs (as when they served other gods); but, though a whole tribe had, with a high hand, transgressed any precept of the law, that is, denied it to be God's law, he thinks they were only to be all killed. Just as all the people thought in the case of the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh; who, only building an altar on the other side of Jordan, contrary to God's law, as was imagined, all the rest of the tribes of Israel gathered together, to go up to war against them, and cut them off, Josh. xxii. 11, 12, &c. 22, 23. where they acknowledged they deserved to perish, if they had built an altar for worship, as their brethren thought they had done.

Ver. 31. Because he hath despised the word of the Lord.] This shews the nature of the offence; which was setting at nought God's laws, and denying them to be of Divine authority.

And hath broken his commandment.] Not only by doing contrary to it, but, in effect, disannulling it; by rejecting its authority, and affirming he is not bound to observe that precept.

That soul shall be utterly cut off.] They shall have no mercy upon him.

His iniquity shall be upon him.] Not upon those who put him to death; but upon himself.

Ver. 32. And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness.] In this part of the wilderness, at Kadesh-barnea, it is very probable: (see ver. 1.)

They found a man.] The Jews, who would not be thought ignorant of any thing, say this man was one of those that presumed to go up to the mountain, when Moses forbade them, (chap. xiv. 44.) And some of them say expressly, his name was Zelophehad; about the dividing of whose estate a question afterward arose, (chap. xxvii. 1, &c.) So the Chaldee paraphrase, ascribed to Jonathan and others: (see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1. n. 9.)

That gathered sticks.] Or was binding up sticks, which he had gathered, and plucked up by the roots out of the earth; as some of the Jews understand the Hebrew word (Mr. Selden there observes), from Exod. v. 7.

On the sabbath-day.] This the Jewish doctors would have to be the very next sabbath after its first institution in the wilderness; which is to make this history misplaced, and the foregoing also, without any necessity.

Ver. 33. And they that found him gathering sticks.] Admonished him (as the Jews also say) of the unlawfulness of it, and wished him to desist. But he would not hearken unto them; and therefore (as it here follows) they brought him unto Moses, &c. as one that contemptuously, and with a high hand, had offended God. For they make this an instance of such a presumptuous sin as is mentioned before, ver. 30, 31. which is not improbable. And it appears from hence, that they observed the sabbath while they were in the wilderness; and therefore did not bring him before

Moses on that day, but the next after; or at least he was not judged till the next day.

Brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation.] Who were now, they fancy, hearing a sacred lecture, when they brought the man before Moses. For he was the chief judge, who was to determine such cases: though we may conceive the seventy elders (who were constituted before this happened, chap. xi. 24, &c.) to have been now sitting, and Moses at the head of them. But he being not deprived of any authority by their creation, who were added only to give him ease, it is more likely this man was set before Moses, as the sole judge of this case. For God speaks to him alone, (ver. 35.) when he directs what should be done with him. Yet Aaron and the elders, it appears by these words, were present (and called here all the congregation), when this offender was brought before him.

Ver. 34. And they put him in ward.] By the order of Moses, (as they did the man that blasphemed, Lev. xxiv. 12.) to secure him, till the mind of God was known how he should be punished.

Because it was not declared what should be done to him.] They knew very well that he was to die; for it had been declared, (Exod. xxxi. 14. xxxv. 2.) but they questioned what kind of death he should suffer, as the Jews interpret it. For they observe this difference between that case of the blasphemer in Leviticus, and this here of the sabbath-breaker: that there they doubted whether he should be punished by them, or by the hand of Heaven; but here, what kind of death they should inflict upon him. Though there are some (as Mr. Selden there observes, n. 8.) who imagine, the question here also was, whether the sense of the law was, that they should expect his punishment from God, or he be put to death by the court of judgment.

Ver. 35. And the Lord said unto Moses.] Who went, I suppose, into the sanctuary, to inquire what the pleasure of God was in this matter; as he did in another difficulty, (Numb. ix. 8.)

The man shall be surely put to death.] By this answer, it seems to me, the question was not, at first, what death he should die; but whether he should be put to death or not: that is, whether the gathering and binding up sticks into a faggot was such a work as is forbidden in the law, (Exod. xx.) unto which death was afterward threatened in the places beforementioned. And the resolution was, that he should be put to death, as a man that denied God, the creator of the world; though not in words, yet in fact. For he who did any work on the sabbath, (as Aben Ezra notes upon Exod. xx.) denied the work of creation; though he did not in downright terms deny God himself. For the sabbath being a sign (as God calls it) that they were the worshippers of him who made all things; the contempt of that was a renouncing of their religion, and therefore deserved to be punished with death; the belief of the creation of the world being the very foundation of the Jewish religion; as the belief of its eternity was the foundation of the pagan. This made the breach of this precept, of keeping the sabbath strictly (which is more frequently repeated than any other, for the reason forementioned), so heinous a crime, and so severely punished; for by this time a true worshipper of God was distinguished from a profane person and an idolater.

All the congregation shall stone him with stones, without the camp.] This was a punishment inflicted for very enormous crimes. (See Lev. xx. 2. xxiv. 12.) And this man was condemned to suffer it, because he was the first breaker of this sacred law. And he doing it presumptuously, (as is supposed from the connexion of this story with ver. 30, 31.) in contempt of the law; and not desisting from his impiety, when he was admonished to forbear, (as I said, ver. 33.) it highly aggravated his guilt; being no less than a reproaching of the Lord, and a despising of his word. Whence the vulgar saying of the Talmudists, He that denies the sabbath, is like to him that denies the whole law.

Ver. 36. And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him, &c.] Not on the sabbath-day, as I said before; for that was unlawful (as Philo observes), but the next day after; or as soon as Moses had passed sentence upon him.

Ver. 37. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This was spoken, it is most likely, about the same time that the foregoing passage happened, and the commands mentioned in the beginning of this chapter were delivered. For this that follows, is a direction for the better observance of all the rest of God's commandments.

Ver. 38. Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes.] This is the best word we have in our language to express the Hebrew word tzitzith, which imports something of an ornament resembling a flower, as the word tzitz signifies. Of how many threads they consist, and after what fashion they are made by the Jews at this day, see Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica, cap. 9.

In the borders of their garments.] Or (as it is in the Hebrew) in the wings of their garments; which had four skirts, as appears by Deut. xxii. 12. at the bottom of each of which they were to have a fringe: which seem to have been only threads left at the end of the web unwoven; at the top whereof they put a lace, as it here follows.

Throughout their generations.] To be a perpetual mark of their religion, and put them in mind of their duty.

And that they put upon the fringe of the borders a riband.] Or, a lace; which both bound the fringe fast at the top, and also made it more conspicuous and observable; which was the intention of it. For by this they were distinguished from all other people who were not Jews; as well as put in mind of the precepts of God, as it follows in the next verse.

Of blue.] Or, as some would have it translated, of purple. But the Hebrew writers say, thecheleth signifies that colour which we now call ultramarine; as Braunius hath observed, (lib. i. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 13. and Bochart. Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 10, 11.)

There is another very learned person, also, who hath more lately shewn, out of an excellent MS. in his possession, what the Jews deliver concerning the way and manner of dying this colour: which being not easy to compass, the Jews at this day, instead of this colour, are contented to use white. (See J. Wagenseil upon the Gemara Sotæ, cap. 2. annot. 8.)

Ver. 39. And it shall be to you for a fringe.] Or rather, it (that is, the riband) shall be unto you upon the fringe; or, to the fringe; added to it, to make it the more noted; being of a distinct colour from the fringe, which was of the same colour. And the garment, the Jews say, in the selvage of which these fringes were, was their upper garment, called talith, being a kind of cloak.

That ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord.] i. e. When they looked down, this fringe and lace which they saw there might put them in mind of the duty they owed to God; who commanded this, not for itself, but to remember them that they were a holy people, bound to God by peculiar laws, which they should be as careful to observe as to wear these fringes. Hence it was that they, who pretended to greater sanctity than others, enlarged these fringes, (as our Saviour observes, Matt. xxiii. 5.) i. e. extended them to a greater length, so that they swept the ground, which made them more observable, as Braunius notes out of the Gemara of Gittim. lib. i. de Vest. Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 3. n. 16. where he also observes, that their superstition grew so much, as with great subtilty to contrive, that these fringes might be so wrought, as to denote the six hundred and thirteen precepts contained in the law of Moses; that so they might be put in mind of all the commandments of the Lord. (See Buxtorf also in the place beforenamed; and Bishop Montague, in his Apparatus, cap. 7. n. 32.)

And do them.] Which was the end of remembering them, as that was of their wearing them; though the Jews proved so foolish, as to pride themselves in the bare use of their ornaments; i. e. in their being a select people; which ought to have made them more careful to do the whole will of God.

And that ye seek not after your own heart.] Follow not your own thoughts and imaginations, (as Maimonides expounds it, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 39.) or rather, your own desires. Or the word seek may import, inventing other ways of serving God, according to their own fancies.

And your own eyes.] Nor follow the example of others; as they were prone to do, it appears, by their making the golden calf, that they might have such a visible representation of God, as other nations were wont to have.

After which ye use to go a whoring.] It appears by this, that the foregoing words have a peculiar regard to the worship of God (which he speaks of in the beginning of this chapter), from which, when they departed, they are said to go a whoring from God, unto whom they were espoused.

Ver. 40. That ye may remember and do all my commandments.] He would not have them think there was any sanctity to be placed merely in wearing these fringes; but they were to be considered only as instruments, to call their duty to remembrance, and excite them to the performance of it. And so the Jews themselves sometimes call them, as Buxtorf observes in the place beforenamed, "means and instruments of observing the precepts."

And be holy unto your God.] By observing all his commandments; especially keeping themselves from idols.

Ver. 41. I am the Lord your God.] Their sovereign and benefactor.

Which brought you out of the land of Egypt.] He remembers them of the most peculiar obligation they had upon them, to observe this law and all the rest of his precepts.

To be your God.] They were redeemed by him on purpose, when none else could deliver them, that they might acknowledge no other God, but only him, to whom they owed their liberty, to serve him.

I am the Lord your God.] This seems to be repeated, to encourage them to hope that he would still continue good to them, notwithstanding the rebellion of their fathers; for which he had condemned them to die in the wilderness; where he would preserve them (their children), and at last bring them into Canaan, if they would follow his directions.

CHAP. XVI.

WE have nothing here said to direct us to the time and place, when and where this new rebellion happened; but it is very probable (as I said, chap. xv. 1.) that it was in some part of the second year after they came out of Egypt, before they removed from Kadesh-barnea.

Ver. 1. Now Korah the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi.] By this it is evident that Korah was cousin-german (as we speak) to Moses and Aaron; for Izhar (Korah's father) was the second son of Kohath, as Amram (the father of Moses and Aaron) was his eldest son, (Exod. vi. 18. 1 Chron. vi. 2.)

And Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab.] This Eliab was the son of Pallu, the second son of Reuben, as appears from chap. xxvi. 5. 8, 9.

And On the son of Peleth.] He also was descended from Reuben, as well as Dathan and Abiram (as the next words tell us, sons of Reuben), but of what family it doth not appear. Nor is this man any where again mentioned, no, not in the progress of this conspiracy; which inclines me to think, that though he entered into it, yet he afterward withdrew himself, or was so inconsiderable, that no notice was taken of him.

Took men.] The word men is not in the Hebrew; but simply Korah took. Which word took being the first word in the Hebrew text, the whole verse may be thus translated, Korah the son of Izhar, &c. took both Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab, and On the son of Peleth, &c. That is, he drew these into a conspiracy with him. Or, he betook himself to a party, as the Chaldee understands it, he divided himself; with an intention, that is, to make a sedition. But the sense is the same, if we follow our translation, he took men; that is, complices or associates with him in his rebellion: by which we may understand the two hundred and fifty, mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 2. And they rose up.] Made an insurrection: in which Korah seems to have been the ringleader, having drawn the rest into it; which he might the more easily do, because the Kohathites and Reubenites lay encamped on the very same side of the tabernacle, (Numb. ii. 10. compared with chap. iii. 29.) by which means they had opportunity often to conspire together. Whence R. Solomon makes this reflection, Woe to the wicked, and woe to his neighbour! The cause of the insurrection is generally thought, both by Jews and Christians, to have been, that Korah could not brook the preferment of Aaron and his family, so high above the rest of the Levites, who were made only their ministers, (chap. iii. 6. 9. viii. 19.) For he thought this was too great a difference between the children of two brothers, who were of equal deserts. Nay, Aben Ezra thinks, that he wholly disliked the late exchange of the first-born for the Levites. And besides, it may be thought that he stomached the late preferment of Elizaphan the son of Uzziel, who was the youngest son of Kohath, to be chief of the family of the Kohathites, (chap. iii. 30.) which he thought rather belonged to himself, who was the son of the second son of Kohath. And finding himself too weak to make an insurrection alone, he persuaded Dathan and Abiram (of the tribe of Reuben), and those in whom they had an interest, to join with him, upon another pretence; that they were descended from the eldest son of Israel, to whom the chief authority in the nation belonged, which Moses had taken upon himself; and likewise preferred the tribe of Judah to the principal place in their encampment, (chap. ii. 3.) and also the seventy elders to be his assistants, without their advice, and leaving them out of the number.

Such as these may be thought to be the grounds upon which they proceeded: Korah seeking the priesthood, and the sons of Reuben the civil dignity. But it seems to me that the ground of the quarrel was wholly upon the account of the priesthood (as I shall shew upon the next verse), and that they struck at Moses only as advancing his brother and his family, by his own authority, and not (as they pretended) by God's direction. For, as Dathan and Abiram did not appear openly, when they had formed this faction (for we find them in their tents, ver. 12. and refusing to come to Moses when he sent for them), so, in the next verse, they seem to speak of nothing but the priesthood: and so Moses understood their meaning, ver. 5. 10. 15.

Before Moses.] In an open defiance of his authority; who, they pretended, had no power to make such alterations as he had done.

With certain of the children of Israel.] It is not said out of what tribe; but it is likely out of several: if not some out of every tribe, in whom they had any interest.

Two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, &c.] The LXX. divide their character into three parts. First, that they were princes of the assembly, ἀρχηγοὺς συναγωγῆς, rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, &c. And secondly,

Famous in the congregation.] Which they translate συνκλητοὺς βουλῆς, who used to be called to public consultations, when they were to deliberate about weighty affairs. And so several, both ancient and modern, translations, as Mr. Selden hath shewn ,ib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 4. n. 10. where he saith, they were called " maxime puto, si non solum, deliberandi causa," chiefly, if not only, to have their advice. And then lastly,

Men of renown.] Such who had got a great name (that is, fame and credit) among the people, upon these, or other accounts. This made the insurrection the more dangerous, that such great persons were engaged and appeared in it.

Ver. 3. And they gathered themselves together.] The forenamed company came in a body.

Against Moses.] As an arbitrary disposer of all preferment.

And against Aaron.] Who was promoted by Moses to the office of high-priest; which he himself had discharged before Aaron's consecration; which, perhaps, they made a ground of their quarrel.

And said unto them, Ye take too much upon you.] In the Hebrew the words are rab-lachem, it is sufficient for you: that is, you have domineered long enough; resign your places to others: for all of us, nay, every man in Israel, is as good as you.

Seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them.] Here seems to be the root of the quarrel. Before Moses's time every one might offer sacrifice in his own family (as I have often observed), which custom these men would have had still continued; being angry that this high office was confined to one family alone, who were to enjoy all the benefits of it; which were exceeding great. For the priests had a large share in most offerings; and some things wholly to themselves. This is the more probable, because it was so very hard to convince the people that God had settled this dignity, and all the profits belonging to it in Aaron's family. For though God did a new thing never heard of before, to demonstrate these people, that rose against Moses and Aaron, to be seditious, yet it was necessary still to do more. For after the earth had swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, and fire consumed Korah and his company, and a plague destroyed many more of them, the Lord did another miracle, (chap. xvii. 8.) in making Aaron's rod blossom and bud, and bring forth almonds in one night's time; when all the rest of the rods remained dry sticks: which makes it probable, as I said before, there were some in all the tribes who were engaged in this sedition; and were so deeply infected with the false notions of Korah, that it was necessary to give them all this satisfaction.

And the Lord is among them.] The people need no other governor but him, who dwells among them in his tabernacle, where they can present their sacrifices to him themselves without your assistance.

Wherefore then lift you up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord?] Since God owns us all for his special and peculiar people, why do you take upon you such high places and dignity above us all? For Moses disposed and ordered all things; and Aaron, by his order, took upon him to be solely God's chief minister in his sanctuary.

Ver. 4. And when Moses heard it, he fell upon his face.] With Aaron also, it is likely, as they did lately, (chap. xiv. 5.) And for the same end (see there), to deprecate God's displeasure (which they might justly think would now rise higher than ever), and to beg his direction what to do in such a dangerous state of things.

Ver. 5. And he spake unto Korah, and unto all his company.] This shews that Korah was the head of this faction, and Dathan and Abiram did not at the first (I guess from hence) appear with him.

Saying.] Being risen up from prayer, he made this answer to the seditious people, by order from God, who, no doubt, directed him to this way of suppressing them.

Even to-morrow the Lord will shew, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, to-morrow (or, in the morning) and the Lord will shew, &c. That is, stay but till to-morrow, and it shall appear, without any further delay, whether you or we be in the right. He would keep them in suspense no longer, and yet gave them so much time to consider better, and repent. Some observe that the morning was the time of executing justice, and therefore here appointed.

Will the Lord shew.] By some visible token.

Who are his.] Or, who appertain to him; viz. as his ministers.

And who is holy.] Separated and solemnly consecrated, by his appointment, to the sacred office of priesthood.

And will cause him to come near unto him.] Make it appear that they are the persons who ought to burn incense and to offer sacrifice. For to come near, is to perform these offices, as may be learnt from Lev. xix. 22. but especially from Lev. x. 3. And the very word cohen denotes it; for it signifies a minister next to the king.

And him whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him.] They shall discharge the office of priesthood, whom God himself hath chosen to it, and nobody else.

Ver. 6. This do.] I put you to this trial.

Take your censers.] Perform the office of priests, unto which you pretend a right.

Korah and all his company.] All the two hundred and fifty men, and whosoever else were in the faction of Korah; whom he orders, no doubt, by God's direction, to execute the office to which they aspired.

Ver. 7. Put fire therein, and put incense in them.] As the priests were wont to do.

Before the Lord to-morrow.] At the altar of the incense, as some conceive, before the most holy place. So Menochius. But this is contrary to ver. 18. where we read they stood in the door of the tabernacle, with their censers, fire, and incense. Nor would the sanctuary contain such a company; or, if it had been large enough, the people could not have seen either their offering or their punishment from the Lord for their sin. Therefore these words before the Lord signify with their faces towards the sanctuary, at the gate of which they stood; for what was done there is said to be before the Lord, (Exod. xxix. 42.)

And it shall be, that the man whom the Lord doth choose, he shall be holy.] This comprehends both the man and all his family: so the meaning is, the Lord would declare whether Aaron and his sons should execute the priesthood alone, or Korah and his company be admitted to it.

Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi.] It is the same phrase which we had before, ver. 3. rab-lachem: you are high enough already: let the station wherein you are suffice you, and aspire not after greater dignity. The following words justify this interpretation.

Ver. 8. And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi.] By this and by the foregoing verse it appears, not only that there were some of the Levites in this sedition, together with Korah at the head of them, but that they were the chief incendiaries (though others, as I said before, were drawn in to join with them), because Moses addresses himself only to them.

Ver. 9. Seemeth it a small thing unto you.] Do you take it to be no honour to you.

That the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel.] Made choice of you, above all other Israelites, to wait upon him in his family, as his domestic servants, (Numb. iii. 12. viii. 6. 14.)

To bring you near to himself.] Though not so near as the priests, yet nearer than all other men, being the sole attendants upon the priests, (chap. iii. 6. viii. 10, 11.)

To do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord.] See chap. iii. 7, 8. particularly the Kohathites were chosen to do the service of the tabernacle, about the most holy things, (chap. iv. 4. 19.)

And to stand before the congregation to minister unto them?] See chap. viii. 11. 19.

Ver. 10. And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren, the sons of Levi, with thee.] Or, though he hath brought thee (speaking unto Korah) thus near to him, and all the rest of the Levites thy brethren. (See chap. viii. 10. 11. 15. 19.)

And seek ye the priesthood also?] Will it not content you that you alone are chosen to minister unto the priests, (chap. iii. 6.) but you must be advanced to minister unto God in their office?

Ver. 11. For which cause both thou and all thy company are gathered together against the Lord.] By whose order Aaron and his sons were appointed to serve him in the office of priests; as was declared when the Levites were taken to minister unto them, (chap. iii. 3. iv. 15. 19, 20.) And therefore, to rise up against them, was to rise up against the Lord, and oppose his authority, who made them his priests.

And what is Aaron.] Or, and Aaron, what hath he done? Wherein is he faulty?

That ye murmur against him?] For taking upon him the office of priesthood; into which he did not intrude himself, but was chosen and appointed by God to do him that service; who would have been angry with him if he had refused it.

Ver. 12. And Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab.] To summon them to the place where Moses now was; which the Jews say was the court of judgment. This shews, that either these men (as I said, ver. 2.) did not openly appear with Korah and his company against Moses: (ver. 3.) or, if they did, they retired to their tents, before he rose up from his prayer, to give them an answer.

What became of On we are not informed: for he is neither mentioned here, nor in the following part of this narrative, concerning their sedition; nor any where else in the Holy Scripture.

Which said, We will not come up.] They bade the messenger, who summoned them to appear before Moses, to tell him plainly that they denied his authority. For that is the meaning of this language, He hath no authority to command us, who are none of his subjects; and therefore will not obey him.

Ver. 13. Is it a small thing with thee that thou hast brought us up out of a land flowing with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness?] Though they would not come to him, yet they returned him this message; Have we not suffered enough by being brought out of a rich and plentiful country, abounding with all good things, into a barren wilderness, where we are ready to starve? Nothing could be more insolent and ungrateful, than to describe Egypt in the very same language wherein God himself had often spoken of the land of promise; particularly when he sent Moses to tell them, he would bring them out of the affliction of Egypt, under which they groaned, (Exod. iii. 16, 17.)

Except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us?] Unless we allow thee to make what laws thou thinkest good, and impose what thou pleasest upon us? A most rude and insolent speech; signifying, that they had not shaken off the yoke of bondage, but only exchanged it; and instead of the rich and wealthy oppression of Pharaoh, were come under the poor and hungry tyranny of Moses. For so the next verse imports.

Ver. 14. Moreover, thou hast not brought us into a land that floweth with milk and honey, &c.] Or, certainly, this is not the good land into which thou didst promise to conduct us. It seems to be a sarcastical speech; upbraiding him, as if he had put a cheat upon them, and fed them only with good words, to which they would no longer trust.

Or given us inheritance of fields and vineyards.] But told us it shall be bestowed forty years hence, when we are all dead. This still shews they took him for a deluder of them with deceitful promises.

Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?] Some of them spake this in the name of the rest, who were now with Dathan and Abiram; and the meaning is, Dost thou think to blind us so, that none of us shall discern this imposture? or, shall we suffer thee to lead us about like blind men, whither thou pleasest; sometimes towards Canaan, and now back again towards the Red Sea and Egypt?

We will not come up.] A peremptory resolution, not to own his authority, which they denied at the first, (ver. 12.)

Ver. 15. And Moses was very wroth.] For such behaviour and language was so provoking, that it was no wonder it incensed the meekest man upon earth, (chap. xii. 3.) Yet the LXX. translate the words, as if he only took it very heavily, ἐβαρυθύμησε σφόδρα, it made him exceeding sad.

And said unto the Lord, Respect not their offering.] He calls the incense which they were about to offer by the name of mincha, which commonly signifies a meat-offering; but sometimes any inanimate thing that was consumed in honour of God, as incense was; and must so signify in this place, for they offered nothing else. And when Moses desires it may not be accepted, he means a great deal more, that God would give some sign of his dislike to it. Hence it seems plain to me, that Dathan and Abiram, as well as Korah, quarrelled at the confining the priesthood unto Aaron's family; for Moses calls this their offering: by the acceptance or rejection of which this controversy was to be decided.

I have not taken one ass from them.] This seems to be an appeal to God against their unjust charge, that he acted arbitrarily, and did with them what he listed, (ver. 13.) From which he was so far, that he declares before God he had not taken, i. e. received by way of gift or reward (so the LXX. and the Vulgar understand it), the smallest thing (for such a single ass was), much less extorted any thing from them.

Nor have I hurt any one of them.] None can say that I have done any kind of evil to them; but contrarily, all good offices. For, that he did not seek himself, appeared in this, that he had not advanced his own family to the priesthood, but left them in the number of the other Levites, upon the same level with Korah and his company.

Ver. 16. And Moses said unto Korah, Be thou and all thy company before the Lord, &c.] He repeats what he had said to him before, (ver. 6, 7.) only adding, that he would have Aaron also there, together with them. So it follows, Thou, and they, and Aaron to-morrow.

Before the Lord.] i. e. In the court of the tabernacle, see ver. 7. where, by an extraordinary commission from the Divine Majesty, this trial was to be made. And therefore Aaron himself did not now go into the sanctuary to offer incense (which was the proper and only place allowed by the law), but stood with them without: as in another great necessity he offered incense in the midst of the congregation, (ver. 46, 47.) Both which were done by a dispensation from him that made the law.

Ver. 17. Take every man his censer, and put incense in them, and bring ye before the Lord every man his censer.] Let every man of them stand before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle, to do the office of priests; to which they pretended as good a right as Aaron and his sons.

Two hundred and fifty censers.] This shews that the incense being offered by so great a number, (as it appears it was, ver. 35.) they did not offer it in the sanctuary; which would not contain so many persons.

Thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer.] This seems to signify, as if Korah was commanded to stand by Aaron, since he pretended to be his equal; which made the hand of God the more remarkable upon him, when he was struck with lightning, and no harm came to Aaron, who stood by him: but it may be doubted, what way Korah perished.

Ver. 18. And they took every man his censer.] That is, the two hundred and fifty men did as they were commanded; but Korah went first to muster up as many as he could get together against Moses, (ver. 19.) and then seems to have gone to his tent, (ver. 24.) Herein these men submitted to the way of decision which Moses propounded, though they had so boldly denied his authority. For they could not but think, that God, whom they owned to be among them, (ver. 3.) would approve of them, if they were in the right, and make good their allegation, that all the congregation were holy, by accepting their incense, as much as Aaron's: to whom they did not deny an equality with themselves; but only a superiority.

And put fire in them.] From the altar of burnt-offering, which stood in the court, at the door of which they were placed, (Lev. i. 5.) for Aaron durst not take it from any other place; his sons having lost their lives for offering with strange fire: the remembrance of which, it is likely, deterred these men from doing otherwise; who did not as yet put in the fire, but only took their censers, and put incense in them (which is all that is ordered in the preceding verse), and put fire in afterward.

And stood in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation with Moses and Aaron.] As if they were nothing inferior to them.

Ver. 19. And Korah gathered all the congregation against them.] The LXX. translate it, Korah gathered all his congregation, i. e. all the men of his faction. But the Hebrew words import that he gathered all the congregation of Israel, at least all the great men; who are sometimes called by the name of all the congregation, (chap. xiv. 1.) whom he got together, that they might be witnesses, at least, of the issue of this trial; though their coming together with Korah and his company, rather than with Moses and Aaron, is too plain an indication that they were inclined, if not to throw off, yet to doubt of their authority.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where they themselves stood, (ver. 18.) And so did Moses and Aaron; but the Israelites that Korah had gathered together stood on his side, as appears from the foregoing words, and from ver. 24.

And the glory of the Lord.] The Schechinah, or Divine Majesty, came forth out of the most holy place, where it usually resided.

Appeared unto all the congregation.] Openly shewed itself in the sight of all the people; and, it is likely, in such an amazing manner, as it had done before, (chap. xiv. 10.) But where it appeared, we are not told: I suppose in the cloud, which was just over the ark of the testimony, (chap. ix. 15.) not in the door of the tabernacle, for there Korah and his company stood. (See Exod. xvi. 10.) And the end of the Lord's appearing was to give sentence in this case; and to declare, by a visible token, whom he accepted as his priests. Thus the glory of the Lord appeared the first time that Aaron and his sons offered sacrifice, (Lev. ix. 6. 23.)

Ver. 20. And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying.] A little before they put fire in their censers.

Ver. 21. Separate yourselves from this congregation.] viz. From Korah and his company, and the people they brought along with them; who seemed to favour them, (ver. 19.)

That I may consume them in a moment.] As he did Korah and his companions.

Ver. 22. And they fell on their faces, and said.] To pray to God, as they had done before, (ver. 4.)

O God.] The most mighty.

The God of the spirits of all flesh.] Who hast created the souls of all mankind, (so flesh often signifies all men, Gen. vi. 13.) and therefore searchest into their most secret thoughts and inclinations. So these words signify, chap. xxvii. 16.

Shall one man sin.] Korah, who was the chief incendiary and contriver in this sedition.

And wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?] Many of which he thought might, through weakness, be seduced into this faction, having no malice at all in their hearts: which God knew perfectly; and therefore he begs of him that he would make a distinction between such as these, and the men that misled them.

Ver. 23. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] He bade him rise up, having granted his petition.

Ver. 24. Speak unto the congregation.] Whom Korah had gathered together, and brought along with him to the door of the tabernacle, (ver. 19.)

Get ye up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.] Which, it seems, was not far off; or wheresoever it was, there a great number of people was gathered together to see what would be the conclusion of this contest. The word tabernacle is in the singular number; but includes all the tents belonging to these men, as appears from ver. 26. Or, perhaps, they had set up one great tabernacle, (for the word here is mischcan, which may be thought to signify more than ohel, a tent, ver. 26.) unto which abundance of people resorted, as the place that Korah and the rest had appointed for the general rendezvous (as we now speak) of all their party. For here Dathan and Abiram, it is evident, (ver. 27.) were with him; but there is no mention at all of On; which makes it probable he had forsaken them, as Moses wished all the people to do; on which condition God promised to pardon them.

Ver. 25. And Moses rose up, and went unto Dathan and Abiram.] To try, I suppose, if he could reduce them to their obedience, and prevent their ruin. He seems to have had no hopes of Korah, but looked upon him as incorrigible.

And the elders of Israel followed him.] Either the seventy elders, who were lately chosen out of the rest, (chap. xi. 16.) or the whole body of those who were called by that name, and were men of authority, attended upon him, to make this action more solemn, and to let Dathan and Abiram see how much Moses was reverenced by better men than themselves, who refused to come to him, (ver. 12. 14.)

Ver. 26. And spake unto the congregation, saying.] It seems Dathan and Abiram refused to hear him, as they did to come to him: for here is no mention of any thing he spake to them; but only to the congregation, who were gathered about their tents.

Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men.] I suppose now they were gone to their own tents, where their families were; from which he beseeches the people to remove with all speed. And he doth not mean merely that they should remove their persons from them, but their tents, and their goods, and cattle.

And touch nothing of theirs.] Because all belonging unto them was under an anathema which God had passed upon them; that is, was devoted to destruction, and therefore not to be touched, (Deut. xiii. 17.)

Lest ye be consumed in all their sins.] Destroyed with them; who had sinned so grievously, as to fall under the curse beforementioned.

Ver. 27. So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.] Where the greatest number of people were gathered together, as I observed, ver. 24. For here is the same word mischcan again, in the singular number, denoting some spacious habitation, where perhaps they held their consultations, and unto which there was the greatest resort.

On every side.] From which we may conclude, that the people had come from all quarters of the camp to these rebels; either to join with them, or out of curiosity to see how things would go.

And Dathan and Abiram.] With Korah also, it may be thought, because he is mentioned in the beginning of the verse. Yet this conclusion cannot be drawn from thence, for it is not said he was now there; but that it was the tabernacle of Koran, Dathan, and Abiram; where they used, I suppose, to meet.

Came out.] From the tabernacle beforementioned.

And stood in the door of their tents.] Of their own tents, where they commonly dwelt.

And their wives, and their sons, and their children.] With their whole families. This was the highest degree of audacious and hardened infidelity; whereby they declared that they feared not what Moses (who had given the greatest proof he was a man of God) could do unto them.

Ver. 28. And Moses said.] Unto all the people of Israel; or to the elders, and as many as could hear him.

Hereby you shall know.] I will now give you an evident demonstration.

That the Lord hath sent me to do all these works.] That I have been commissioned by God to do all the things with which those men find fault; particularly to take upon me the government of them, and to put Aaron and his family into the priesthood, and make the Levites only their ministers, &c. (See ver. 2, 3. 13, 14.)

For I have not done them of my own mind.] In the Hebrew the words are, and that not out of my heart. It was none of my own device or contrivance: I did it not out of an ambitious desire to be great myself, nor out of private affection to my brother.

Ver. 29. If these men die the common death of all men.] In the Hebrew it is, as die all mankind: that is, a natural death, as we now speak.

Or if they be visited after the visitation of all men.] i. e. Such judgments of God come upon them, as are usual and common in the world; viz. a pestilence, the sword, or famine.

The Lord hath not sent me.] Then look upon me as an impostor.

Ver. 30. But if the Lord make a new thing.] In the Hebrew the words are, if the Lord create a creature; i. e. do something that was never seen nor heard of in the world before. The Jews, in several of their books (particularly in Pirke Avoth), say, there are ten things which God created after the world was perfected: and they mention the mouth of the earth for one of them; that is, the gaping of the ground, to swallow up these wicked people: which is said to be created, as Aben Ezra well observes, because by this miracle God altered the course of nature, and did a thing extraordinary.

And the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up with all that appertain unto them.] i. e. On a sudden; when there is no earthquake, but all is calm and still; and it swallow up none but them alone.

And they go down quick into the pit.] Be buried alive, when they are in perfect health. By this place it is apparent, that the Hebrew word sheol doth often signify the grave; which Bellarmine and others most earnestly contend never signifies so, but hell; which, from hence, he asserts to be in the centre of the earth, (lib. iv. de Christo, cap. 10.) not observing, that if it signify hell in this verse, and ver. 33. then the houses of these men, and their household-stuff, and all that appertained to them, went down thither, which is very absurd. It is hard also to think that all their little children went down into hell for their fathers' sin, though they did into the grave.

Then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord.] You shall be sufficiently convinced that they have unjustly accused me, and brought this destruction upon themselves.

Ver. 31. And it came to pass, that as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them.] He had no sooner done speaking, but immediately what he said was verified, which made it the more remarkable.

Ver. 32. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up.] viz. Dathan and Abiram beforementioned, (ver. 27.) who stood in the door of their tents outfacing Moses.

And their houses.] i. e. All their family; or, as Moses himself hath explained it, (Deut. xi. 6.) Their households, and their tents, and all the substance that was in their possession.

And all the men that appertained unto Korah.] We are not told what became of Korah himself: for it is not said he was swallowed up, but all that appertained to him; i. e. all that were at that time in his tent: his whole family, except his sons, who escaped, (chap. xxvi. 11.) taking warning, I suppose, from what Moses said: (ver. 26.) which hath made some think that Korah was at the head of his two hundred and fifty men, who were the great abetters of his faction: who, if he had forsaken them at this trial that was made who were in the right, we may well think would have withdrawn themselves also, and not have stood to it without their chieftain, as we find they did, (ver. 35.) Yet he is not mentioned there as perishing with them by fire from the Lord: and Moses seems to say, (chap. xxvi. 10.) that Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up together with Korah; who had as much reason, or more perhaps, to think it necessary to be with that other company which he had gathered against Moses, (ver. 19.) and to encourage them to persist in their resolution, than to be with the two hundred and fifty men, who were men of such authority, (ver. 2.) that they may be thought to have needed none to support them. It may be added also, that the word appertaineth is not here in the Hebrew (which makes these words sound as if the meaning were only those that were of Korah's family), but simply all the men that were to Korah; i. e. were gathered to him, and were at that time with him: which seems to be an indication that they and he were swallowed up together. How many there were that stayed with him there is not certain; but the generality left him, ver. 27. where it is expressly said, "they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram," as Moses had commanded, (ver. 24.) Which may be taken for a further indication, that he was swallowed up in the tabernacle where he was, or in his own tent after he came out of that tabernacle. But those places, I observed before, may be otherwise understood: that place also, which is the main foundation of this opinion, (chap. xxvi. 10.) may likewise receive another interpretation, as I shall shew when I come thither. And they that are of the other opinion, think his tabernacle, and his family, and all his household-stuff, might be swallowed up, though he himself was not with them, but was burnt by fire with the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense; for Moses bade him take his censer as well as them, (ver. 17.) Which, since they did, and put fire and incense therein, why should it be thought he did not do the same? It seems to me highly probable that he did, otherwise he would have seemed to distrust his cause: but it must be confessed that it is obscure which way he perished, and therefore it is not fit to contend about it.

And all their goods.] All their household-stuff and cattle, and whatsoever was in or about their tents.

Ver. 33. They, and all that appertained to them.] See Deut. xi. 6.

Went down alive into the pit.] As Moses had foretold, (ver. 30.)

And the earth closed upon them.] This made it the more wonderful, that the earth, having swallowed them all up, had no cleft remaining in it, but closed up again and was as firm as before.

And they perished from among the congregation.] Were never more seen.

Ver. 34. And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them.] Though they were at a distance from their tents, (whence they had removed on all sides, ver. 27.) yet they heard them shriek so loudly, as they sunk down into the ground, that it put them into a great fright, and made them fly still further off.

For they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also.] Some of them were conscious to themselves that they had favoured this wicked faction; and all of them knew how highly they had lately offended God, by their unbelief and murmuring, (chap. xiv.) which might make them justly fear the same fate with their brethren.

Ver. 35. And there came out a fire from the Lord.] From the glory of the Lord, which appeared unto all the congregation, (ver. 19.) as ready to decide the controversy: this fell out either at the same time the earth swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, or immediately after it.

And consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense.] Which was a plain declaration that they usurped the office of priests; and, therefore, were thus punished by God himself for their presumption. It is not certain, whether they were devoured by the fire, or only struck dead, as men are sometimes on a sudden by lightning; and perhaps scorched, as they likewise sometimes are. The latter seems most probable from what follows, (ver. 37.) and from the like punishment by fire from the Lord, which is said to devour Nadab and Abihu, and yet their bodies remained entire, (Levit. x. 2. 4.) This was the more astonishing, because Moses and Aaron, who stood with them at the door of the tabernacle, (ver. 18.) had no hurt.

Ver. 36. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Immediately after the death of those men.

Ver. 37. Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest.] Who it is likely stood by them, as next successor to Aaron, in the office which was disputed; and therefore, perhaps, employed in what follows rather than Aaron, that his succession might be confirmed. Though others will have it, that it was below the dignity of Aaron to perform such a mean office: and besides, he might have been in danger to be polluted by the dead bodies of the men that were burnt.

That he take the censers out of the burning.] Out of the place where the men were burnt, as some understand it: or (which differs not much) from among the dead bodies, which were burnt: burning being put for bodies burnt, as captivity, (chap. xxi. 1.) for those that were carried captive, or made prisoners, as we there translate it. But there is no need of either of these additions; burning signifying the fire which burnt in them, which he orders Eleazar to throw out, that the censers might be brought away.

And scatter thou the fire yonder.] The men were burnt as soon as ever they put fire to the incense in their censers, (ver. 18.) which, flaming at the door of the tabernacle where they stood (near the altar from whence they took the fire), God commanded to be thrown away without the camp; into that place, I suppose, where they were wont to throw the ashes; (Lev. vi. 11.) or rather, into some unclean place, where they threw the dust scraped from the walls of leprous houses, (Lev. xiv. 41.) For it was to shew that God abhorred their offering.

For they are hallowed.] Or had fire from the altar put into them; which some think sanctified them. But the plain reason is given in the next verse, because they offered them before the Lord: i. e. they had been employed to a holy use, and that by God's command, (ver. 6. 17.) and therefore God would not have them hereafter serve for any other.

Ver. 38. The censers of these sinners against their own souls.] Who have brought destruction upon themselves, by their presumption.

Let them make of them.] Either Aaron or Eleazar was to cause them to be beaten into such plates as here follow.

Broad plates for a covering of the altar.] Of burnt-offering, which was covered with brass; (Exod. xxvii. 12.) but these plates were to be laid upon that covering which it had already, for the end mentioned in the conclusion of this verse. And hereby also the proper covering of the altar lasted the longer.

For they offered them before the Lord.] Presented them before the Lord, when they offered incense in them, (ver. 35.)

Therefore they are hallowed.] Or holy; that is, I will have them separated, for this reason, to my use alone, and no other. It is a thing worthy to be taken special notice of, that the impiety of the men that offered incense, did not discharge their censers of the discriminative respect (as our famous Mr. Mede speaks) due unto things sacred; as these in some sort were, by being presented to the Lord, which made it unlawful to employ them to common uses. For as the Lord himself is that singular, incommunicable, and absolutely Holy One, and his service and worship therefore incommunicable to any other, so should that also which is consecrated to his service, be in some proportion incommunicably used, and not promiscuously and commonly, as other things are. (See Book i. Discourse 2. p. 18.)

And they shall be a sign unto the children of Israel.] That God accepts no sacrifice which is not presented by the hands of the sons of Aaron. This the Levites were to remember, who attended upon the priest, when they saw these plates laid upon the altar of burnt-offering every day.

Ver. 39. And Eleazar the priest took the brazen censers, &c.] By this it appears these censers were made of the same metal (though it was not said before) that Aaron's censer was of, and wherewith the altar was overlaid. He took them up out of the burning, no doubt, immediately upon the foregoing commands; and as soon as the mutiny was quite quelled, they were employed as Moses had directed.

Ver. 40. To be a memorial unto the children of Israel.] This explains what is meant by a sign, (ver. 38.) viz. to put them in mind; or rather, to keep in their memory.

That no stranger.] Though he were an Israelite, nay a Levite, if he were not (as it here follows) of the seed of Aaron, he was reputed a stranger to this office.

Come near to offer incense before the Lord.] Presume to execute the office of a priest in the sanctuary.

That he be not as Korah, and his company.] Destroyed in a dreadful manner. By this it appears that Korah perished as well as the two hundred and fifty men; and it is likely, as they did, by fire from the Lord.

As the Lord said unto him.] i. e. To Eleazar.

By the hand of Moses.] See ver. 36, 37.

Ver. 41. But on the morrow.] An astonishing instance of the incurable hardness and insensibility of some men's hearts; which were not in the least altered by God's terrible judgments and singular mercies; but instantly forgot both.

All the congregation of the children of Israel.] Not merely the rulers of the people (as this phrase sometimes signifies), but all the people in general, (ver. 47.) who were incited, it is probable, by that lewd route which Korah had gathered together against Moses and Aaron, (ver. 19.) some of which were swallowed up, but most of them remained still alive to do more mischief.

Murmured against Moses and against Aaron.] In such a mutinous and threatening manner, as demonstrated the contagious nature of a seditious humour, beyond all example: for, from a discontented party, who grumbled that they were not preferred suitably to the opinion they had of themselves, it spread itself into the whole body of the people, and so infected them as to kindle a new flame, as soon as the former had been extinguished, by such a terrible vengeance, as one would have expected should not have left the smallest spark of this mutinous humour in them.

Saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord.] So they impudently call those men, whom God himself had declared, by a visible token, to be presumptuous sinners against their own souls. Some imagine they quarrelled with Moses and Aaron, because they had not prevailed with God to pardon them; which they could as well have done as procured this judgment upon them. But the displeasure which God here expresses against this new murmuring, shews this not to be a true excuse for them.

Ver. 42. And it came to pass, when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron.] Their murmuring presently proceeded to an insurrection.

That they looked towards the tabernacle of the congregation.] i. e. Moses and Aaron implored help from God, which is implied in their looking towards his dwelling-place.

And, behold, the cloud covered it.] One would think by this that it had for some time withdrawn itself from the tabernacle, when the dead bodies of Korah's company lay at the door of it.

And the glory of the Lord appeared.] To comfort them in this distress; and to shew he was ready to support and vindicate them.

Ver. 43. And Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation.] Perhaps for safety and security; or, to hear what directions God would give them.

Ver. 44. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Out of the tabernacle; before which he stood, waiting for the Lord's orders.

Ver. 45. Get ye up from among this congregation.] He speaks to Aaron and Eleazar, I suppose, as well as unto Moses.

That I may consume them as in a moment.] As he was inclined to do before, (ver. 21.) and now had a greater reason.

And they fell on their faces.] To beseech God not to punish the people as they deserved, (ver. 22.)

Ver. 46. And Moses said unto Aaron.] By God's direction.

Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar.] Near to which they now were, (ver. 43.)

And put on incense.] Upon the fire; but not till he came into the midst of the congregation, (ver. 47.)

And go quickly unto the congregation.] With the incense, which regularly was to be offered only at the golden altar within the sanctuary; but now, in this extraordinary case, by God's special order, Aaron is sent with it into the camp, that they might all be witnesses of his power with God, and that, by his authority, he was settled in the priesthood.

And make an atonement for them.] Which was usually performed by the blood of a sacrifice: but there was not time for that; and therefore now it was made by the incense, wherewith their daily sacrifices, morning and evening, were concluded; and was accompanied by the prayers of the people, while the priest, as he offered it, made intercession for them, (Psalm cxli. 2.) Thus, as St. Jerome glosses, "Currens ira Dei, sacerdotis voce prohibebatur;" the Divine anger, coming with full speed upon them, was stopped by the voice of the priest: which was a notable type of the power of our great high-priest and intercessor with God, the Lord Jesus.

For there is wrath gone out from the Lord.] Who would not wholly grant their prayer for a pardon, (ver. 45.) but inflicted some punishment upon them.

The plague is begun.] A pestilence, in all probability, of which several immediately died.

Ver. 47. And Aaron took as Moses commanded.] A censer, and fire from the altar, with incense ready to be put upon it, (ver. 46.)

And ran.] According to the command of Moses, (ver. 46.) who bade him go quickly.

Into the midst of the congregation.] Perhaps into the midst of each of the four camps, of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan (mentioned in the second chapter), it being broke out every where.

And, behold, the plague was begun among the people.] He saw people die on all sides of him.

And he put on incense.] Whereupon he put incense upon the fire, which he brought along with him from the altar, (ver. 46.)

And made an atonement for the people.] Interceded with God for them, and obtained what he desired.

Ver. 48. And he stood between the dead and the living.] This seems to intimate, that the plague began in the skirts of their camps, and was proceeding into the heart of them, where Aaron stood, as a mediator for those who were not yet smitten.

And the plague was stayed.] A stop was put to its progress; which was a further evidence of Aaron's right to the priesthood, by God's appointment; who not only preserved him when he offered incense together with Korah's company, (ver. 17.) but now makes him an instrument of preserving others from destruction.

Ver. 49. Now they that died in the plague were fourteen thousand and seven hundred.] Who, it is likely, were of the forwardest men to associate themselves with Korah, (ver. 19.)

Besides them that died about the matter of Korah.] Whose just number is not known; for besides the two hundred and fifty men, (mentioned ver. 25.) the whole families of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were swallowed up.

Ver. 50. And Aaron returned unto Moses unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] To carry back his censer.

And the plague was stayed.] Or rather, for the plague was stayed; and so, having done his business, he returned to the tabernacle.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Not long after the plague was stayed. For though there had been enough done to satisfy the people that Aaron was advanced to the priesthood by God's appointment, and not by Moses's affection to his kindred; yet their minds had been so poisoned by Korah and his complices, with the contrary opinion, that it was necessary to do still more to root it out. Which was the occasion of what follows.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Order them to bring what I require thee to take of them.

And take of every one of them.] i. e. Of every tribe.

A rod.] Or a staff, as the Hebrew word matteh is often translated: which some take for an ordinary walking-staff, or for the staff which was the badge of their authority, as princes of the several tribes; neither of which seems to me to be true. For what reason have we to think that every man's staff which he commonly used was made of the wood of an almond tree? as these were, one may probably conclude from the eighth verse. And therefore, I take it, they were now all cut off from some tree of that kind, and it is likely from one and the same tree, that none might fancy there was any difference between them. For the miracle was great enough (which here follows), without supposing, as some do, that these rods were all of some other common wood; and yet Aaron's rod produced almonds, which were not the proper fruit of it: though it must be confessed, that if they were not of the wood of an almond tree, the wonder was greater that his rod should bring forth almonds; and struck their minds more strongly.

According to the house of their fathers.] In the Hebrew it is father, in the singular number; denoting the principal person or patriarch (as we call them), of whose house or family he was to take one rod.

Of all their princes, according to the house of their fathers.] This explains the meaning more fully, that the prince of every tribe, who was the head of the house of their fathers, should bring these rods. Their names we have in the first chapter of this book, (ver. 5, 6. chap. vii. 2. 12, &c.)

Twelve rods.] Besides Aaron's; for so many tribes there were besides that of Levi. And too great a number of every tribe, in all likelihood, had joined with Korah in their discontented murmurings, at the confinement of the priesthood unto Aaron's family alone; to which they all fancied they had as much right as he. Which is the reason of taking a rod from every tribe; that they might all be convinced that none of them, but he and his family alone, were owned by God for his priests: (see chap. xvi. 3.)

Write thou every man's name upon his rod.] Either by an incision into the very wood; or with such ink as they wrote withal in those days, (v. 22.) This he did in the presence of the princes; that they might not afterward suspect any fraud, when they came to take their rods again; but be satisfied they were the very same which they saw noted with their names.

Ver. 3. And thou shalt write Aaron's name upon the rod of Levi.] Because God had made him the prince of that tribe, by giving him the high-priesthood. And he would have them see, that as no other person in any of the twelve tribes, so no other Levite ought to pretend unto that high office, which he had invested him withal, and him alone.

For one rod shall be for the head of the house of their fathers.] One rod was sufficient, because the head of the tribe comprehended the whole tribe, who were all excluded from the priesthood, by the exclusion of him who represented them.

Ver. 4. And thou shalt lay them up in the tabernacle.] In the most holy place.

Before the testimony.] i. e. Before the ark; called in many places the ark of the testimony, (Exod. xl. 3.) because therein Moses put the testimony (or, two tables of stone), and the mercy-seat above it, ver. 20, 21. where the Divine Glory resided. Therefore, to lay the rods before the testimony, was to lay them before the Divine Majesty; who intended by them finally to determine the present controversy.

Where I will meet with you.] There he promised to meet with Moses, Exod. xxv. 22. by whom he communicated his mind unto the people. For he neither met with them, nor with Aaron, there, any other way, but by Moses. And therefore the Vulgar Latin here translates it, minding the sense rather than the words, Where I will speak to them. And so the LXX. By which I will be made known to thee there. And indeed meeting with them here, is nothing but declaring, or making known his mind to them all, by what was done there upon Aaron's rod. So it follows in the next verse. And for this reason the tabernacle of the Lord is called ohel moed, the tabernacle of meeting; not of men's meeting there (as is commonly supposed, by our translating it the tabernacle of the congregation), but of God's meeting there with men: for so the Lord himself gives the reason of the name, both here and in Exod. xxix. 42. xxx. 36. where I have noted the same out of Mr. Mede.

Ver. 5. And it shall come to pass, that the man's rod whom I shall choose shall blossom.] The rods being laid before me, I will tell you whom I have chosen to minister to me in the priesthood, by making the rod upon which his name is written to blossom, when all the rest remain as they were before, without any alteration. This was a kind of new choice (as the words import), whereby God confirmed the choice he had formerly made of Aaron to be high-priest.

And I will make to cease from me the murmurings of the children of Israel, whereby they murmur against you.] And hereby stop all their mouths from murmuring any more about this matter; unless they will oppose me directly, who declare beforehand how I intend to give judgment in this case, and put an end to this dispute.

Ver. 6. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel.] Told them what God had said, that they might be all consenting to this way of decision.

And every one of their princes gave him a rod a-piece.] For they could not refuse such a fair proposal.

For each prince one, according to their fathers' houses, even twelve rods.] Observing herein the commands of Moses; who wrote, no doubt, every man's name upon his rod, as he was also commanded, ver. 2.

And the rod of Aaron was among their rods.] Not one of the twelve, as the Jews fancy; but besides the twelve rods for the twelve tribes (as was directed, ver. 2. and obeyed by them, as the foregoing words tell us), his rod was put among them with his name upon it, as their names were upon their rods. And therefore the Vulgar translates it, having regard to the sense only, there were twelve rods besides the rod of Aaron: which the LXX. intended in their translation, Καὶ ἡ ῥάβδος Ἀαρὼν ἀναμέσον τῶν ῥάβδων αὐτῶν; and the rod of Aaron in the midst of their rods. And if it were cut from the very same tree with theirs, the miracle became the more remarkable.

Ver. 7. And Moses laid up the rods before the Lord.] Who was by them to declare his choice, (ver. 5.)

In the tabernacle of witness.] In that part of the tabernacle where the ark was, which had in it the witness or testimony which God gave Moses, (Exod. xxv. 21.) who alone could go into that place.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass, that on the morrow.] It is likely God told him he would forthwith shew whom he had chosen.

Moses went into the tabernacle of witness.] The most holy place, where the rods were laid up by God's order.

And behold, the rod of Aaron.] Which had his name written on it.

For the house of Levi.] Or, to the house of Levi, i. e. whom God had made head of the Levites.

Was budded, and brought forth buds, and blossomed blossoms, and yielded almonds.] In some places of the rod, I suppose, there was an appearance of buds coming forth; in others, the buds were fully thrust out; and in others, they were opened and shot forth into blossoms; and those blossoms, in other parts, knotted and grown into almonds. Μέγιστον καὶ τοῖς ἀπίστοις θαῦμα, &c. as Gregory Nyssen speaks in the Life of Moses, (p. 185.) The greatest miracle even in the judgment of unbelievers; who now acknowledged that which before they opposed, (ver. 12, 13.) For, that in one night, a dry stick (as some suppose them all to have been) should produce buds, and flowers, and fruit, when all the rest, which perhaps were cut from the same tree, were as dry as they were before, could not but be very amazing; and, unless they would shut their eyes, make them see the distinction which the Lord made between Aaron, whose name that rod bore, and all the rest of the children of Israel, whom the other rods represented.

The heathen did not think such things incredible, as Huetius hath shewn in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, (lib. i. cap. 12. n. 24.)

Ver. 9. And Moses brought out all the rods from before the Lord unto all the children of Israel.] Before whom they were exposed to open view, that they might see the difference God had made.

And they looked, and took every man his rod.] Viewed them, and, taking them into their hands, examined them; and found they were the very same rods which they had delivered unto Moses with their names on them, without any alteration.

Ver. 10. And the Lord said unto Moses, Bring Aaron's rod again.] Which either Moses held in his hand, or delivered it to Aaron (as he did the rest to the several princes of the tribes), who shewed it to the children of Israel, with the buds, blossoms, and almonds, upon it: after which God commanded it to be returned unto him.

Before the testimony.] To be laid up in the place where it was before it was thus changed, (ver. 4. 7.)

To be kept for a token against the rebels.] That it might be produced as a sufficient conviction of their impiety, if any presumed hereafter to rebel against Aaron's authority: or rather, that it might prevent all insurrections against it for the future. For it remained, we find, in the most holy place for some time; as appears both from the apostle, (Heb. ix. 4.) and from the reason of its being put here, that it might be preserved as a sign or proof of Aaron's authority, and suppress all opposition to it. But how long it continued we cannot tell, (for it is not mentioned when the ark was brought into the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 9.) nor is it certain whether it continued in that verdure wherein it now appeared, with the buds, blossoms, and fruit, though it is highly probable it did; because it was to be a testimony that the honour of the priesthood should continue to Aaron's family alone, through all generations.

There are those who take this rod which blossomed, and was laid up in the most holy place, to have been the rod of Moses, wherewith he wrought so many miracles in Egypt and at the Red Sea: concerning which the Jews tell very many incredible things; as, that it came from a branch of the tree of life, which an angel gave to Seth, who planted it in the wilderness, where Moses found it grown to a tree, and cut this rod from it. For when they came to Marah, and could not drink the waters, because they were bitter, God shewed them this tree, that with it he might make them sweet. Upon which tree he afterward placed the brazen serpent, by looking on which the people were healed, &c. Thus the cabalists generally tell this tale; but some of them much otherwise; who say it was given to Adam, and by him to Enoch, and so on till it came to Joseph, in whose house the Egyptians found it when he died, and brought it to Pharaoh; from whom Jethro stole it, &c. with a great deal of such-like stuff: which Abarbinel saith is to be understood mystically. But all the ground they have for this fancy, of the rod here laid up being Moses's rod, is from chap. xx. 8, 9. where it is said, that Moses took the rod from before the Lord, wherewith he brought water out of the rock; and this rod is said (ver. 11.) to be Moses's rod. Dr. Owen, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, follows this conceit, and endeavours to find many mysteries in it. But it is evidently false: for as there is not the least intimation here that it was the rod of Moses, but, quite contrary, it is called the rod of Aaron, ver. 6. so it had not been a sufficient argument to convince the infidelity of the Israelites, if Aaron's rod had not been of the same kind with all the rest. For they might have ascribed what came to pass to the singular quality or virtue of that rod, especially if it were Moses's rod (wherewith wonders used to be wrought), and not to a special hand of God appearing to establish the authority of Aaron. And besides, a rod full of blossoms and fruit had been very unfit to be used to smite the rock withal; for which purpose that rod (which seems to have been his pastoral staff) wherewith he smote the rock in Horeb was most proper, (Exod. xvii. 5, 6.)

And thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from me.] i. e. Silence all their cavils against Aaron and his family; which the Lord here declares he would no longer bear, if they continued in them after this demonstration of his will and pleasure. For here were a great many miraculous things concurred together to convince them, that to oppose Aaron was to oppose God himself. The Jews reckon up eight. First, that Aaron's rod should bring forth buds, blossoms, and fruit, all in one night, when the other rods, which were of the same nature, brought forth nothing. And then, secondly, that the buds brought forth leaves; for so they interpret those words, (ver. 8.) the rod of Aaron was budded, i. e. brought forth leaves; for the next words speak of its budding, which followed after. And thirdly, that it thrust out leaves before the blossoms, which is contrary to the nature of the almond tree. And next, that it put forth blossoms all the rod over; as they interpret those words; bloomed blossoms. And then, that a dry stick (as they understand it) should produce fruit, and this fruit almonds, which such trees (they think), as that rod was taken from, did not bear. And further, that it produced ripe almonds, as the Hebrew word schekedim imports. And lastly, that Moses shewed the people all these at one view, the leaves, buds, blossoms, and fruit in perfection. By which multiplicity of miracles the dignity of Aaron was so demonstrated, that we do not find they at any time hereafter adventured to rise up against him. For, besides all those wonders now mentioned, it may be, that it was not the season of the year for almonds, nor so much as for the budding of that tree; which made it the more astonishing. But the greatest thing of all was, the continuing of this miracle to future ages; which might well make them afraid to open their mouths again in murmurings against Aaron.

That they die not.] Be not consumed in a moment, as God had more than once formerly threatened, (chap. xvi. 21. 45.) and now declared, if they did not mend their manners, and cease their murmurings about this matter, he would instantly execute.

Ver. 11. And Moses did so: as the Lord commanded, so did he.] Both brought the rod again to him, and laid it up before him; and told the children of Israel the reason of it, which occasioned what follows.

Ver. 12. And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, &c.] Moses having told them that he laid up the rod for this end, to be a witness against them, that (if they murmured any more) they deserved to be all cut off, as they should certainly be, it moved them to make this doleful complaint, wherein they seem to be convinced of their guilt, and to bewail their miserable state. For the sense of these two verses is, Some of us died before, and now lately more have perished, and we are all in the same danger; surely we shall never have done dying, till we be all consumed.

Behold, we die.] This seems to relate to those judgments which had passed upon them heretofore.

We perish.] And this to what had very lately happened to Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, with their company, and to those that murmured the next day after, (chap. xvi. 49.)

We all perish.] This will be the fate of the whole congregation.

Ver. 13. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the Lord.] Who was not a priest, and yet approached nearer than God allowed.

Shall die.] So Moses had threatened; and they now believed him, and were afraid withal they should some time or other incur God's displeasure by their rashness.

Shall we be consumed with dying?] They seem to be afraid, lest, for their late murmurings and insurrection, after such a heavy punishment for that sin, (chap. xvi. 41, 42.) God should further plague them, as by this new sign he convinced them they justly deserved; and therefore beg of Moses to entreat God to spare them, and not to go on utterly to destroy them.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Aaron.] By the hand of Moses, it is most likely, unto whom God was wont to communicate all that he would have delivered, either to Aaron or to the people, (chap. xvii. 4.) And having done more miracles than one to establish Aaron in the priesthood, he now lets him know that the honour he had done him was an office of great weight and burden, wherein he was to behave himself with great care and circumspection: and withal, he again declares what the duty of the Levites was, together with the priests, from ver. 1. unto ver. 8. And from thence he proceeds to tell them what maintenance he had settled upon both, for their encouragement in doing their duty; as I shall observe in the proper places.

Thou, and thy sons, and thy father's house with thee.] You and the Levites (whom he calls his father's house), who had the charge of the sanctuary.

Shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary.] If the sanctuary were profaned, through the negligence of the Levites, who were to keep strangers, and people in their uncleanness, from entering into it; and if the priests were remiss, and did not take care to see the Levites do their duty, the punishment of such profanation, he tells them, should fall upon them.

And thou and thy sons with thee.] i. e. Aaron and the priests alone.

Shall bear the iniquity of the priesthood.] Suffer the punishment of it; if they permitted any person who was not of the line of Aaron to offer incense, or perform any part of the priest's office; or if they themselves should minister in their uncleanness, or having any blemish, or did any thing contrary to the rules of their office.

This was some comfort to the people, who were afraid they should die for every error committed in their approaches to the sanctuary, (chap. xvii. 12, 13.) for which he assures them he would punish the priests and the Levites, and not them. And it also served to remove the people's envy to the priest, whose dignity they saw accompanied with such great danger.

Ver. 2. And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father.] This also was a comfort to the Levites, and designed to make them more contented than they had been, in their inferior offices, that the priests were to look upon them as their brethren.

Bring thou with thee.] Into the tabernacle.

That they may be joined with thee.] As assistants to thee there.

And minister unto thee.] In such things as I have mentioned: (see upon chap. iii. 6.)

But thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness.] The words shall minister not being in the Hebrew, some think he still speaks of the Levites, and translate the words thus, both to thee, and to thy sons with thee (they shall minister, as was said before) before the tabernacle of witness. But they that are of this opinion do not consider what is meant by the tabernacle of witness, which signifies the most holy place, (see chap. ix. 15. and x. 11.) before which the Levites did not minister; but before the tabernacle of the congregation, as Moses expressly speaks, chap. iii. 7. (see there,) where they attended upon the priests in the court of the sanctuary, in which the priests only could minister; as Aaron alone did, upon one certain day only, in the most holy place.

Ver. 3. And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle.] Of the outward part of it; (see chap. iii. 7, 8.) and carry the vessels belonging to the inward part, viz. the sanctuary, (chap. iv. 15.)

Only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary.] They were not to touch them when they carried them, (chap. iv. 15.) nor to see when they were covered by the priests, (chap. iv. 19, 20.)

And the altar.] I take this to be meant not only of the altar of incense, but also of the burnt-offering; unto which they were not to approach, nor touch it, while they attended upon the priests, who only could minister there. This is justified from Exod. xxix. 37. where this altar is said to be most holy, and whosoever touched it is required to be holy.

That neither they nor you also die.] They for presuming to go beyond the bounds of their office, and the priest for permitting them.

Ver. 4. And they shall be joined unto thee.] He would have the priests look upon the Levites as part of that sacred body of men that waited upon God in the tabernacle, though in an inferior office. And, indeed, the very name of Levi imported as much: and denoted them to be adjuncts to some other persons. Accordingly we find, in aftertimes, that as the Levites were a guard on the outside of the temple, so the priests watched within it.

And keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, for all the service of the tabernacle.] See chap. iii. 7, 8. The heaviest part of their service, which is called their burden, is mentioned particularly chap. iv. 3, 4. and the rest of that chapter.

A stranger shall not come nigh unto you.] This seems to relate both to the priests and to the inferior ministers: that none should presume to perform the office of the former, but only the family of Aaron; nor of the latter, who were not of the tribe of Levi. But the Hebrew doctors, particularly Maimonides, by zar (a stranger), understand in this place every one that was not of the seed-male of Aaron: so that the sons of his daughters should not minister. For the sons of Aaron, saith he, (Biath Hammikdash, cap. 9.) are appointed, and none other, to lay things in order for sacrifice, (Lev. i. 5.) and to burn the fat of the peace-offerings upon the altar, (Lev. iii. 8.) His daughters were incapable of it; and so were all those that descended from them. The same may be said of the Levites.

Ver. 5. And ye shall keep.] That is, the priests were bound to do what follows.

The charge of the sanctuary.] Where, as they alone were to minister, so they were to take care of all the holy things therein contained, (the shew-bread, lamps, &c.) and to cover them when they were to be removed, (chap. iv. 5, 6, &c.)

And the charge of the altar.] Of burnt-offering; where they only were to offer sacrifice, and to take care of every thing belonging to it, (chap. iv. 3. 14.)

That there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel.] That you may by your care and constant admonitions prevent the children of Israel from running into such profanations, much more from such intrusions into the sacred offices, as may bring God's most high displeasure again upon them.

Ver. 6. And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel.] See chap. iii. 12. 41. 45. and viii. 6. 16. 18. The Levites are again called their brethren, that the priests might not despise them because they served in a lower condition, but treat them with kindness and brotherly affection.

To you are they given as a gift.] See chap. iii. 9. but especially chap. viii. 19.

For the Lord.] To assist you in your ministry to the Lord.

To do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.] This hath been repeated very often, (chap. iii. 7, 8. iv. 3, 4. 23, &c. viii. 19. 22. 24.) and here is mentioned again that the Levites might be possessed with this opinion, that they were but ministers to the priests, and therefore ought not to presume hereafter to aspire, as Korah did, to the office of priesthood.

Ver. 7. Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest's office.] Preserve it to yourselves, and suffer no other person to invade it.

For every thing of the altar.] These words, and the following, briefly declare what is meant by the priest's office. First, to offer sacrifice at the altar of burnt-offering, and sprinkle the blood, &c.

And within the veil.] Next, to perform all the service of God within the sanctuary. For in the Hebrew the words are, and for within the veil, which is a short form of speech, importing both all that was to be done in the sanctuary by the sons of Aaron (as, burning incense, putting on the shew-bread, and lighting the lamps), and likewise all that was to be done in the most holy place, by Aaron himself, on the day of atonement. For the word paroceth always signifies the inner veil, before the most holy place; the outward veil being constantly called masack; and therefore the exactest translation of the Hebrew words lemibbeth laparoceth is this, for within the house (i. e. the holy place) for the veil; i. e. within the veil, in the most holy place.

And ye shall serve.] In these places ye alone shall serve, and employ nobody else.

I have given your priest's office unto you as a service of gift.] He would have the Levites to know, that Aaron and his sons had not arrogantly usurped this office of ministering alone at both the altars; but he had freely bestowed it upon them, and appropriated it unto them.

And the stranger.] Though a Levite, if he be not of the family of Aaron.

That cometh nigh.] Presumes to offer sacrifices at the altar of burnt-offering, or incense at the golden altar.

Shall be put to death.] This is repeated, by reason of the late rebellion of Korah and his complices, who, aspiring to the priesthood, came to a fearful end. (See chap. iii. 10.)

Ver. 8. And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying.] Having told him in the foregoing part of the chapter (particularly in the foregoing verse) what should be the work of him and his sons, he proceeds to tell him what recompence he should have for his service at the altar of burnt-offerings and in the sanctuary. Of which he gives him a large account (from this verse to the twentieth), that he might want no encouragement to care and diligence in his employment.

Behold, I also, I have given thee the charge.] He bids him observe the large grant which he now makes him, as well as the work he had laid upon him: for by giving him the charge of what follows, he means bestowing them upon him for his own use; with a charge to let none have them but himself.

Of my heave-offerings of all the hallowed things of the children of Israel.] See Lev. vii. 34. and below, ver. 11. of this chapter.

Unto thee have I given them, by reason of the anointing.] Because thou art consecrated, by being anointed with the holy oil to the office of a priest, (Lev. viii. 12.)

And to thy sons by an ordinance for ever.] See Lev. vii. 34.

Ver. 9. This shall be thine of the most holy things.] He begins with those things which might be eaten only by the priests themselves.

Reserved from the fire.] From the altar of burnt-offering: for there were some things called most holy, which were their portion, that came not from thence, but out of the sanctuary; viz. the twelve cakes, which were taken off the table, and given to Aaron and his sons every sabbath-day, (Lev. xxiv. 5—9.)

Every oblation of theirs.] In the Hebrew, all their korbans: which is a larger word than zebach; comprehending not only such sacrifices as were killed at the altar (which are properly called zebachim), but all the minchas, or meat-offerings (as we translate it), which were of things inanimate; and the sacrifices of birds also, whose blood was never poured out at the altar. And therefore korban seems here to be a general word, comprehending all the particulars which follow; especially if all be translated exactly, as the words are in the Hebrew.

Every meat-offering of theirs, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, for all their meat-offerings; which makes the sense plainer, if the whole be thus translated, All their korbans (or oblations) for all their meat-offerings, and for all their sin-offerings, and for all their trespass-offerings; of all which the priest had a part. Concerning the meat-offerings, or rather the bread-offerings (for so mincha may most fitly be translated, the sacrifices being flesh, which were not eaten without bread and drink, that were their concomitants), see Lev. ii. 3. 10. vi. 15, 16. where the flesh of the sin-offerings, except those whose blood was brought into the most holy place, is given also unto them, (ver. 26.) and so are the trespass-offerings also, in the next chapter, (Lev. vii. 6, 7.) As for burnt-offerings, they were wholly the Lord's; and peace-offerings were not accounted things most holy, but reckoned amongst the less holy; as appears from ver. 11. of this present chapter.

Which they shall render unto me.] These words relate only to the trespass-offerings, immediately before named; which were attended with a recompence of the wrongs done, either unto the Lord, (Lev. v. 15, 16.) or unto their neighbours, (Lev. vi. 5. Numb. v. 8, 9.)

Shall be most holy for thee, and for thy sons.] To be used by none else; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 10. In the most holy place shalt thou eat it.] i. e. In the place where they performed their sacred office (in that part of the tabernacle next the sanctuary), which is called most holy, in comparison with the rest which were further off, because none might enter into it but the priests alone: see note upon Lev. vi. 16. where it is said expressly, it shall be eaten in the holy place, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. And see ver. 26. and chap. x. 12, 13.

Every male shall eat it.] And none else, as the places beforementioned expressly limit it, (Lev. ii. 3. 10. vi. 18. 29. vii. 6.)

It shall be holy unto thee.] Peculiarly separated from the use of all other persons, but only Aaron and his sons.

Ver. 11. And this is thine.] Now he mentions the less holy things, as before the most holy; which he bestowed upon him and his whole family.

The heave-offerings of their gift, with all the wave-offerings of the children of Israel.] That is, the breast of their peace-offerings (which are here called their gift), which was waved before the Lord, and the right shoulder heaved; and then given to the priest for his portion, (Lev. vii. 30—34.) And so was the right shoulder of the ram, which was offered for the Nazarite, (Numb. vi. 19, 20.)

I have given them unto thee, and unto thy sons, and to thy daughters with thee, &c.] These were not confined to the males only, but might be eaten by their daughters also, (Lev. x. 14.)

Every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it.] Not only their wives, and their daughters that were not married, but those who were divorced or widows, and returned to their father's house without children; or had children begotten by a priest, (see Lev. xxii. 13.) together with their servants also, whether bought with their money, or born in their house; though not hired servants, or mere sojourners, (Lev. xxii. 10, 11.) But these things were to be eaten in a clean place, (Lev. x. 14.) somewhere within the camp, as afterward in Jerusalem: (Deut. xii. 6, 7. 17, 18.) and no unclean person permitted to eat of them, (Lev. vii. 20, 21. xxii. 4.) And besides, when any Israelite killed an ox, a sheep, or a goat for his own use, he was bound to give the priest the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw; as the Jews understand, Deut. xviii. 3.

Ver. 12. All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, &c.] The Greek translates the Hebrew word cheleb (fat) by μυελὸς, marrow, Gen. xlv. 18. but here ἀπαρχὴ, the first-fruits of the oil, &c. signifying these first-fruits were to be of the very best of all the things here mentioned; which were to be brought in the beginning of the vintage, and of the harvest: the precise quantity of which is no where determined; but, they say, it was at least the sixtieth part of the whole: see Exod. xxii. 29. xxiii. 19. Deut. xviii. 4. where he speaks of the first-fruits which every private man was to offer; beside which there was a first-fruit offered in the name of the whole congregation, (Lev. xxiii. 10. 17.) All which belonged to the priests as a reward for their service.

The first-fruits of them, which they shall offer unto the Lord, them have I given thee.] Our Mr. Thorndike thus distinguishes the two sorts of first-fruits mentioned here, and in other places: the one was to be taken by the priests at the barn and wine-press, as he thinks that here spoken of was: the other was to be brought to the sanctuary, viz. those mentioned Exod. xxii. and xxiii. Deut. xxvi. 1, 2. The quantity of either of them being in the moderate account, a fiftieth part, as St. Jerome determines upon Ezek. xlv. which is agreeable to the Jewish constitutions in Maimonides, of First-fruits, cap. 2. and of Separations, cap. 3. But the Scripture (Ezek. xlv. 13.) requires only the sixtieth part. (See Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 210.)

Ver. 13. And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the Lord, shall be thine.] Some take this to signify the first-fruits of all other things besides corn, wine, and oil, mentioned in the foregoing verse. But it being a different word from that which we translate first-fruits (viz. biccurim, not reshith), it is most likely, he here intends, either the things first ripe (as we translate it) before the rest of the harvest and vintage, or those voluntary offerings of this sort which any one pleased to make; which seem to be intended in these words, which they shall bring unto the Lord; i. e. of their own good will, over and above the ordinary first-fruits.

The Jews generally understand by biccurim such things as are ripe before the rest, either in the field or elsewhere; whether they were wheat, barley, or any other sort of grain; or figs, grapes, pomegranates, olives, or dates; which they bound about with a rush, and said, let this be for the first-fruits: which every man might bring in what measure he pleased, none being appointed by the law.

Every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it.] The whole family of the priests, if they were under no pollution: (see ver. 11.)

Ver. 14. Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine.] Of those things which the Hebrews call cherem (a thing devoted), Moses speaks in Lev. xxvii. 21. 28. And they were either simply devoted, in such words as these, let this thing be a cherem; or with an addition (determining it to a certain use), let this be a cherem offered by me for holy uses. The first sort was wholly the priests'; but the latter was employed about the temple, or the vessels of it, or the priests' garments. And these devoted things, which became the priests' portion, differed in this from free-will-offerings, that every thing which was offered as a cherem might be eaten only by the priests in the holy place; but other free-will-offerings by the whole family in any clean place.

Ver. 15. Every thing that openeth the matrix in all flesh, which they bring unto the Lord, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine.] That which first came out of the womb of any creature was to be the priests', if it were a male. If a female were the first-born, and a male followed next, that was not the priests', because it did not open the womb, as the Hebrews expound it. (See Exod. xiii. 2.)

Nevertheless the first-born of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem.] See Exod. xiii. 13. xxxiv. 20.

Ver. 16. And those that are to be redeemed.] viz. Of the first-born of men mentioned before, (not of unclean creatures, which were to be redeemed by a lamb, Exod. xiii. 13.) and that after they were eight days old, (Exod. xxii. 30.)

From a month old shalt thou redeem.] Then the money was due, but they commonly stayed till the fortieth day, when the woman was purified.

According to thy estimation.] Some think this relates not to what follows, that the priest should set a value upon them (for that was a set rate, five shekels for every one), but to what goes before, that, after a child was a month old, the priest should appoint a day for the payment of the redemption-money; either immediately after the woman had lain in a month, or on the fortieth day, that she might be purified and the child redeemed both together But it rather refers to what follows: for though the price be determined, yet so it is in another case, (Lev. xxvii. 3, 4.) and notwithstanding is said to be by the estimation of the priest; because he was to take this money, not according to the quality of the person, but as much of a poor man as of a rich, and not more of a rich man than of a poor.

For the money of five shekels, &c.] Which was the price set upon the first-born, when they were exchanged for the Levites, (chap. iii. 46, 47.) This redemption of every first-born was a matter of great importance, and therefore so often mentioned, as a very learned friend of mine, Dr. Alix, observes, in his Reflections on the four last Books of Moses, chap. 3. For as the separation of the tribe of Levi to God's service instead of the first-born, whom God spared and preserved in Egypt (of which we read in the third chapter of this book), made every Levite become a living memorial of that great miracle wrought at the Israelites going out of Egypt; so this law concerning the redemption of the first-born made a further impression upon their minds, of that mighty hand of God which compelled Pharaoh to let the Israelites depart out of his country.

Ver. 17. But the firstling of a cow, or of a sheep, or a goat, thou shalt not redeem.] For they were clean creatures; and only unclean beasts were to be redeemed, (ver. 15.)

They are holy.] Separated by my appointment for a holy use; viz. to be offered in sacrifice; not redeemed, nor put to any other use.

Thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and burn their fat, &c.] Just as they did with their peace-offerings, (Lev. vii. 31. 33.)

Ver. 18. And the flesh of them shall be thine.] The whole body of the beasts (not merely some part of them), after the fat was burnt, became the priests' entirely.

As the wave-breast and the right shoulder are thine.] As these parts of the peace-offerings were the priests', (see ver. 11.) so that all their family, who were clean, might eat of the flesh of these firstlings, as they did of those parts of the peace-offerings.

Ver. 19. All the heave-offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the Lord.] He repeats what he had said in the beginning of this discourse, (ver. 8.) that he had given him all the heave-offerings; which comprehend those mentioned chap. vi. 19, 20.

Have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever.] Settled upon the priests and their whole family for their support, by an unalterable law. (See ver. 11.)

It is a covenant of salt for ever before the Lord unto thee, &c.] i. e. An everlasting covenant, never to be revoked. (See upon Lev. ii. 13.) And these things being to be eaten before the Lord, there was a place in the court of the women where they feasted upon them; as L'Empereur observes upon Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 6.

Ver. 20. And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying.] See ver. 1.

Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land.] i. e. In the land of the children of Israel, whom he speaks of in the foregoing verse: where, having told him what reward he and his family should have for his service, he bids them be satisfied therewith, and not expect any more. And indeed it was so very liberal a provision, that their desires could not reasonably extend any further. For as they had two sorts of first-fruits (as I observed ver. 12.) so, after a tithe of that which was given to the Levites, there was another tithe of what remained to be spent in sacrificing at Jerusalem; that is, for the most part, upon the priests and Levites, unto whom, and unto the poor, it wholly belonged every third year, (Deut. xiv. 22. 28. Exod. xxiii. 19. xxxiv. 20.) Add hereunto the first-born, all the sin-offerings, and their share in the peace-offerings, and the skins of the sacrifices (which alone, as Philo observes, were a great revenue), and it will appear it could not be so little as a fifth part of the fruit of the country that came to the priests for their maintenance, as Mr. Thorndike observes in the Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 211.

Neither shalt thou have any part among them.] When the land was divided, no fields, or vineyards, &c. were to be given to the priests, nor to any of the tribe of Levi. And, as the Jewish doctors say, they were to have no part among their brethren in the spoil. So Jarchi upon this place, and Maimonides, and others, who endeavour to answer the objection which may be raised against this from the thirty-first chapter of this very book, ver. 28, 29. where a tribute was taken of the prey they got from the Midianites, and given to Eleazar and the Levites. This tribute, say they, was offered because the spoil came by executing God's vengeance upon a land that was not theirs, (chap. xxv. 17.) But of the land of Sihon and Og (which God bestowed upon them, as he did the land of Canaan), nothing was given to the priests and Levites; for they were admonished to the contrary (as they understand them) by these words, neither shalt thou have any part among them; no, not of the spoil.

Certain it is, that of the land of the country they were to have no part, God having otherwise provided for them, that they might attend wholly to his service, and not spend their time in tilling the ground, or feeding cattle, which would have taken up their thoughts very much from their sacred employment. Yet the Levites had certain cities and their suburbs assigned to them, chap. xxxv. 2, &c. (which was executed by Joshua, as God commanded, Josh. xxi. 2, 3.) whereby they were dispersed among the tribes of Israel, that they might the better instruct the people in the Divine law, (Deut. xxxiii. 10. 2 Chron. xxx. 22. Malachi ii. 4, 5, &c.) By accident also the priests came to have some land. (See Lev. xxvii. 20, &c. and my notes there.)

I am thy part, and thine inheritance among the children of Israel.] For they were maintained in his house, and lived upon his altar, and fed from his table; as it is explained in Josh. xiii. 14. "The sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them:" which is given as the reason why Joshua gave them no inheritance. And see ver. 33. of that chapter, where the Lord God of Israel is said to be their inheritance: who, it appears by the foregoing part of this chapter, and other places, made such an ample provision for them, that if he had given them any part of the land of Canaan together with it, there had been too great an inequality between them and the rest of the tribes of Israel. For without any share in the land, their portion was far richer than that of any other persons whatsoever. I have said enough to prove this already; but it may not be amiss to set it before the reader again a little more distinctly. As they had yearly the first-fruits of the whole country, which were at least the sixtieth part of the fruits it produced; and the tenth part of the tithe given to the Levites, (as it follows below, ver. 26.) and all free-will-offerings; together with the money which arose out of persons and things devoted unto God; and all the firstlings of cows, sheep, and goats, and the redemption-money for the firstlings of such creatures as were unclean: so they had all the meat-offerings, offerings for sin, and trespass-offerings; together with the breast and shoulder of all peace-offerings, and the skins of all burnt-offerings; and the loaves made of the first dough, and the shew-bread, and (as Josephus and others expound Deut. xviii. 3.) a considerable part of every beast that was killed for private use; besides the cities and land about them which were assigned to the Levites: which, if well weighed, there will appear a vast difference between the priests and the rest of the people. For the first-fruits alone, if they were not less than the sixtieth part of the product of the country, might seem sufficient, especially if the firstlings be added, the priests not being the sixtieth part of the people; no, nor the hundredth part, as learned men have computed. (See Bonfrerius.)

Ver. 21. And, behold.] Now he gives the Levites notice of the recompence he would make them for their service, as he had told the priests what they should have for theirs. And Aaron hath the delivery of this grant made to them from God, that they might see he did not mind himself, and the interest of his own family only.

I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel.] See Levit. xxvii. 30. and 2 Chron. xxxi. 5, 6. where they are distinctly mentioned. Aben Ezra thinks the tenth rather than any other part was assigned, because it was a perfect number; ten being in simple numbers the highest to which we can arise, without repeating the numbers under it. For it is (as he speaks) the beginning of the second combination, and the end of the first, whereupon all numbers do depend: which our Mr. Mede hath expressed, in my judgment, far better; who looks upon it as God's favourable dealing with men, in requiring but the tenth, which is in truth the least part of their goods, according to the first division. For when we proceed beyond ten, we begin to make a new division, as eleven is ten and one, &c. But we need not have recourse to such niceties. (See upon Genesis xxviii. 22.)

For an inheritance.] Instead of a share in the land of Canaan, which other tribes had divided among them. And a larger inheritance this was than any other tribe possessed; for this was the smallest tribe of all, as appears by comparing the account which is given of them in the beginning of this book. For all the males of this tribe, from a month old and upward, were but two-and-twenty thousand; (chap. iii. 29.) whereas in the tribe of Judah alone there were above threescore and fourteen thousand men of war: (chap. i. 26, 27.) and yet the Levites had a tenth part of the product of the whole country; and the twelve tribes had only the other nine parts among them. Such a care had God of those who were peculiarly devoted to his service.

For the service which they serve, &c.] As a reward of their service; of which see chap. iv.

Ver. 22. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation.] Or rather, Therefore the children of Israel must not come nigh, so as to perform any of the offices belonging to the priests and Levites; who were appointed to do every thing belonging to the service of God there, and had their reward for it also appointed.

Lest they bear sin, and die.] Be punished with death; which is often threatened to such presumption.

Ver. 23. But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.] It was their work, and nobody's else; and therefore no other persons were to meddle with it: that is, they alone guarded the tabernacle, and afterward the temple; opened the gates of it, kept out all strangers (i.e. all but priests and Levites), carried the tabernacle, and its vessels, when they were to be removed, &c.

And they shall bear their iniquity.] They shall die for it, if they permit any one else to come there and do their work, (see ver. 1.)

It shall be a statute for ever throughout their generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance.] As all other persons were excluded from serving in the tabernacle, so they who served there were shut out from having any inheritance among their brethren. This was made an unalterable law, which provided another separate maintenance for them, by the tithes of all the land; as here it again follows.

Ver. 24. But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as a heave-offering unto the Lord.] That the people might not grudge to pay them the tithes for their service, he represents them as a heave-offering which they offered to God, in gratitude to him, of whom, as the supreme landlord, they held their land. Not that they were heaved up or waved before the Lord: but they were of the same nature with those things that were so offered to him, i. e. holy things, separate to his uses; all which are called by this name of terumah, (ver. 8.) And particularly all the offerings which God required to be freely brought, for the building him a sanctuary, are called by this name of terumah, or heave-offering, (Exod. xxv. 2. See there.)

I have given to the Levites to inherit.] The Israelites gave them to God; and he gave them to the Levites for their inheritance; who had as much right to them, as the other tribes had to their land. Which was the reason he ordered they should have no portion of the land of Canaan with the other tribes, as it here follows; therefore have I said unto them, Among the children of Israel shall they have no inheritance: for he had given them the tithes to inherit. But R. Solomon Jarchi observes also, that the Levites themselves had no right to them, till they had taken out the tenth part from their tenth, and given it to the priests; as is here immediately directed.

Ver. 25. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] In all the foregoing part of the chapter, (ver. 1. 8. 20.) the Lord spake unto Aaron (though by Moses), but here his order is particularly directed to Moses; because that which follows would better come from him, than from Aaron; who was employed in acquainting the Levites with the donation God had made of the tithes to them, (ver. 21.) but it would not have been so proper for him to tell them what was to be given out of the tithes to himself and to the priests.

Ver. 26. Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes, which I have given you from them for your inheritance.] In these words Moses confirms the report which Aaron had made to them, that the tithes of the land should be theirs, and their brethren the children of Israel have no right to them.

Then shall ye offer up a heave-offering for the Lord.] As the Israelites made their grateful acknowledgments to God by offering their tithes to him, for the use of his servants the Levites, (ver. 24.) so it was but fit that the Levites should be so grateful as to offer to him the tithe of their tithes (as it here follows), for such uses as he should appoint.

Even a tenth part of the tithe.] For the tenth part which God reserved to himself out of the land which he gave the children of Israel, was a kind of rent paid to him their supreme Lord: and he assigning this rent over to the Levites for their maintenance, thought good notwithstanding to reserve a tithe of this tenth part to himself; that thereby he might, as it were, hold his possession, and keep seisin (as the lawyers speak) of his own inheritance.

Ver. 27. And this your heave-offering shall be reckoned unto you.] Be accepted by God, as the offerings heaved up to him in the sanctuary are, (ver. 24.) though it be but the hundredth part of the whole fruit of the land.

As though it were the corn of the thrashing-floor, and as the fulness of the wine-press.] As if you paid such a tithe, as the Israelites do to you, out of all their own fields and vineyards: that is, they were to believe their offering of this small part to be as acceptable to God, as that of all the tribes of Israel; and that they should have the same right to what remained, when they had done this, as the people had to all the rest of the fruits of the earth, when they had paid the tenth part to the Levites.

Ver. 28. Thus you also shall offer a heave-offering unto the Lord of all your tithe s which ye receive of the children of Israel.] He would have them know that he ordered this, because he would not have the Levites alone offer nothing to him, from whom they received so much; but they also should make him a grateful acknowledgment as well as others.

And ye shall give thereof the Lord's heave-offering.] It is called so often the Lord's heave-offering, that they might the more willingly pay it, out of a thankful sense of what they owed to him, the donor of all.

To Aaron the priest.] This tithe is thought by some to have been designed for the high-priest alone. Two great men in their time were of this opinion, viz. Nicolaus Lyra, and the famous Alphonsus Tostatus. And another very learned person of our own (bishop R. Montague), thinks it not altogether improbable, that such a provision as this might be made for the high-priest and his family, state and dignity; he being a man of great power and might, only less than the kings of Israel; and the inferior priests having a noble maintenance, without this, from the first-fruits and offerings of the people.

But there is nothing to support this, but the mere letter of the text: for Josephus expressly says the contrary, (lib. vi. Archæolog. cap. 4.) and so do the generality of the Jewish writers, and St. Jerome also, that all the priests had their share in this tenth paid by the Levites: which, till it was paid, the Levites might not spend, to their own use, any part of their tithe. And to secure this, "the priest was to be with the Levites when they took tithes," (as we read Nehem. x. 37, 38.) to take care that they set out a tenth part of them for the priests. Where by the priest the son of Aaron, I cannot think is meant the high-priest himself (for that had been below his dignity), but some priest, I suppose, appointed by him, who took care of the concerns of the whole order of priesthood, and particularly of the high-priest's interest; who, it is probable, had a principal share among the rest in this revenue; perhaps a tenth part out of their tenth. But for this I have no authority: though I take it for certain, that when he saith this tenth should be given to Aaron the priest, the meaning is, that, as it was not for himself alone, but all his sons had a share in it, so he himself was not excluded from an honourable portion of it.

It may seem strange, perhaps, that there is no particular portion set out for the high-priest by himself, if this be not it. But it is to be considered, that all the forenamed provision (from ver. 8. to ver. 20.) was made for him in the first place, and for the priests together with him. For so the words run, unto thee have I given them, and to thy sons, (ver. 8, 9, &c.) And he had this privilege also, that he did not minister by lot, as the other priests did in their several courses, but when he pleased; and might take to himself what sacrifices he thought good to offer, (ver. 9, 10.) as Maimonides tells us, in Cele Mikdasch, cap. 5. where he speaks concerning the high-priest's prerogatives.

Ver. 29. Out of all your gifts.] Not only out of their tithes, but out of all their other possessions, which God gave them; their fields, for instance, which were in the suburbs of their cities.

Ye shall offer.] Make a present to the priests.

Every heave-offering.] Some portion of every thing God gives you to possess.

Of the Lord.] As a thankful acknowledgment of the Divine bounty to you, upon whom he hath bestowed so many good things. (See ver. 28.)

Of all the best thereof.] And that not of the refuse, but of the best of the tithe, and other things that were given them: by which is not to be understood, that they were bound to pick out the very best, wheat suppose, and separate it from the worse (which would have been to have given them more than a tenth part), but they were to give the priests as good as they left for themselves. For that was the rule, (Lev. xxvii. 32, 33.) And it was but reason the priests should have this honourable provision made for them above the Levites, their vocation being more honourable, and their service more noble, in the very sanctuary itself: for which cause this tenth of the tithe of the land was assigned them; which, they being but few in comparison with the Levites, made the allowance to every one of them much greater than to any of the Levites. And yet, as an augmentation to it, they had the first-fruits and their fees, as I said before, out of the sacrifices and other things wholly to their own use.

Even the hallowed part thereof, out of it.] The sacred part was the tenth part, which they might not use; it being taken by God for his part, (Lev. xxvii. 30.) By which all the rest was sanctified to the use of the owner, when this part was taken out of it, which may possibly be here also intended.

Ver. 30. Therefore thou shalt say unto them.] Tell them the reason why this tenth part must be separated from the rest.

When ye have heaved the best thereof from it.] Taken out the tenth part as an offering to the Lord.

Then it shall be counted to the Levites as the increase of the thrashing-floor, and as the increase of the wine-press.] Then the remainder may be as freely used by them as the corn or the wine of any man's land in Israel, when he had paid his tithe: but till then it was unlawful for him to enjoy it, because God was first to be served. This is made more plain in the next verse.

Ver. 31. And ye shall eat it.] After the hallowed part was taken out (ver. 29.) all the rest was theirs, to be enjoyed as men do that which is their own.

In every place.] This seems to be said to distinguish these from the holy things given by God to the priests; which, being offered at the altar, were to be eaten only in the holy place; but the tithes, though they were a kind of offering to the Lord, yet not being presented at the altar, might be eaten any where, after the tenth part was given to the priests.

And your households.] All their family, servants as well as others, might eat of them, whether they were clean or not. And more than this, they might sell them to strangers, to buy other necessaries with the money they yielded, or exchange them for other commodities.

For it is your reward for your service in the tabernacle of the congregation.] See ver. 21.

Ver. 32. And ye shall bear no sin.] Suffer no punishment.

By reason of it.] For eating it, with your households.

When ye have heaved from it the best of it.] When they had taken out the tenth part as sacred to God's uses, (ver. 28.) they might safely use the rest themselves as they pleased: for God had given it to them for their support, and therefore would not punish them for eating it, as he did those that did eat holy things which did not belong to them.

Neither shall ye pollute the holy things of the children of Israel.] Nor would there be any danger of polluting the holy things (which God had reserved to himself) by turning them to a common use, as there would have been if they had eaten the tithes, or other gifts, before the tenth part, which was God's, was taken out of them.

Lest ye die.] In the Hebrew it is, nor shall ye die; as those did who meddled with the holy things, which God reserved for his ministers alone.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying.] They were both concerned in what follows; Moses to deliver the command, and Aaron to see it executed.

Ver. 2. This is the ordinance.] Or, the constitution.

Of the law which the Lord hath commanded.] Which is now passed into a law by God's command; who had ordered this water of purification to be made some time before, as appears from chap. viii. 7. but now sets down a rule for all posterity to observe in the making of it. It is the rather mentioned now after the foregoing history, to free the people from that great fear they were in of perishing in their uncleanness, (chap. xvii. 12, 13.) by shewing them a way how to be purified from the greatest pollution, before they approached to the tabernacle.

Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring thee.] At the common charge of the people, because it was for their common benefit.

A red heifer.] The Hebrew word parah, which we translate heifer, signifies a young cow; as par signifies a young bullock, not above two or three years old at most, as Kimchi and others observe.

Without spot.] This the Jews refer to the word red, which goes before, and take it to signify perfectly red, without the mixture of any other colour: for as to any other imperfections, they are provided against in the next words, without blemish: insomuch that Maimonides, in his treatise on this subject, saith, that if this cow had two hairs black or white, it was unfit for this use. From whence other nations, particularly the Egyptians, derived the custom of sacrificing red oxen, as Plutarch tells us in his book de Iside et Osiride, τῶν βοῶν τοὺς πυῤῥοὺς καθιερεύουσιν, &c. And he saith they searched them so very narrowly, that if they found one hair black or white, they counted it ἄθυτον, unfit to be sacrificed: see Bochartus, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 39. where he shews, this was the most common colour among that sort of creatures in some countries.

Wherein is no blemish.] See Lev. xxii. 20—22.

And upon which never came yoke.] Had never been employed in ploughing the ground, or any other work: for according to the common sense of all mankind, those creatures which had been made to serve other uses, became unfit to be offered to God. Whence Diomedes promises Pallas a cow of a year old, ————ἣν οὔπω ὑπὸ ζυγὸν ἤγαγεν ἀνήρ.

Which no man hitherto had brought under the yoke. (Iliad. K.) And so doth Nestor, Odyss. 1. and the like Bochartus observes out of Virgil, Ovid, and others, in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.)

All this is very plain; but why a young cow, rather than a bullock (which is commonly appointed in sacrifices), and why one perfectly red, is not so easy to understand. If we had any reason to believe that those superstitions were among the Egyptians in the days of Moses, which were when Plutarch or Herodotus lived, we might very probably say (as some men of learning have), that this precept was given to preserve the Israelites from their religion. For they abhorred to offer a cow, whom they honoured as sacred to Isis. So Herodotus; they sacrificed males, both old and young, τὰς δὲ θηλέας οὐ σφιν ἔξεστι θύειν· but it is not lawful for them to offer females, (lib. ii. cap. 41.) And therefore God, it might be thought, ordered a cow to be burnt rather than a bullock: and for the same cause one perfectly red, because that was a colour odious and abominable to the Egyptians; who fancied Typhon (the author of all evil in their account), to be of that colour; and therefore offered him red oxen, as hateful to them as red men and asses were. Thus Plutarch and Diodorus Siculus. In opposition to which it may be thought, that a cow of this colour was acceptable to God, because hated and abhorred by those idolaters: but I look upon what such late writers say as of no authority in this matter. And as there is no proof of any such customs among the Egyptians in Moses's time, so there is a high probability that the whole fable of Typhon was framed out of the story of Moses, as Bochartus hath most ingeniously endeavoured to make out, by many observations out of that book of Plutarch, and other authors, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. p. 340, 341, &c.)

But supposing the antiquity of those superstitions among the Egyptians to have been as great as some fancy them, I cannot think, that if Moses had had any respect to them, he would have ordered such a great number of sacrifices, as we read of in his law, without the least consideration of the colour of any one of them, and only mention the colour of this cow, which was no sacrifice. I rather think this perfect red colour was chosen because of its rarity; it being hard to find a cow without any the least mixture of other hair. And though it were not a sacrifice, yet being designed to the same end, there was a respect herein to that great expiation which was made by the sacrifice of Christ: with whose blood, though the apostle did not compare the blood of this heifer (because it was not offered), yet he doth compare it with the ashes of this burnt heifer, put into the water of purification. See Heb. ix. 13. where, after the blood of bulls and goats, he mentions the ashes of this heifer sprinkling the unclean. For they were a more extraordinary sort of purification than any under the law; of which we no where read, but in this place; nor of any command for the repeated burning of such an heifer to ashes (as there is for the anniversary sacrifice on the day of atonement), but only of the use of the water made of these ashes as oft as there was occasion. But of this it will be more fit to treat in the following part of the chapter.

Ver. 3. And ye shall give her.] They who brought her in the name of the whole congregation were to bring her to Moses, as the foregoing verse directs: and he and Aaron were to deliver her to Eleazar.

Unto Eleazar the priest.] It is commonly thought that Aaron might not be employed in the following work, because it would have defiled him, and made him unfit to minister before God for a season; which he was bound to avoid, even when natural affection seemed to require it: (Lev. xxi. 11, 12.) yet a vulgar priest was not entrusted with this service, but it was committed unto the very next person to Aaron, who was to be his successor, because it was of very great weight and importance.

That he may bring her forth without the camp.] As a thing exceeding unclean; more impure than any common offering for sin. For the greater the impurity was that was laid upon any sacrifice, the further still off from the sanctuary it was carried. The bullock, for instance, which was offered for a sin committed by the priest, or the whole congregation, was in part offered at the altar, but the far greater part was to be burnt without the camp, (Lev. iv. 12. 20.) And so was the bullock and goat, offered for all the sins of the people, on the great day of expiation: (Lev. xvi. 27.) and the scape-goat, which was designed for the same purpose, was not so much as burnt, but banished into a land not inhabited, nobody knows whither. All which more particularly represented Christ in his sufferings, as the apostle observes, Heb. xiii. 11, 12. and so did this in part; having something of the nature of a sacrifice in it. For though it was not a sacrifice brought to be slain at the altar, yet it was intended to be used to the same purpose, for the cleansing of the people from the greatest legal defilement.

And one shall slay her before his face.] Some person appointed by Eleazar (for it was not necessary a priest should do it) was to kill her without the camp. Where it is plain from ver. 5. 8, 9. there were more than one concerned in this office. But it could not be slain unless Eleazar was there; and it was to be done in his presence, who was the chief of the priests, to shew that it was intended for God's service, though not offered as sacrifices were at the tabernacle before the Lord. And this is the reason, perhaps, why the care of this heifer is committed to Eleazar, and not to Aaron, because he officiated only at the tabernacle.

Ver. 4. And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger.] As they did in expiatory sacrifices, (Lev. iv. 6.)

And sprinkle of her blood.] In the sprinkling of the blood, as the Jews observe, consisted the very essence of an expiatory sacrifice. Therefore, though this was not a sacrifice, yet it had something of that nature in it, and may be called a piaculum, an expiatory thing; though nothing was called korban, a sacrifice, but what was offered at the altar, as our Dr. Outram hath most judiciously observed against Abarbinel, who calls this red cow an offering for sin.

Directly before the tabernacle of the congregation.] This rite of sprinkling the blood was never used but in sacrifices slain at the altar, in the presence of God; and in this red cow, which was slain in the prospect of the sanctuary; towards which the priest was to look steadfastly while he sprinkled it; otherwise, the Jews say, it was in vain: which shews that the validity of this act, and of the purification to be made by it, was to be expected from the sanctuary. For the blood of that heifer, whose head was cut off to cleanse a city, near to which a man was found slain by an unknown person, was not sprinkled; being slain, not in sight of the sanctuary, but in a valley near that city, (Deut. xxi. 3, 4, &c.) And in this the Jews were so curious, that after the temple was built, this blood being to be sprinkled directly before the porch of it, they took care the gate Shushan, which was before it, should have lower battlements than any other gate of the temple had, that the priest might see the face of the porch of the house of God.

Seven times.] This signifies the perfection of the expiation that was to be made by this red cow, on whose ashes the Jews thought so much depended, that they took care the priest, who was to see her burnt, should be put apart in a chamber of the temple (called the house of stone), that they might be certain he was free from all pollution by a grave, or a dead corpse. For the ashes of this burnt cow being the great and only cleanser for that defilement, they took suitable care that he should not be defiled who went to burn her. See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 17. sect. 2. where he describes, out of Maimonides, and others, how solemnly the priest was attended when he went about this work. And the apostle had reason to mention the ashes of this heifer, wherewith the water was made for sprinkling the unclean, as the principal thing that sanctified to the purifying of the flesh, i. e. taking away bodily defilements: with which he compares the blood of Christ, as infinitely more powerful for the purifying of the conscience from dead works. (Heb. ix. 13, 14.) In which words, dead works, there is a respect (as our Dr. Jackson observes) to the main intention of these ashes, which were for the purification of those defiled by dead bodies. And he seems to me also not to be led by fancy, but by a solid judgment, when he considered these ashes also as a notable figure of the everlasting efficacy of Christ's blood, of which the apostle there discourses. For, if the frequent occasion for the use of the water of purification had not spent all the ashes of the heifer now slain and burnt by Eleazar, they might have been preserved for this purpose, without any danger of putrefaction, for a longer time than the law of ceremonies lasted. For ashes, being well kept, never perish; and therefore are an emblem of immortality. But it must be considered, that the frequent use of these ashes might exhaust the whole stock of them made at this time, and make it necessary the priests should burn another heifer for the same end; as the Jews say they did, though so rarely (as I shall note below), that this burning of a red heifer was not reiterated, if we may believe them, till the destruction of Solomon's temple. Which makes them a more notable figure, though not a perfect one (for no such can be found), of the power of Christ's blood to purify us for ever, without the repetition of it continually; which was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that they must be often offered.

Ver. 5. And one shall burn the heifer in his sight; her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung, shall he burn.] There was a great pile of wood (to which they set fire immediately after he had done sprinkling), in which this heifer was more entirely burnt than any public expiatory sacrifice beforementioned, ver. 2. (for here the remainder of the blood is ordered to be burnt), because this was of all other things the most unclean, and to be utterly consumed at a distance from the sanctuary.

Ver. 6. And the priest shall take cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet.] These three things composed that instrument which the priest made use of for sprinkling of leprous persons, or houses, when they were to be cleansed, (Lev. xiv. 6, 7. 49, 50, &c. where see what I have noted.) And the apostle mentions two of them, as used by Moses himself, when he sprinkled the book of the covenant, and all the people, with the blood of the sacrifice; (Heb. ix. 19.) which, though not mentioned in Exodus, yet the apostle knew was the ancient way of sprinkling. And therefore these things which were used of old as cleansers, either of inward or outward filth, are ordered here to be thrown into the fire, while the heifer was burning in it, whose ashes were to be the great means of men's purification from the highest pollutions.

And cast it.] He speaks as if these three things being bound together became one.

Into the midst of the burning of the heifer.] To denote the great virtue which the water, made of the ashes of all these things, should have to cleanse those who were sprinkled with it; one of these things (viz. hyssop) being ordered to be dipped into the water for that purpose, (ver. 18.)

Ver. 7. The priest shall wash his clothes, and shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp.] Though we do not find that Eleazar was employed, either in killing or in burning this heifer, which was only to be done in his presence, yet, having touched her blood, he became unclean; and therefore was to use these ceremonies for his cleansing, before he returned to the camp; as Aaron did when he had offered the great sacrifice of expiation, on the day of general atonement, (Lev. xvi. 24.)

And shall be unclean until the even.] So as not to come into the camp, I suppose, much less to the sanctuary, until sun-set; which was but a short time, considering the greatness of this heifer's impurity; this being the common time of remaining unclean for the smallest defilements, (Lev. xi. 24, 25. 27, &c.)

Ver. 8. And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, &c.] This was a general maxim among the Jews, that the bodies of those beasts whose blood was carried into the holy place, polluted those that touched them: which is justified by Lev. xvi. 28. And therefore he that burnt this heifer, whose blood was sprinkled towards it, was to do the same as he that carried the scape-goat into the wilderness was also bound to do, (Lev. xvi. 26.)

Ver. 9. And a man that is clean.] Free from any legal defilement.

Shall gather up the ashes of the heifer.] They were the principal ashes, though the ashes of the cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet-wool, were also mingled with them; which, being taken up, were pounded and sifted, as the Jews tell us.

And lay them up without the camp in a clean place.] The Jews say that the heifer, in aftertimes, being burnt on the pitch of Mount Olivet, which was over against the temple, they laid up some part of the ashes in a place near that mount, for the sprinkling of the people; and another part was delivered to the twenty-four courses, for the sprinkling of the priests; and another third part laid up for a memorial in the inclosure of the court of the temple. (See Dr. Lightfoot in the place beforenamed.) But there is no certainty of this, and it contradicts in part what is here commanded, that they should be laid up without the camp. (See ver. 12.)

And it shall be kept.] Laid up, εἰς διατήρησιν, as the LXX. translate it, to be reserved and kept for the use of those who had defiled themselves by the dead; unto whom it was delivered when they had occasion for it. And this word reserved, or kept, imports, that these ashes were not for the use of that generation only, but for all posterity. And as manna (which was commanded in the same form of speech to be kept or reserved in the ark) was a type of Christ, as he was the food of life, or the bread that came down from heaven: so were these ashes kept as an emblem of the everlasting efficacy of his sacrifice. For there is no bodily substance under heaven (as Dr. Jackson speaks, book x. chap. 55.) which can be so true an emblem or model of incorruption, as ashes are; for being the remainder of bodies perfectly dissolved or corrupted, they are not capable of a second corruption.

For the congregation of the children of Israel.] This one heifer, being slain, and its blood sprinkled, and body burnt, afforded ashes enough to season as many vessels of water as the whole people of Israel should need. Wherein it was a notable representation of Christ's blood, shed for the whole world, to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Yea, they were sufficient for all the people, for many generations, though they had frequent occasion to use them for legal purification; wherein still they more lively represented the virtue of Christ's one sacrifice, which continues for ever. For the Jews say, this red heifer was killed but nine times, while their state lasted. First, by Eleazar here in the wilderness; which was not repeated till after the destruction of Solomon's temple, i. e. not during the space of more than a thousand years. The second time it was burnt by Ezra, after their return from the captivity of Babylon; and but seven times more, till the destruction of the second temple. Since which they have not adventured to make these ashes, but expect it to be done the tenth time by the king Messias, who, indeed, came to put an end to this and all other legal rites; not after the legal manner, but by offering himself once for all, instead of all other sacrifices or ways of purification.

For a water of separation.] To be put into spring-water (which was always accounted more pure than other), by which those persons were to be cleansed, who for their pollutions were separated from the congregation; and those things also which had been defiled were restored to their common use. Ashes, all know, are of great use in scouring things polluted; and the ancient gentiles used them much in their lustrations, as appears from Virgil, Ovid, and many other authors. But the water into which they put them was prepared with magical rites, and, for the most part, was drawn out of some pretended sacred fountain; and sometimes it had a burning torch, taken from the altar, quenched in it; and in some places they put sulphur, and spittle, and other cleansing things, into it. In which, I suppose, at first they imitated this rite prescribed by Moses; but in process of time added many superstitions of their own to it.

It is a purification for sin.] In the Hebrew the words are, it is sin; and we add, a purification, to explain the sense. For it was not a proper sacrifice for sin, (as this phrase for sin sometimes imports, Lev. iv. 24.) but had something of that nature in it (as I observed before), and may be properly said to purify or cleanse men from their sin, i. e. from such legal defilements as are mentioned afterwards. And it may, in a less proper sense, have the name of a sin-offering, inasmuch as the body of it was burnt without the camp (as the great sin-offering was on the day of atonement), and its blood sprinkled seven times towards the sanctuary, though not shed at the altar; whereby it became a more complete representation of the sacrifice of Christ, especially if we consider, that this purification here mentioned doth not signify only one, or a few acts of purification, but a continued purification; the ashes being to be laid up as a treasure or storehouse (to use Dr. Jackson's words) for making as many purifications, or waters of sprinkling, as the Israelites should have occasion to use. For therein consisted the excellence of this purification, that the ashes were not to be made by burning a heifer every time the people had occasion for them; but the ashes of this one sacrifice (as we may call it) was sufficient for the use of many generations. Accordingly the apostle saith our Lord Christ, καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος, having made a purification of our sins, (Heb. i. 3.) sat down at God's right hand: which word purification, in that place, doth not signify one act or operation, but implies that by this one act of sacrificing himself, he was consecrated to be a perpetual fountain of purification, being still the propitiation for our sins.

Ver. 10. And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even.] This is one of the strange things which the Jews say Solomon himself did not understand, (and Maimonides professes he could find no reason of, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 47. and the author of Sepher Cosri also ascribes purely to the will and pleasure of God, of which he could give no account, par. iii. sect. 53.) that the same thing should both cleanse and pollute, as these ashes did, which polluted him that gathered them, and made those that used them clean from the highest legal pollutions. But this is not strange to those who consider that all those great sacrifices which were offered for sin, (which I mentioned ver. 7.) though they purified those for whom they were offered, were very impure themselves, because the sins of men were laid upon them, as all our sins were upon Christ; who, therefore, is said to be made sin for us, (2 Cor. v. 21.) that we might be made the righteousness of God, i.e. freed from all sin.

And it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger, &c.] All proselytes to their religion were to have the benefit of this purification, as well as the Jews, by an unalterable law; by which was figured the propitiation Christ made for the sins of the whole world.

Ver. 11. He that toucheth the body of any dead man shall be unclean seven days.] This long uncleanness by touching a dead body, was the ground of those strict injunctions to the priests about mourning for their dead relations; which is forbidden, lest they should be hindered too long in their ministration. (See Lev. xxi.) He that touched the carcass of any unclean creature, was defiled only until the even, (Lev. xi. 24.) nor was he longer who touched the bed of him that had an issue, or his seat, &c. (Lev. xv. 5—8.)

Ver. 12. He shall purify himself with it.] With the water of separation, mentioned ver. 9. Which seems here to be designed chiefly, if not only, for the purging of this great impurity, by touching any man's dead body.

On the third day.] Then he was to begin his purification, by being sprinkled with it; which makes it probable that these ashes were kept in more places than the Jews mention without the camp (as afterward near Jerusalem), and, it is most likely, in all the cities of the country. For it had been too hard for all the people, nay, impossible for those who were remote, to go to Jerusalem the third day after they were defiled to fetch these ashes; which, therefore, were kept in several clean places, where every body might easily have them to put into water, and be sprinkled with it. For as there was no sacrifice, so no priest required to make this purification; but any clean person might sprinkle the water, (ver. 18, 19.)

And on the seventh day he shall be clean.] Then his purification was perfected; but not without a new sprinkling on this day, (ver. 19.)

But if he purified not himself the third day, then the seventh day he shall not be clean.] If he did not begin his purification on the third day, his sprinkling on the seventh would not make him clean. But it is very probable, that, though he omitted it on the third day, yet, if he purified himself on the fourth or fifth, or any day following, that being reckoned as if it had been the third, when he had made up the number seven, his cleansing might be completed.

Ver. 13. Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purifieth not himself.] With the water of separation, in the manner before prescribed, (ver. 12.)

Defileth the tabernacle of the Lord.] If he approach unto it without this purification.

And that soul shall be cut off from Israel.] He was to die for it if he did it presumptuously.

Because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him.] Because he neglected the means of his purification.

He shall be unclean.] Remain in his uncleanness.

His uncleanness is yet upon him.] Not to be purified now by this water of separation, but cut off from the body of the people. This still concerns those that came to the tabernacle presumptuously, being unpurified. If they did it ignorantly, a sacrifice was admitted for their atonement, (Lev. v. 3. 6. 17, 18.)

Ver. 14. This is the law.] Concerning such defilements as these, by the dead bodies of men.

When a man dieth in a tent.] Wherein they now lived during their stay in the wilderness; and the same law obliged them, when they came to dwell in houses, in the land of Canaan.

All that come into the tent, and all that is in the tent, shall be unclean seven days.] The meaning seems to be, that every person who came into the tent while the dead body lay there (or before the tent was purified), as well as they who were in it when the person died, should be unclean. For all the goods of the house were not made unclean; but only all open vessels.

Ver. 15. And every open vessel which hath no covering bound upon it is unclean.] Because the air in the house, which was supposed to be tainted by the dead body, came as freely into such vessels as it did to the dead body. Tho. Aquinas fancies, that this law was made to prevent idolatry: for the ancient idolaters thought, that if a mouse, or a lizard, or such-like thing, which was dedicated unto their idols, fell into a vessel, or into water, they became thereby very acceptable to their gods. And he saith this superstition continued till his days; in which some women were wont to leave their vessels uncovered on purpose, in observance of the nocturnal deities, whom they called Janos. (See Prima et Secunda Quest. 102. artic. 5.) To abolish which superstition God required, he thinks, all vessels left uncovered, where the dead lay, should be polluted; i. e. not acceptable unto God, nor employed to holy, no, nor common uses. If such customs had been in Moses's days, this might be better applied to what we read in Lev. xi. 32, 33.

Ver. 16. Whosoever toucheth one that is slain with the sword in the open fields.] Or killed any other way, it appears by the words following.

Or a dead body.] Of a man that falls down dead of a sudden, or is executed for his crimes.

Or a bone of a man.] Taken out of a grave, or the grave itself where the dead body lies; as the next words are.

Shall be unclean seven days.] As long as if he had touched the dead body itself.

Ver. 17. And for an unclean person.] i. e. For the cleansing of one defiled any of these ways.

They shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin.] It is not said what quantity, therefore, I suppose, whether it were little or great it would serve the turn. It is observable, that the ashes of the burnt heifer are here called chattah (sin), which shews they had the virtue of a sin-offering in them. (See ver. 9.)

And running-water shall be put thereto in a vessel.] The ashes being put into a vessel, they were to put pure spring, or at least river water upon them; which became the water of separation.

Ver. 18. And a clean person.] It is not said a priest; and therefore I suppose any other person, who was not unclean, might do this: as any such person might slay the heifer, and burn her, (ver. 8. 5.) But in this the Jews were so curious, that their tradition made this extend, not only to a person that was at present clean, but that never had been defiled by a dead corpse in all his life; and therefore tell us what devices they had to keep persons thus clean, for this very end and purpose. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. 17. sect. 2.)

Shall take hyssop.] When the priests sprinkled the lepers, or their houses, with the blood of a bird killed over running-water, he dipped hyssop, cedar-wood, and scarlet-wool in them, (Lev. xiv. 4. 6, 7. 49, 50, &c.) But here the sprinkling being made by some neighbour, hyssop alone sufficed; which every one knows was a cleansing herb, and easily procured: instead of which the gentiles, in their superstition, used branches of laurel, or of olive; as we learn from Juvenal and Virgil.

And sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there, &c.] For the purifying of all the things, and all the persons abovementioned, (ver. 14—16.)

Ver. 19. And the clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean on the third day, and on the seventh day.] Here he explains what was not so distinctly delivered, ver. 12. And I suppose both persons and things were to be sprinkled on both days, because he saith in general, upon the unclean; which seems to relate to all that is mentioned in the foregoing verse.

And on the seventh day he shall purify himself, &c.] This seems to be meant of the clean person who sprinkled the unclean, and by coming near them, was in some sort defiled. But he was not to be purified by the water of separation; but only by washing his clothes, and bathing himself in water; and his uncleanness lasted but till the even, as it here follows in the rest of this verse. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 20. But the man that shall be unclean.] By a dead body, a bone, or a grave, &c.

And shall not purify himself.] By the water of separation appointed for that purpose.

That soul shall be cut off from among the congregation.] As a contemner of this law of God.

Because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord, &c.] This and the following words are only a repetition of what was said ver. 13. for the greater confirmation of it.

Ver. 21. And it shall be a perpetual statute unto them, that he that sprinkleth the water of separation shall wash his clothes.] Be reputed unclean, until he hath washed his clothes; which I suppose comprehends his body also, ver. 19.

And he that toucheth the water of separation.] As a man might chance to do, when he mingled the water and ashes together, (ver. 17.)

Shall be unclean until even.] And wash his clothes, it must be supposed from the foregoing words. For mere staying till even purified nobody, without some rite of cleansing. And there was more reason for him that touched the water, immediately to wash his clothes, than for him who only sprinkled with it.

Ver. 22. And whatsoever.] Or whomsoever.

The unclean person toucheth shall be unclean.] He doth not mean, by the unclean person, him who was made unclean by touching the water of separation (for his uncleanness was so slight, that any one would think he should make nobody unclean by his touch), but the unclean person spoken of all along in this chapter; who was defiled by touching a dead body. He whom such a person touched was made unclean, and therefore was to wash his clothes, and not be thought clean until the even.

And the soul that toucheth it.] Or toucheth him.

Shall be unclean until the even.] Not only he whom the unclean person touched, but he who touched the unclean person, or any unclean thing, was to be unclean till the even, and wash his clothes (as I said before) for his cleansing. No other cleansing was necessary for such kinds of uncleanness as these. For sacrifices were required only for the uncleanness of lepers, and of a childbed woman, and of a flux of blood, or seed: all others were purged without sacrifice.

By this nice care, which is here taken, about the smallest bodily defilements, God intended (I make no doubt) to make them sensible how necessary it was to preserve inward purity; without which they could not be acceptable to God, though they approached to his sanctuary. For these laws, extending to what was done at home, as well as abroad, were a plain instruction, both that it was not sufficient to be pure in the eyes of men, and that nothing could be concealed from the Divine Majesty, who sees what passeth in secret.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. THEN came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the wilderness of Zin.] From Rithmah, or Kadesh-barnea, they came at last into this wilderness, after many removals to other stations, of which Moses gives an account in the thirty-third chapter, from ver. 19. to ver. 36. For God led them, by the cloud, quite back again to the Red Sea, (chap. xiv. 25.) and from thence brought them into this wilderness of Tzin; which is quite different from that mentioned Exod. xvi. called Sin: for this lay on the confines of Idumea, as appears from ver. 14, 15.

In the first month.] Of the fortieth year after they came out of the land of Egypt. For Moses gives an account of the transactions only of the two first years after they came from thence, and of the last: the rest he passeth over in silence, being spent in tiresome journeys; whereby all above twenty years old were consumed, by one disease or other. In those travels he shews how, at several removals, (mentioned chap. xxxiii.) they were led back from Kadesh-barnea unto Ezion-Geber (that is, from the north to the south of the shore of the Red Sea), in which journey they compassed the land of Edom many days, (Deut. ii. 1.) that is, many years. For, from the time they left Kadesh-barnea till they returned back again was thirty-eight years, (Deut. ii. 14.)

And the people abode in Kadesh.] Not in Kadesh-barnea, which was their fifteenth station, and in the confines of the south part of Canaan, (chap. xxxiv. 4. Josh. xv. 3.) but another Kadesh on the confines of the land of Edom, towards the Red Sea, (chap. xxxiii. 36. Deut. ii. 8. Judges xi. 17.)

And Miriam died there.] Four months before her brother Aaron, (chap. xxxiii. 38.) and eleven months before Moses; being elder than either of them. For she was near a hundred and thirty years old, as may be gathered from Exod. ii. 4. 7. where it appears she was not a child when Moses was born.

And was buried there.] In Kadesh, where she died. But we read of no mourning for her, as there was for Aaron a little after, (ver. 29.)

Ver. 2. And there was no water for the congregation.] The water that hitherto followed them from the rock in Horeb now failed. Which happening just at the death of Miriam, the Jews have a foolish conceit, that as her piety procured it for them, so she being dead, it was taken from them, and was restored again for the piety of Moses and Aaron. It is more reasonable to think, that God suffered the water to be discontinued for a time, that he might try the faith of this new generation, whether they were any better than their rebellious fathers, and withal, to convince them that the water out of the former rock was not contained in it, if he had not produced it, who could bring forth water out of any other place as well as that. Or, they being now going towards Canaan, and near a country where water might be had for money (or they might have found it by digging for it), God thought fit to let the miracle cease; that they might see he would shortly provide for them otherwise. For it is very likely, that, in their last station, where they were before this, at Ezion-Geber, (chap. xxxiii. 36.) the water that had followed them in all their journeys thither fell there into the Red Sea, and so was swallowed up; they being, as I said, to return towards Canaan, by places where water might be procured without a miracle. For being upon the edge of the land of Edom, when Aaron died in their next removal, (ver. 28. chap. xxxiii. 37.) we read expressly that they presently after came to a land of rivers of water, (Deut. x. 7.) And, indeed, not long after they removed from Mount Hor, when Aaron died, we find, in the next chapter to this, that they came to Oboth, (chap. xxi. 10.) which signifying bottles, it is no unreasonable conjecture, that here they met with water, with which they filled their empty bottles. And, next to that station, they came to Jie-Abarim, (ver. 11.) heaps of fords; or, as the Chaldee expounds it, the ford of those that pass over: and then to the valley of Zared, (ver. 12.) or to the brook Zered, as it is in Deut. ii. 13, 14. And then to the river Arnon, (ver. 13.) and thence to Beer, where they digged a famous well, (chap. xxi. 16—18.) which, perhaps, they might have done before in other places, if they had made experiment; for Kadesh, where they now were, was in the border of a country inhabited.

And they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron.] Just as their fathers had many times done; particularly upon such an occasion as this, (Exod. xvii. 2, 3.)

Ver. 3. And the people chode with Moses.] Instead of condoling with him, and comforting him, for the death of his sister and their prophetess (as Abarbinel observes), they came in a rude manner to scold at him.

And spake, saying, Would God that we had died, when our brethren died before the Lord!] By a sudden death, rather than linger away by thirst. They allude to the strokes upon their brethren, chap. xi. 1. 33. xiv. 37. xvi. 32. 35. 46. which one would have thought should have affrighted them from uttering such very discontented language, (chap. xix. 2.) But nothing will alter those, who will not lay to heart, and preserve in mind, God's mercies and judgments.

Ver. 4. And why have ye brought the congregation of the Lord into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there?] The very words of their fathers, presently after they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xvii. 3.)

Ver. 5. And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt.] They speak as if it had not been their own desire, but that they were persuaded to it by Moses to leave Egypt; who was sent to tell them God heard their sighing, groans, and cries, and would deliver them, (Exod. ii. 23, 24. iii. 17.) But in a discontented fit, nothing of this was remembered.

To bring us unto this evil place?] They do not speak of returning to Egypt, as their fathers did, (chap. xiv. 3, 4.) but they repented that they were come out of it. So shamefully forgetful they were of all God's benefits, who had in a wonderful manner redeemed them from the heaviest slavery, and hitherto provided for them miraculously in the wilderness, which was a better place than such an ungrateful people deserved!

It is no place of seed.] i. e. Of corn.

Or of figs, or of vines, or pomegranates, &c.] Now they complain for want of other things, as well as water: wherein they still imitate their unbelieving fathers, (chap. xvi. 14.)

Ver. 6. And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] To pray to God to pardon their sin, and to supply their wants.

And they fell upon their faces.] As they had often done before, on other such-like occasions; particularly chap. xiv. 5.

And the glory of the Lord appeared unto them.] Unto all the people, it is likely; as it had done several times, to silence their murmurings, (see chap. xiv. 10. xvi. 19. 42.)

Ver. 7. And the Lord spake unto Moses.] From that glory which appeared upon the tabernacle.

Ver. 8. Take the rod.] That famous rod wherein Moses had wrought so many miracles in Egypt, and at the Red Sea, &c.

And gather thou the assembly together.] This word edah signifying sometimes only the assembly of the elders, not of the whole people, it would be uncertain which of them he is bid to gather together, (for it is a different word from that which we translate assembly, ver. 6.) if the tenth verse had not determined that it was the kahal, or congregation of the people, as the word edah also signifies just before, (ver. 8.)

Thou and Aaron thy brother.] For the people were gathered together against Aaron, in a mutinous manner, as well as against Moses, (ver. 2.)

And speak ye unto the rock before their eyes.] To the first rock you meet withal (saith Nachmanides), and that is within their sight. For this is not the same rock out of which the former water flowed, as the Jews fancy; but quite different. Their very names are different; that being called Tzur, this Selah. That was in Rephidim, this in Kadesh; two very distant places. Thus Chaskuni; some think this the same with that in Exodus: "but it is not the same history. For the former was in Horeb, this in Kadesh; which is in the extremity of the land of Edom." But whether God pointed him to a rock, which was then in their sight, (as he did at Horeb, Exod. xvii. 5, 6.) or left him to choose any stony place, is not certain. But it is a mere fancy of some of the Jews, that, because God here bade them speak to the rock, Moses offended God in smiting it. For to what purpose should he take the rod, if he was not to smite the rock with it, as he had done formerly? Just such another conceit there is in Schalschelet Hakkabala; where R. Gedaliah saith, that he had given an account of this sin in another book, which he gathered out of various writers, and found there were twenty-eight different opinions about it: but he preferred this before any of them; that whereas God bade Moses gather the edah together, that is, the assembly of the people, (ver. 8.) he gathered the kahal, i. e. the congregation of the princes and elders (as he will have it), whose faith needed no confirmation: (see Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 451.)

And it shall give forth his water.] The Jews puzzle themselves about this expression, which sounds, they think, as if the water was contained in the rock; and Moses only made a gap for it to gush out: but it seems to be spoken in opposition to the waters issuing out of the former rock, which had supplied them hitherto, but now ceased to flow; it being as much as if he had said, This shall give forth water as that did before: now it shall be called the water of this rock; not that of Horeb.

And thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock?] Renew the former miracle.

So thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink.] So that they and their cattle (which they fear will perish, ver. 24.) shall be as plentifully provided for as ever.

Ver. 9. And Moses took the rod from before the Lord, as he commanded him.] From hence some conclude, that this was the rod of Aaron which blossomed; because he is said to take it from before the Lord, where Aaron's rod was laid up, (chap. xvii. 10.) But this rod is so expressly called Moses's rod, ver. 11. which was the instrument of bringing the former water out of the rock in Horeb, that I cannot but think this was the very same rod; which being there called the rod of God, (Exod. xvii. 9.) as it is at the first mention of it, (Exod. iv. 20.) it is very probable, that by God's order it was laid up somewhere before him in the sanctuary; though not before the ark of the testimony. For having been employed in doing so many wonders, it was not seemly it should lay in his own tent, as a common staff; but in the house of God, as a sacred wand. This, indeed, is no where mentioned, no more than many other things, which notwithstanding are plainly intimated.

Ver. 10. And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation before the rock.] As God had commanded, ver. 8.

And he said unto them.] Moses, who was the chief actor, said unto them.

Hear ye now, ye rebels.] The Talmudists fancy that this is the great sin for which Moses and Aaron were denied to go into Canaan, because he called God's people rebels: from whence they have framed this maxim, He that treats the church contemptuously, which ought to be honoured, is as if he blasphemed the name of God. But they subvert the truth, who build it upon no better foundations. For Moses, the great minister of God, only uses God's own language to their fathers, chap. xvii. 10. where he bids him lay up Aaron's rod, as a token against the rebels. And if this were a sin, Moses committed it again not long after this, and in a higher strain (which nobody can think he would have done, if it had cost him so dear), when he saith, Deut. ix. 24. "Ye have been rebellious against the Lord ever since I knew you."

Must we fetch you water out of this rock?] In these words, also, some of the Jews (particularly Nachman) think they find the sin of Moses and Aaron; who here (they fancy) ascribe to themselves that which they ought to have acknowledged the work of God alone. But this is without any ground; for the plain meaning of the words is quite contrary; Is it in our power to bring water out of a rock? So the Vulgar Latin translates it; it being a speech of those that wonder, like that 1 Kings xxi. 19. "Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" As if Moses had said, Strange! that you should think it possible for us to bring you water out of a rock, which is the work only of an omnipotent power!

Ver. 11. And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice.] It seems the water did not gush out at the first stroke; which made him repeat it.

And the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also.] So that their present necessity was supplied; and they also filled their vessels when they left this place, to serve them till they met with the convenience of water; as they did, I shewed upon ver. 2.

Ver. 12. And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not.] Here interpreters have been much troubled to find what it was for which God was offended at Moses and Aaron: for though the text tells us expressly it was for their unbelief (whereby they gave great scandal, and did not sanctify him as they did formerly, before the Israelites), yet it doth not clearly appear wherein this unbelief declared itself. Abarbinel hath collected several opinions of the Jewish doctors about this matter, which are no less than ten; after which he delivers his own, which seems to me as unsatisfactory as the rest were to him; for it is far-fetched, with too much nicety and subtilty, and relies also upon uncertainties. The plainest account of it, I think, is this, which none of them take notice of; that the water now ceasing at the same time that Miriam died, Moses was very sad both for her death, and, perhaps, for the ceasing of the water; and being unexpectedly assaulted by the people, who ought to have had a greater reverence for him, in a time of mourning especially, it was the occasion of a greater commotion of anger and indignation than was usually in him: which gave him such a disturbance in his mind, and so disordered his thoughts, that when God bade him take his rod, and go and speak to the rock, he fell into some doubt, whether God would grant them the favour he had done before; either, because they were so wretched a people, that it was not fit God should do any thing for them; or because he thought, perhaps, water might be otherways procured for them. And because of this doubting, I suppose, it might be, that upon the first striking of the rock no water came forth (God also, perhaps, so ordering it, that he might try him); and hereupon his diffidence increased into unbelief, and a settled persuasion they should have no water. His anger also at such a rebellious generation, it is likely, made him the more distrustful, that God would do nothing for them. For both these are mentioned by the Divine writers that touch upon this history, that he did not believe; and that his spirit was so provoked, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips, (Psal. cvi. 32, 33.) which was when he spake those words, ver. 10. Must we fetch you water out of this rock? i. e. is that a likely matter? They being words of the same sort with those of Sarah, Gen. xviii. 13. Shall I of a surety have a child, who am old? that is, I cannot believe it. And when he saw the water did not come out at the first stroke, he might be so rash as to say, Now it is plain God will give you none, but let you perish: or words to that effect.

I know nothing more probable than this; unless the reader likes the opinion of Joseph Albo better, which is the ninth opinion mentioned by Abarbinel. That Moses and Aaron having had such long experience of God's goodness to this people, and of his readiness to help them, ought not to have gone and made their complaints to God about the want of water, (ver. 6.) but immediately, of themselves, gone to the rock (being confident of God's power and mercy, which had never failed them), and called for water to come out of it. For now the tabernacle was built, and they had God dwelling among them (which they had not when he smote the rock at first), which ought to have bred in them the highest assurance that God would supply them. Dr. Lightfoot hath another conjecture (which I shall propound, that the reader may judge which is most likely), that Moses and Aaron began to distrust God's promise of entering into the promised land, at the end of forty years; imagining, that, if they brought water again out of the rock, it must follow them as long as the other had done. For this he makes the sense of their words, "What, ye rebels! must we bring water out of a rock, as we did at Horeb? Are all our hopes and expectations of getting out of the wilderness come to this? We never fetched you water out of a rock but once; and that was because ye were to stay a long time in the wilderness, &c. Now that is gone, must we fetch water out of another rock? O ye rebels, have ye brought it to this pass by your murmurings, that we must have a new stay in the wilderness? Are we to begin our abode here again, when we thought we had been at the end of our travels? At this rate we shall never get out." Whereupon he presently smote the rock twice in a fume; whereas God bade him only speak to it, (ver. 8.)

To sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel.] i. e. Openly to assert me to be the Holy One of Israel, faithful to my promises (as well as infinite in power), of which they had given the Israelites occasion to doubt, by declaring some distrust of what God said to them, (ver. 8.) For these words plainly shew that their sin did not consist only in an inward diffidence, but in such outward expressions of it in their anger and impatience, as might be apt to breed unbelief in the Israelites; who were already too prone thereunto. And it is no improbable conjecture of a Jewish doctor (in his book of the Death of Moses), that the Divine Glory not appearing now upon this rock, as it did at Horeb, (Exod. xvii. 6.) which perhaps they expected; it gave some occasion to their unbelief: which, he thinks, was not so great a sin in itself, as to have deserved the following punishment, had not God, in passing this sentence, had a respect to the excellency and dignity of their persons; in whom a fault of this nature was far more grievous than in an ordinary man.

Therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them.] They brought them into the land of Sihon, and of Og; but not into Canaan, which was properly the land promised to them.

Ver. 13. This is the water of Meribah.] Called Meribah-kadesh, Deut. xxxii. 51. to distinguish it from that Meribah mentioned Exod. xvii. 7. where the Israelites are guilty of the same crime.

Because the children of Israel strove with the Lord.] Expostulated with him most undutifully, and accused him of unkindness to them, (ver. 3, 4.)

And he was sanctified in them.] The Hebrew doctors differ very much in their opinions about this also, whether he was sanctified in the waters, or in the people of Israel, or in Moses and Aaron. Some fancy it is meant of the waters; viz. that God did himself great honour in bringing waters again out of a rock: and therefore the name of the place was called Kadesh, from his being sanctified there. Thus Chaskuni. But it seems to have been called so before this, being a place well known to the Edomites, (ver. 16.) The common opinion is, that he speaks of Moses and Aaron: for God's name, saith R. Solomon, is much revered when he doth not spare even his holy ones, (Lev. x. 3.) But Nachmanides expounds it of the Israelites, before whose face (as he expounds sanctified in them) God's power, and faithfulness, and goodness appeared: and who alone are mentioned in this verse; not Moses and Aaron. But all three opinions in the issue concur in this one, that God made his power, &c. appear in the eyes of all the Israelites, by bringing water out of a rock; and at the same time demonstrated his holiness and impartial justice in punishing his greatest friends for their unbelief.

Ver. 14. And Moses sent messengers.] By God's order, as his words seem to import, in Deut. ii. 2—4.

From Kadesh.] On the confines of the king of Edom's country.

Unto the king of Edom.] When the Israelites came out of Egypt, Moses speaks of Edom as governed by dukes, (Exod. xv. 87.) for the successors of Esau at first had no higher title, (Gen. xxxvi. 15, &c.) Not long after, it seems, their posterity became kings; and now (nine-and-thirty years after the Israelites' coming out of Egypt) they were still under kingly government. And this king, to whom Moses now sends messengers, the great primate of Ireland takes to have been Hadar, the last of those that Moses mentions Gen. xxxvi. 39. who, for his inhumanity to the children of Israel, was shortly after punished with death; and the kingdom turned again into the government by dukes. For Moses (as he thinks) writing the book of Genesis in the latter end of his life (or then adding what was necessary to what he had written before), reckons immediately after Hadar several dukes reigning all at one time, in several parts of the country which they had shared among them. (See Usser. Chronolog. Sacra, cap. 11.)

Thus saith thy brother Israel.] In the language of those times, all that were near of kin called one another brethren: and these two nations descended from two twin-brothers.

Thou knowest.] For they could not but have received intelligence before this time of such public things.

All the travel that hath befallen us.] How we, and our fathers before us, have travelled from place to place, without any certain habitation. (See Psal. cv. 13.)

Ver. 15. How our fathers.] After several removals from one part of Canaan to another.

Went down into Egypt.] Which was so public a thing (they being invited by Pharaoh, who sent carriages for them), that the Edomites could not be ignorant of it.

And we have dwelt in Egypt a long time.] See Exod. xii. 40, 41. and what I have observed there.

And the Egyptians vexed us and our fathers.] See Exod. i. 11—13, &c.

Ver. 16. And when we cried unto the Lord, he heard our voice.] See Exod. ii. 23—25. iii. 7, 8.

And sent an angel.] See Exod. iii. 2, &c. Maimonides here by angel understands Moses himself; for the prophets are sometimes called angels, i. e. messengers sent from God, (Judg. ii. 1.) This he asserts in the first part, and more than once in the second part, of More Nevochim. But it is very unreasonable to think, that Moses would thus magnify himself to the king of Edom, who understood not such language; and could not but be the more moved to hearken to his embassy, if he believed the Israelites were under the conduct of a heavenly minister, who, as other Jews think, was Michael, the prince of the heavenly host, whom they commonly understand by the angel here mentioned. But many great men, particularly Masius, think this is short of the truth, unless we understand by Michael, the eternal Son of God, who was, as he speaks, the perpetual prince and director of the people of God. For though he was then properly made the messenger of the Father, when he took on him our flesh, and dwelt here among us, yet from the beginning it was his constant care to reconcile men to God, and preserve religion among them. So that he might be called the angel of God before he became a man, because God the Father by him communicated with men about all things necessary for their good. And the Jews seem to have had some obscure notion of this: for what else could Moses Gerundensis mean, when he saith, the angel whom Moses saw in the bush was the same whom Jacob calls the God of Bethel, and whom he calls the angel Redeemer? of whom Moses, he saith, speaks in this place, and in Deut. vi. 12. The Lord brought us out of Egypt. Certain it is, that thus the ancient Christians understood such places, taking the angel here spoken of to be the eternal Logos, or Word, as St. John calls the eternal Son of God: whose sense no man, I think, hath better explained than our Mr. Thorndike; who, though he confesses it to be plain by the Scriptures, that it was always an angel that appeared under the Old Testament, who is sometimes called by the proper name of God (Jehovah), yet this is no prejudice to what the fathers of the church teach, concerning the appearing of the eternal Word; who was that Lord who then assumed some angelical nature, wherein he might appear, to deal with men for a short time; after which he dismissed it, when he had done that business for which he assumed it.

And hath brought us forth out of Egypt.] See Exod. xiii. 22. xiv. 19.

And, behold, we are in Kadesh.] Near to Kadesh; for it is not likely they were admitted into the city itself, which gave its name to the adjacent country.

A city.] Or town; for it doth not seem to have been a walled place.

In the uttermost of thy borders.] In the confines of the king of Edom's country; and belonging, it is likely, to his dominion.

Ver. 17. Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country.] In our way to the land of Canaan; which God hath promised to give us.

We will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards.] They engaged not to turn aside, as they went along, into any private man's grounds. (See chap. xxi. 22.)

Neither will we drink of the water of the wells.] Which any private person had digged for his own use; but only of the rivers, which are common to all creatures.

We will go by the king's highway.] Keep in the common road, which is made for all passengers, by the king's allowance.

We will not turn to the right hand or to the left.] Out of the road, but go straight on.

Until we have passed thy borders.] Got to the other side of the country of Edom.

Ver. 18. And Edom said unto him.] This sounds as if the whole country had joined in the following answer.

Thou shalt not pass by me.] Go through our country, (ver. 20.)

Lest I come out against thee with the sword.] The king bids them not attempt it, for he would oppose their passage with all his forces. He was afraid, no doubt, lest they should seize his country, or spoil it, and therefore would not trust their declarations which they made to the contrary.

Ver. 19. And the children of Israel.] Who were sent upon this message, (ver. 14.) Or else some new ambassadors, whom Moses dispatched with new entreaties after he understood his denial.

Said unto him.] Gave him new assurances of their honest intentions.

We will go by the highway.] Believe us, we will not step out of the common road.

And if I and my cattle drink of thy water.] Out of the wells beforementioned, (ver. 17.) which private men had digged, and therefore had a propriety in them.

Then will I pay for it.] For water was commonly sold in those dry countries, where it was very scarce.

I will only, without doing any thing else.] The Hebrew words ein dabar (which we translate, without doing any thing else), literally signify in our language, it is no word, i. e. not mere fair promises, but we will perform what we say.

Go through on my feet.] Go through, as fast as we can travel on foot.

Ver. 20. And he said, Thou shalt not go through.] He persisted in his resolution; and would not rely on their most solemn asseverations. Yet he consented (as appears by Deut. ii. 28, 29.) to furnish them with necessary provisions, both of meat and drink, for their money.

And Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand.] For fear they should press into his country, he raised a great and powerful army to oppose them; and shewed himself ready to fight them if they moved that way.

Ver. 21. Thus Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border.] Which Grotius censures in his second book De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 2. sect. 13. as contrary to the law of nations; by which the highways, as well as the sea and the rivers of all countries, ought to be free for all that have a mind to pass through them upon just occasions. And he gives many examples of such permission out of heathen story; and therefore looks upon the denial of this as just ground of war with Sihon and Og (mentioned in the next chapter, where I shall consider it), as it might have been with Edom and Moab, had not God prohibited it. Nor doth the fear, he thinks, which the Edomites, it is likely, had of letting such a vast number of people pass through their country, alter the case; for no man's fear is to take away another man's right: and there might have been means contrived to remove this fear, by letting them pass through in small companies at a time, or unarmed. He had better have said, in my opinion, by giving hostages on both sides for the performance of conditions: for it might have put the Israelites in as great fear to have gone through in small parties, or if they should have disarmed themselves. But, when all is said, it seems not clear that all men have such a right, as that great man thinks they may claim. For no man can challenge a passage through a private man's ground without his leave; and every prince hath the same dominion in all his territories that a private man hath in his land. There are many examples also, as Gronovius hath observed, of countries which have suffered extremely by granting this liberty (which shew that princes have reason to deny it for their people's security), and the examples of those who have granted it, are examples of fact rather than of right; and of such as were not in a condition to refuse what was demanded. (See Selden's Mare Clausum, lib. i. cap. 20.)

Wherefore Israel turned away from him.] By God's command; who ordered them also to buy what they wanted of the Edomites, (Deut. ii. 5, 6.) For they stayed some time in Kadesh, by their consent, before they removed; that they might furnish themselves, as they offered, with necessaries, (Judges xi. 17.)

Ver. 22. And the children of Israel, even the whole congregation.] For they might not divide into several bodies, lying in several places; but all march together, when the cloud moved, in the order God appointed, (chap. x. 13, 14, &c.)

Journeyed from Kadesh, and came to Mount Hor.] Another place upon the edge of the Edomites' country, chap. xxxiii. 37. where they pitched in a part of that mountain which was called Mosera, (Deut. x. 6.) Whether Mount Hor gave the name of Hori to him, who was the ancestor of Seir, and the first planter of the country, which was afterward conquered by Esau, (Gen. xxxvi. 20. 30. Deut. ii. 12.) or had its name from him, cannot be determined. But Hori, we are sure, was the first possessor (of whom there is any memory) of this mountain Hor, which was afterward called Seir (from one descended from him), and afterward Edom.

Ver. 23. And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in Mount Hor.] At the foot of the mount, as appears from ver. 25.

By the coast of the land of Edom.] See chap. xxxiii. 37.

Ver. 24. Aaron shall be gathered unto his people.] Shall die, (ver. 26.)

For he shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel.] See ver. 12. A manifest token that the earthly Canaan was not the utmost felicity at which God's promises aimed; because the best men among them were shut out of it.

Because ye rebelled against my word at the water of Meribah.] By this word rebelled, it appears there was something of obstinacy in their unbelief, mentioned ver. 12.

Ver. 25. Take Aaron and Eleazar his son.] Speak to them in my name. For it is expressly said, (chap. xxxiii. 38.) that they went up "at the commandment of the Lord."

And bring them up unto Mount Hor.] This shews that they pitched their tents at the bottom of it, in a place called Mosera. See Deut. x. 6. where this seems also to have been the name of the whole hill, as well as Hor.

Ver. 26. And strip Aaron of his garments.] i. e. Of his priestly robes (as Josephus rightly expounds it, τὴν ἀρχιερατικὴν στολὴν), mentioned Exod. xxviii. 2, 3, &c. wherewith he was clothed when he was anointed to the office of high-priest, (Lev. viii. 7—9.) which he put on, I suppose, in the camp, and went up in them to Mount Hor, that he might die gloriously; not in his robes, but immediately after he put them off to be put upon his son. For this stripping him of his robes was in effect the divesting Aaron of his office, that it might be conferred upon his son; which was done as follows.

And put them upon Eleazar his son.] Which was the investing him with the office of high-priest, in which he now succeeded in his father's stead, and was by this ceremony admitted to it. The Talmudists say the manner was, first to put on the breeches, then the coat; which being bound about with the girdle, then the robe, upon which was the ephod, and then the mitre and golden crown. (See Selden de Succession. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 8.)

And Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and die there.] This was said before, in short, ver. 24. but now the time of his death is expressly declared (immediately after he laid down his office, and had the satisfaction to see his son inaugurated in his room), and the place of it, upon Mount Hor. Of this phrase, gathered to his people, see Gen. xxv. 8. 17.

Ver. 27. And Moses did as the Lord commanded: and they went up into Mount Hor, in the sight of all the congregation.] That they might all be witnesses of the succession of Eleazar to the office of his father.

Ver. 28. And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son.] This Moses did as the minister of God; who now translated the priesthood to another.

And Aaron died there in the top of the mount.] And was buried also there, (Deut. x. 6.) For great and heroic persons were in ancient days usually buried in high places. So Joshua was, (chap. xxiv. 30. 33.) and Eleazar, (Judges ii. 9.) and Cadmus and Harmonia; who lived near the time of Joshua, as Bochartus observes in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 23.

And Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.] After they had seen him laid in his grave by those that attended them.

This fell out in the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt, on the first day of the fifth month; when Aaron was a hundred and three-and-twenty years old, as we read chap. xxxiii. 38, 39. in the new moon of the month, which the Athenians called Hecatombæon, the Macedonians Lous, and the Hebrews called Sabba, as Josephus glosses. But that last word should be Ab, not Sabba, as Jacobus Capellus observes, (in his Histor. Sacra et Exotica ad An. 2542.) which answers, he thinks, to the nineteenth of our July. And so the Hebrews say in Seder Olam, "Aaron died on the first day of the month Ab;" upon which there is a fast in their rituals, in memory of it.

Ver. 29. And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead.] i. e. Understood (as the word see is used Gen. xlii. 1.) that God had taken him out of the world, as Moses and Eleazar told them; who also came down from the mount with him.

They mourned for Aaron thirty days.] Till the end of the month. For so long their mourning seems, in those days, to have been continued for great persons, (as it was for Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 8.) though a week sufficed for private persons.

Even all the house of Israel.] Both men and women.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. AND when king Arad the Canaanite.] In the Hebrew the words are thus placed, when the Canaanite king Arad: and so they are in the LXX. and the Vulgar: and Arad may as well signify a place as a person: nay, there seems more reason to translate the words thus, the Canaanitish king of Arad: because there was such a city in Canaan, mentioned Josh. xii. 14. and Judges i. 16. One of the sons of Canaan being called Arad, (as both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate the Hebrew word Arvad, Gen. x. 18.) who it is likely gave his name to this part of the country; the chief city of which was also called after him.

Which dwelt in the south.] In the south part of the land of Canaan, towards the eastern angle of it, near the Dead Sea. (See chap. xxxiii. 40.)

Heard that Israel came by the way of the spies.] Which were sent by the king Arad (as many suppose) to bring him intelligence which way the Israelites marched. For it being eight-and-thirty years since the spies sent by Moses went that way; or rather, they going so secretly, that it was not known which way they went, it is thought not probable that Moses speaks of them in this place. But there is no necessity of taking the Hebrew word Atharim to signify spies; but it may as well be the name of a place, as the LXX. understood it, by whom it is translated Ἀθαρείμ. And, if the situation would agree to it, one might probably conjecture the place was so called from the spies that went from thence by Moses's order to survey the country. For that was a thing so memorable, that, as it could not well slip out of the minds of the people of Canaan, so they found, I make no question, after they were gone, which way they came into their country (though for the present they passed unobserved), and ever after called it the way of the spies.

Then he fought against Israel.] He marched out of his country with an army; and fell upon the Israelites as they passed that way.

And took some of them prisoners.] He attacked, it is likely, at first, only the skirts of their camp, where he surprised some of them, and carried them away captive, as the words are in the Hebrew.

Ver. 2. And Israel vowed a vow unto the Lord.] It was resolved, it seems, that they should engage them; but the Israelites being afraid of them, because they were unexperienced in war, implore the Divine aid by this solemn vow.

If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand.] Give us the victory over them.

Then will I utterly destroy their cities.] They vow to reserve none of the spoil to their own use; but devote it all to destruction. For such was the nature of this vow called cherem. (See Lev. xxvii. 29.)

Ver. 3. And the Lord hearkened to the voice of Israel.] He approved their vow.

And delivered up the Canaanites.] The Israelites vanquished their army.

And they utterly destroyed them and their cities.] Utterly devoted them to destruction, according to their vow. For they did not now actually destroy them, they remaining when Joshua came to Canaan, who executed this cherem, or curse, upon them, (chap. xii. 14.) which, if it had been executed now, they must have entered into the land of Canaan at this time; from whence we cannot imagine they would have returned, to march further about before they got into it; but have gone on to prosecute their victory, by subduing the country, as they had begun.

And he called the name of the place Hormah.] From the cherem (or herem as some write it) which was pronounced against it; which, when it was put in execution, this name became more proper to it, (Judges i. 17.)

Ver. 4. And they journeyed from Mount Hor.] Where their camp was pitched, when the king of Arad assaulted them; and whither they returned, after they had overthrown him.

By the way of the Red Sea.] Towards Ezion-Gaber, as we read Deut. ii. 8.

To compass the land of Edom.] Which extended itself unto the Red Sea.

And the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way.] The word we translate discouraged, signifies two things; to faint, and to breathe short, through the anguish and bitterness of one's spirit, (Exod. vi. 9.) And secondly, to be angry at, or at least impatient, by reason of some trouble. And so it may be best taken in this place, (as Buxtorfius observes, in Histor. Serp. Æneï, cap. 1.) not simply for their being tired, with a tedious, long, and troublesome march; but that accompanied with no small indignation and wrath: which did not only burn within, but broke out into words of great impatience, as appears by what follows. Whence the Hebrew words ketzar-ruach (short of spirit) signify angry, or hasty, Prov. xiv. 29. and in Job xxi. 4. we translate it troubled, and Zach. xi. 8. loathed; where it had better been translated, I was angry with them. Now that which made the people thus fret, or faint (if we will have it so interpreted), was the way wherein they were now led, which was about the land of Edom. For when they were come towards Canaan, in the middle of the fortieth year (at the end of which they were promised to enter in and possess it), they are carried back again towards the Red Sea, whither God had sent their fathers after they had brought a false report upon the land, (chap. xiv. 25.) This made them think, perhaps, that they should never come to Canaan; or, at least, it was tedious to march such a great way about, after they had been kept so long from their inheritance, and were lately in such hopes of it, when Moses demanded a passage into it through the country of Edom.

Ver. 5. And the people spake against God and against Moses.] This shews they were in a very great rage, which made them so forgetful of their duty, as to charge God himself with ill conduct: whereas their fathers were wont only to murmur against Moses and Aaron.

Wherefore have ye brought us out of Egypt.] The Hebrew word heelithunu (made us to go up) is a strange word (as Dr. Lightfoot calls it) in this language; declaring the great fume they were in when they uttered it.

To die in the wilderness.] As if they had said (so Abarbinel explains it), What can we expect or hope for but death from this long stay in the wilderness?

For there is no bread, neither is there any water.] For we want the most necessary things for the support of life (as he also well explains it), which they spake in a rage; for they had both, by a miraculous providence over them. They themselves immediately confess they had manna; and that they lately received water out of a rock. But nothing would satisfy, unless they were brought to a country where bread and water were to be had without a miracle. For the meaning of their complaint was, that God did not deal with them as he did with other people, who (to speak in our phrase) do not live from hand to mouth, as the Israelites did, who had bread given them only to suffice for one day, and no more; and that such bread as they despised. It is likely, also, they began now to want water again, which did not follow them, as formerly, out of the rock: and what they had in their vessels, perhaps, was near spent.

And our soul loatheth this light bread.] As for the bread God bestowed upon them, they were so far from being satisfied with it, that they loathe it, and call it by the scornful name of light bread. So we translate the Hebrew word hakkilkel: which, being the doubling of a word which signifies light or vile in that language, imports as much as very despicable, exceeding vile; or, as the LXX. translate it, very empty; having no substance in it to fill their stomachs. So Abarbinel expounds this passage, We are tired with long journeys, which require more solid bread than this to support us.

Ver. 6. And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people.] So most of the Jews translate this place; taking seraphim for an adjective (as grammarians speak), and consequently rightly translated fiery. But there are those who take it to signify a peculiar sort of serpents; being added to nechashim (serpents) by way of apposition (as they speak), and signifying such serpents as the Greeks call Πρηστῆρες and Καύσωνες, whom Pliny reckons among the sceleratissimi serpentes, most pernicious serpents, (lib. xxiv. cap. 13.) Or, as others will have it, those called Διψάδες, because they made great inflammations in men's bodies, and an unquenchable thirst, being also of a flame colour. But the famous Bochartus hath alleged a great many arguments to prove that they were a sort of serpents, called hydrus, because in winter they lived in fens and marshes; which being dried up in summer they were called chersydrus, because then they lived in dry places, and in the hot season had a most sharp, stinging poison, which, as Nicander saith, made such inflammations as brought upon him that was stung by them, ἄλγεα μυρία, innumerable griefs. See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13. where he shews also they were flying serpents, of which the prophet Isaiah speaks, chap. xix. 29. xxx. 6.; and that now was a hot season, wherein they were wont to be most venomous. For Aaron dying the first day of the fifth month (which answers to the nineteenth of our July), and they mourning for him thirty days; after which followed their encounter with the Canaanites, and then this murmuring, and this punishment; it must fall out in the latter end of August, when the dog-days were going out. (See Vossius de Orig. et Progressu Idolol. lib. iv. cap. 56.)

And they bit the people.] This Aben Ezra and others think was a punishment suitable to their sin, which was evil-speaking against the Lord, by calumniating his providence. For Solomon compares a calumniator to a serpent, which bites if it be not charmed, (Eccles. x. 11.)

It is a strange fancy of Fortunatus Licetus, that Moses here speaks of a disease bred in the body, which in children is called dracunculus, and not of the biting of serpents from without, (lib. de Ortu Spontaneo viventium, cap. 51.) For which there is no ground at all; and, on the contrary, nothing more certain, than that, in Arabia, and Egypt, and other countries of Africa, there are such serpents as are here described. Yet Bartholinus seems to think that this opinion may be defended against Ezekiel de Castro, who confuted it. (See Epistol. Medic. Centur. i. Epist. 32.)

And much people of Israel died.] The whole wilderness, through which the Israelites marched so many years, was full of fiery serpents and scorpions, as Moses's words import, Deut. viii. 15. which makes it the more wonderful, that we never hear of their being bitten and killed by them until now. But it is to be considered, that they were protected by the cloud from this, and from all other dangers (as the Hebrews well observe), which now withdrew its shadow from them, and let in the serpents upon them. Or rather (as Moses here expressly saith), God, who had hitherto kept them off, now sent them, and, perhaps, brought them from remote parts of the wilderness to infest the whole congregation.

Ver. 7. Wherefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned.] It doth not appear whether they were immediately sensible of their sin, and confessed it, upon the biting of the serpents and the direful effects of it, or stayed till there had been a great mortality among them. It is likely they instantly made their addresses to him; but before a remedy was found out, by erecting the brazen serpent, many of them perished.

For we have sinned against the Lord, and against thee.] They make a particular acknowledgment of their guilt, as a token of the sincerity of their repentance.

Pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents from us.] In the Hebrew the words are, take away the serpent, in the singular number; about which the Jews make a great many curious observations, as if there was one evil angel that governed them all. And if there be any truth in this observation, we Christians cannot but think these words point to the old serpent, the devil, who lost his sting by the lifting up of Christ on the cross; as the brazen serpent, it here follows, was lifted up for the cure of the biting of those serpents. But the simple truth is, that in this language the singular number is often used collectively for the plural. As in Exod. viii. 6. "The frog came up and covered the land," i. e. a vast multitude of frogs. And so Moses speaks in the place just now named, Deut. viii. 15. where he calls this wilderness wherein they travelled, a place of a fiery serpent and scorpion; i. e. saith Jonathan, full of such creatures.

And Moses prayed for the people.] Here R. Bechai and others observe the great meekness and charity of Moses, and thence draw this instruction: that he of whom any one asks pardon for an offence, ought not to be hard-hearted, but ready to forgive. Thus Abraham prayed for Abimelech, Gen. xx. 17. Job for his friends, chap. xlii. 10. It would be a sin to do otherwise, (1 Sam. xii. 19, 20. 23.)

Ver. 8. And the Lord said unto Moses.] In answer to his prayer.

Make thee a fiery serpent.] The figure of one of those serpents which bite the people. Abarbinel thinks that upon Moses's prayer the serpents were removed; but still there remained many among the people sorely afflicted by the venomous effects of their biting, for whose cure God graciously gave this direction.

It is something strange, that any learned Christian should so much admire the Egyptian learning as not to forbear the mention of their incantations of serpents, when they speak of this relation which Moses makes concerning the brazen serpent which God ordered him to set up. Yet Sir John Marsham (in his Chronicon, sect. 9.) when he comes to treat of this station of the Israelites at Tsalmona, hath a long discourse to shew how famous the Egyptians and other nations were in this sort of magic; and thus concludes it, that Moses, putting this brazen serpent upon a perch, "non tam serpentes igneos incantabat ne nocerent, quam eorum venenum extinguebat," did not so much charm these serpents that they should not hurt, as extinguish their venom. This seems to me a scurvy intimation, that Moses had their practices in his mind, but went beyond them. He should have said, Moses abominated their wicked arts (if they had any such in those days), and directed the Israelites to look up to God for healing. So the Jews themselves, particularly Aben Ezra, who takes notice that some superstitious people fancied that this serpent was a talisman, made to receive I know not what influence from the stars. But God forbid, saith he, God forbid we should have any such thought! this was made by the Divine order; the reason of which let us not scrupulously search: they thought, that is, there was something extraordinary init, as Jonathan plainly declares in his paraphrase of the last words of this verse: he shall be healed if he direct his heart to the name of the Word of the Lord: where no Christian can forbear to think of our blessed Saviour, the eternal Word, who was prefigured (as I shall shew in the following verse) by the erecting of this serpent here mentioned upon a pole, that all might look upon him and live.

And set it upon a pole.] So high, that every one in the camp might see it. For the word signifies such a pole as made their ensign or banner, to which all the army was to resort. Concerning this word nes, see Bootius, lib. ii. cap. 4.

And it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it.] The Jews generally have so much understanding as to say, that the mere beholding of it did not cure them; but that they were to look up to God (as the Scripture speaks) when they beheld it, and expect a cure from him. So the author of the Book of Wisdom, chap. xvi. 7. "He that turned himself towards it, was not healed by the thing which he saw, but by thee, that art the Saviour of all." And therefore he calls it, in the foregoing verse, "A sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of the law."

Shall live.] Be cured, and restored to perfect health: which the Jews think the greater miracle, because naturally it would have made the inflammation greater. So Nachmanides: This rather would have increased the disease; for they who are bit by venomous beasts (according to the prescriptions of physicians), must not see the image of the beast by whom they are bitten: but this was commanded by God, that the Israelites might know both their disease and their medicine came from God, who made that whose aspect was hurtful to be the means of their cure.

Ver. 9. And Moses made a serpent.] Whence this place seems to have been called Zalmonah, (chap. xxxiii. 41.) which imports an image, similitude, or resemblance of a thing represented by it. And another place thereabouts, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, called Maaleh Akrabbim, seems to have had its name from the same thing, it signifying the going up of scorpions, Josh. xv. 3.

Of brass.] Polished, that it might resemble a serpent of a flaming colour; and being very glittering, it might be the better seen far and near. So several of the Hebrew writers, particularly Nachmanides and Abarbinel, who observe, that God did not bid him make a serpent of brass, but only a saraph, (ver. 8.) i. e. a resemblance of a flaming serpent: which could not be made so well of any other metal as of brass; those saraphs (which we render fiery serpents) being fiery red, like copper or brass: of which there was good store not far off from this place; for the next station to Zalmonah, where they now were, was Punon, or Pinon, as Moses tells us, chap. xxxiii. 42. a place belonging to the Edomites, (who had an ancient duke of this name, Gen. xxxvi. 41. 1 Chron. i. 52.) famous for mines of brass, as Bochartus shews out of several of the fathers; who speak of Χαλκοῦν μέταλλα ἐν φαινοῖ. From whence Moses, perhaps, had this brass, (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13.)

And put it upon a pole.] As he had been directed in the foregoing verse.

And it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man.] Which was not present death, but made an inflammation, and such ulcers (as some conceive) as were incurable.

When he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.] Though naturalists say, the sight of brass was hurtful to those who were bitten, yet hence they received their cure: as the sight of Christ crucified naturally filled his crucifiers only with anguish, when they beheld him whom they had pierced, and were convinced he was their Messiah; but by the grace of God, became their only salvation through faith in him.

The Hebrews cannot but acknowledge a mystery in this brazen serpent, as Moses Gerundensis calls it; which our Lord Christ himself hath explained in his discourse with Nicodemus: (John iii. 14.) "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish," &c. Where he doth not compare himself to the brazen serpent (for what likeness can there be found between the serpent and the Seed of the woman; or how should light be foreshadowed by darkness? as Dr. Jackson speaks), but he compares the lifting up of this serpent on the pole, with his lifting up, or crucifixion on the cross; for so he himself expresses his death, and the manner of it, (John xii. 32.) "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." And their looking on the serpent in the wilderness, as evidently represented men's believing on Christ; and their cure, the powerful virtue of Christ's death to preserve all those that believe on him from perishing (as he speaks in the place named before), and procure for them everlasting life. For by his death, our Saviour "destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil," (as the apostle's words are, Heb. ii. 14.) which was notably represented in this brazen serpent put upon a pole; which was not a figure of Christ, but of the old serpent himself (the devil), as wounded, bruised, and dead, by the lifting up of Christ upon the cross; where he entirely disarmed him of all his power to hurt us.

I cannot tell whence Justin Martyr concluded this brazen serpent to have been made in the form of a cross, as he saith it was in his Second Apology; unless we conceive it to have been made with wings at the bottom of its neck, which might give it that figure. But his observation in his book against Trypho (p. 322. 338.) seems very considerable; that there must be some mystery in it, that God, who forbade all manner of images, should now command one to be made: of which, he saith, one of the Jews confessed he could never hear a reason from their doctors; who cannot understand it, till they believe in Christ and him crucified; whose victory over the devil, by his cross and passion, was herein most lively represented. I shall only add, that this lifting up the brazen serpent, was a thing so public and so well known to all neighbouring nations, that the fame of it, in all likelihood, went into India; where they still set up an idol in form of a writhed serpent, upon a perch six or seven feet high, which they solemnly worship; and carrying it along with them in their travels, set it up every morning for the company to pay their adorations to it. So Taverneir relates in his travels to that country, p. 28. And see the present Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's excellent treatise of Idolatry, p. 351, &c. with Huetius's Demonstr. Evang. p. 96. and his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, (cap. 12. n. 25.) where he shews the talismans, in all likelihood, were an imitation of this serpent: of which the Jews were so fond, that they burnt incense to it in the days of Hezekiah, and had done so we know not how long, (see 2 Kings xviii. 4.) Which may make it the less wonder, that the poor Indians should worship a serpent upon a pole, when they that should have understood better committed such a foul idolatry, as to do Divine honour to the figure of the greatest enemy of God and of mankind.

Ver. 10. And the children of Israel set forward.] After they had been at two other places; which Moses now omits for brevity's sake, because he intended hereafter to give an exact account of all their removals at one view; which he doth in the thirty-third chapter of this book: (see ver. 41, 42.)

And pitched in Oboth.] Where, it is probable, they found water; of the want of which they complained: (see chap. xx. 2.)

Ver. 11. And they journeyed from Oboth, and pitched in Jie-Abarim.] Not that Mount Abarim where Moses died, (chap. xxvii. 12.) but another place in the confines of Moab, as it here follows: (see what I have observed, chap. xx. 2.)

In the wilderness which is before Moab.] Called the wilderness of Moab, Deut. ii. 8.

Towards the sun-rising.] On the east part of it, as Jephthah observes, a great many years after this, that they came by the east side of the land of Moab, (Judges xi. 18.)

Ver. 12. And from thence they removed.] As they were about to remove from this last place, they received a command from God not to meddle with the country of Moab, (Deut. ii. 9.) which is the reason (as Abarbinel observes) that Moses here sets down briefly, whence and whither they went, and where they pitched; that it might appear they did not transgress that command.

And pitched in the valley of Zared.] Or, as some translate it, in Nachal-Zared; which is called Dibon-Gad, chap. xxxiii. 45. For this place had two names (as the same author observes), and it was just eight-and-thirty years since the spies went up to survey the country, from Kadesh-barnea till their passing this brook, as we translate it, Deut. ii. 14. But I take Dibon-Gad rather to have been a place which lay upon the brook Zered.

Ver. 13. And from thence they removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon.] The Hebrew word meheber may be translated on this side, or on the other side. And some think they were now on this side of the river, and not yet gone over it. Nor did they immediately come hither from their former station; but first to Almon-Diblathaim, (chap. xxxiii. 46.) which is also called Beth-Diblathaim in the wilderness of Moab, Jerem. xlviii. 22. and Diblah, Ezek. vi. 13. And then, passing by Ar, in the confines of Moab, and approaching to the country of the children of Ammon, God commanded them not to invade the Ammonites, being descendants from Lot, as well as the Moabites, (Deut. ii. 18, 19. 37.) but to pass over the river Arnon, (Deut. ii. 24.) to that side of it which belonged to the Amorites. For this river, at that time, divided the Moabites from the Amorites, as it here follows.

Which is in the wilderness, that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites.] Runs by the wilderness of Kedemoth, unto which the Amorites extended their dominion, (Deut. ii. 26.)

For Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.] This river flowed from the mountains of Arabia, where it had its rise, and fell into the Dead Sea, (as Josephus saith, lib. iv. Antiq.) ὁρίζων τήν τε Μωαβίτην καὶ Ἀμορίτιν, bounding the country of the Moabites, and of the Amorites; the country of Moab lying on one side of it, and that of the Amorites on the other. For though the Moabites formerly possessed the country on both sides of Arnon, as far as Heshbon, yet the Amorites had driven them out of that part of it which lay next to them; and made the river the boundary of their two kingdoms, (ver. 26, 27.) This Moses recites the more exactly, that it might appear the Israelites invaded none of the Moabites' possessions, but what was now possessed by the Amorites: by which Jephthah defended the right of the children of Israel, in future times, against the Ammonites, who pretended this country belonged to them, (Judges xi. 13—15, &c.)

Ver. 14. Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord.] A proof of this Moses thought good to allege out of an authentic record in those countries, containing the history of all the wars that had been in those parts; which are here called the wars of the Lord, because he is the great Governor of the world (as Abarbinel interprets it), from whom and by whom are all things, who putteth down one, and setteth up another (as the Psalmist speaks) at his good pleasure. This book, he thinks, was written by some of the wise men of those nations (and so thinks Nachmanides), who, looking upon this conquest made by Sihon as a very memorable thing, put it down in their Annals; which, after the way of those countries, were written, he thinks, in a poetical manner. There are those who are of opinion, that this book was written by Moses himself; who left in it directions to Joshua how to proceed in the wars of the Lord, when he conquered Canaan. So Dr. Lightfoot conjectures; and Bonfrerius doth not much differ from him. But I take the former account to be the more probable, that Moses justifies what he writes concerning this conquest out of their own books; which he quotes just as St. Paul, in the New Testament, doth one of the Greek poets.

What he did in the Red Sea.] These are the words of the book, out of which he quotes a small fragment: and the marginal translation of them is most proper, Vaheb in Supheh, only the word eth is omitted; which makes the sense to be this, against Vaheb in Supheh; that is, he came (some such word must be understood) against Vaheb (a king of the Moabites), and overthrew him in Supheh, a place in the frontiers of Moab. (See Deut. i. 1.) Others understand by Vaheb the place where Sihon gave the Moabites this blow; which he did by falling upon them on a sudden, with a terrible fury. So Nachmanides understands these words besuphah; he stormed the city, and made a furious assault, when they thought not of it: for Supheh signifies a whirlwind, or stormy tempest, (Isai. v. 28.)

And in the brooks of Arnon.] The same Nachmanides takes the word veeth, which we translate and in, to signify rather and with; and these being still the words of the book beforementioned, the sense is this: In the same manner he smote the brooks or torrents of Arnon; upon which he fell like a tempest, and carried all before him.

Ver. 15. And at the streams of the brooks.] None, I think, hath given a better account of these words than the same Nachman, who by esched hannechalim (which we translate the streams of the brooks), understands either a cliff from whence the torrents flowed (as Aschdod and Happisgah, Deut. iii. 17. are the hills from whence the springs gushed), or the valley through which the torrents ran; where they made a great broad water, which is here called an effusion of torrents, as R. Levi ben Gersom interprets the Hebrew words, esched hannechalim.

That goeth down to the dwelling of Ar.] Which extends itself as far as Ar, a city of Moab, (ver. 28.) R. Levi ben Gersom takes the word Schebet (which we translate dwelling) to signify a place as well as Ar, towards which these torrents bent their course.

And lieth upon the borders of Moab.] Which leaneth or belongeth unto Moab, being in the border of that country.

Thus far are the words of the book of the wars of the Lord: and the meaning of them is, that the king of the Amorites took all these places by a sudden, furious invasion; which Moses therefore punctually recites, to shew that the country of the Moabites now reached no further than Arnon: all the brooks, or torrents, and all the effusions of water as far as Arnon (i. e. all the country about them), being taken from them by the Amorites, in whose possession it now was, and, perhaps, had been a long time. And therefore the Israelites took nothing from the Moabites when they conquered this country (as was said before), nor from the Ammonites neither; part of whose country the Amorites also had got from them, (Deut. iii. 11.) and the Israelites took from the Amorites, when they conquered Sihon and Og; and it fell to the share of the Gadites, (Josh. xiii. 25.)

Ver. 16. And from thence they went to Beer.] A place which took its name from the pit, or well, which was here digged by God's order, as the next words tell us.

That is the well whereof the Lord spake unto Moses.] That is, saith Abarbinel, that place was remarkable for the well that God gave us, of his own accord, without our petition; which he prevented by bidding Moses dig it for us.

Gather the people together, and I will give them water.] Which they now again wanted, being removed from the river Arnon; but did not murmur about it, as they had done formerly: and therefore God most graciously, when he saw their distress, provided it for them.

Ver. 17. Then Israel sang this song.] This extraordinary kindness of God, which prevented their prayers, and gave them water out of his own good pleasure alone (as Abarbinel speaks), transported them with such joy, that it made them express their thankfulness in this song.

Spring up, O well.] As soon as they saw Moses and the princes thrust their staves into the earth, and the water began to bubble up, they said, with a loud voice, Come up, O well; that is, let waters flow abundantly to satisfy us all.

Sing ye unto it.] Or, as it is in the margin, answer unto it. The manner of the Hebrews was anciently to sing their songs of praise alternately, as appears from Exod. xv. 20. And so one company having said, Spring up, O well (which it is likely they repeated often), they called to the rest to answer to them; which they did, I suppose, in the following words.

Ver. 18. The princes.] i. e. The seventy elders, and heads of the tribes.

Digged the well.] Very easily, only turning up the earth with their staves.

The nobles of the people digged it.] The other side of the choir, perhaps, took up the song again, repeating the sense of what the former company had said.

By the direction of the lawgiver.] Or, together with the lawgiver, who began the work, and whose example they followed.

With their staves.] With no more labour but only thrusting their staves into the ground and turning up the earth. For, as R. Levi ben Gersom takes it, the ground here being sandy and very soft, was easily penetrated, though they were not likely to find water in it. But they believing Moses, and following his direction, God sent it copiously unto them; and with no more pains than a scribe takes when he writes with his pen. For so he translates the

Hebrew word mechokek, (which we render lawgiver) a scribe, or doctor of the law.

And from the wilderness.] Mentioned ver. 13.

They went to Mattanah.] This and the place following are otherwise named in the thirty-third chapter, as the forenamed ben Gersom understands it. But others think these were no stations (which alone Moses gives an account of in the thirty-third chapter), where the Israelites pitched their tents, but places through which they passed, till they came to the station from whence they sent to Sihon for leave to pass through his country.

Ver. 19. And from Mattanah to Nahael, &c.] This, as well as the place next mentioned in this verse, seems to have been on the borders of Moab.

Ver. 20. And from Bamoth in the valley.] Rather from Bamoth (which signifies a very high place) to the valley. Or, as it may be translated, from Bamoth a valley (that is, there is a valley) in the field of Moab, &c. unto which they came next; for some such thing must be understood.

That is in the country of Moab.] Or near to it.

To the top of Pisgah.] Or, to the beginning (as the Hebrew word rosch may be interpreted) of the high Mount Pisgah; that is, they pitched at the foot of it, where the mountain began: which mountain was a part of the mountains of Abarim, as appears from Deut. xxxii. 49. xxxiv. 1.

Which looks towards Jeshimon.] Or, towards the wilderness. For so R. Levi ben Gersom interprets it; to a land that was shemumah, untilled and desolate, viz. to the wilderness of Kedemoth: where they pitched and settled their camp; and from thence sent messengers to Sihon.

Ver. 21. And Israel sent messengers to Sihon king of the Amorites.] These messengers were sent from the wilderness of Kedemoth, which was in the skirts of his country, (Deut. ii. 26.) or lay just upon it: for there was a city of this name in that country, which was given to Reuben, in the division of the land, (Josh. xiii. 18.)

Ver. 22. Let me pass through thy land.] They do not seem to desire a passage through the midst of his country, but only the extreme parts of it; which would have shortened their journey to the fords of Jordan.

We will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink of the waters of the well, &c.] This is the very same civil message which they sent to Edom, (chap. xx. 17.) By whose example they pressed Sihon to grant them, at least, as much as the Edomites and Moabites had done: (see Deut. ii. 28, 29.)

Ver. 23. And Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass through his borders.] This shews that they asked only to pass through the skirts of his country: (see Deut. ii. 30.)

But Sihon gathered all his people together.] He not only refused to grant their request; but came in a hostile manner, with all the forces he could raise, to oppose their passage over Arnon.

And went out against Israel into the wilderness.] From whence they sent their friendly message to him, ver. 21. which Moses, in Deut. ii. 26. calls, words of peace.

And he came to Jahaz.] A city, it is probable, belonging to the Moabites; whither the Israelites, perhaps, retreated, when Sihon denied them a passage through his country. For Isaiah plainly mentions Jahaz, as a place either in the country of Moab, or near it, (chap. xv. 4.) and Jeremiah, also, calling it Jahazah, (chap. xlviii. 21.)

And fought against Israel.] Who had orders from God, not to decline the battle (as they did with the Edomites and the Moabites), and were assured of victory, (Deut. ii. 31.) For they were Amorites, whose country God promised to Abraham, (Gen. xv. 21.) being part of the Canaanites, whom they were commanded to destroy; for they were descended from one of the sons of Canaan: (Gen. x. 16.) which made this war with them to have a just ground; not because they denied the Israelites a passage through their country, against the right of nations, as Grotius thinks (which was but the occasion, not the ground of the war), but because they were one of the seven nations condemned by God to destruction, (whose land he bestowed upon the Israelites, Josh. iii. 10.) and because Sihon came out armed against them, beyond the bounds of his own dominions; and fell upon them, when they had given him no provocation.

Ver. 24. And Israel smote him with the edge of the sword.] Utterly overthrew his army; and, putting them all to the sword, made themselves masters of his country.

And possessed his land.] For they destroyed all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, (Deut. ii. 33, 34.)

From Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon.] This is a brief description of the extent of Sihon's country; which reached from the river Arnon, the bound of the Moabites' country on the south, (chap. xxii. 36.) unto Jabbok, which was the bound of the Ammonites' country on the north, (Deut. iii. 16. Josh. xii. 2. xiii. 10.) But they meddled with no place that lay upon the river Jabbok, which belonged to the Ammonites; for that God had forbidden, (Deut. ii. 37.) By which Jephthah (as I observed), two hundred and sixty years after this, justified the title of the Israelites to all the country here mentioned; which they took not from the Ammonites, or Moabites, but from the Amorites, who were the owners of it when they conquered it, (Judges xi. 13. 15. 22, 23.) For Sihon had got half of their country, as well as part of the country of Moab, as appears from Deut. iii. 11. and from Josh. xiii. 25. where it is plain, Joshua gave the Gadites half of the country of the children of Ammon, which was now taken from the Amorites, who had dispossessed them. Josephus describes it as lying between three rivers, like an island: for the banks of Arnon were the bounds of this region on the south side; and Jabbok on the north, which running into Jordan lost its name; and the western tract of it was washed by Jordan itself: and on the east part it was surrounded with the mountains of Arabia.

For the border of the children of Ammon was strong.] This is not mentioned here as a reason why the Israelites did not set upon their country, (for they were expressly forbidden to do it, Deut. ii. 19.) but why Sihon conquered none of the Ammonites' country beyond Jabbok (as he did all from Arnon thither), because their frontiers on that side of the country were very strong, by the fortifications, which it is likely they had made upon the river.

Ver. 25. And Israel took all these cities.] All the cities of that country which lay between Arnon and Jabbok; some of which are named, ver. 30.

And Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites.] Having destroyed the former inhabitants, as I noted before, Deut. ii. 34.

In Heshbon.] Even in their royal city.

And in all the villages thereof.] In Hebrew the daughters; as villages and castles are called, which depend upon the metropolis, as daughters on their mother.

Ver. 26. For Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites.] He had made this the seat of his kingdom, after his conquest of this country: which Moses observes (together with what follows), that it might appear to posterity, they invaded no part of the Moabites' territories, or of the Ammonites', but what was in the quiet possession of the Amorites, who had taken this country from them, and, perhaps, in a just war, and long enjoyed it.

Who had fought against the former king of Moab, &c.] It is not certain that this Sihon, whom the Israelites now vanquished, had dispossessed the Moabites of this country; but more likely some of his ancestors, who were all called by the name of Sihon (as the kings of Palestine were all called Abimelech, Gen. xx. 2. xxvi. 1. and the kings of Egypt called Pharaoh), who had fought not with the present king of Moab, but with one of his predecessors, and conquered him and his country.

The former king of Moab.] These words are not to be understood as if he fought with the king of Moab who immediately reigned before Balak, but, as I said, with some of his predecessors. So the LXX. τὸ πρότερον, that heretofore was king of Moab: and in the Hebrew the words are literally, the king of Moab, the first; perhaps of the present race.

Ver. 27. Wherefore they that speak in proverbs.] In the Hebrew the words are, wherefore the proverbialists; that is, the poets, whose composures, in those days, were very sententious.

Say.] Have this song in their mouths: which seems to have been composed by some of the Amorites, upon the victory which Sihon got over the Moabites; particularly upon the taking of Heshbon, which, I suppose, he besieged immediately upon the routing of their army. This Moses thought good to insert in his history, as an evidence that this country belonged to the Amorites when the Israelites subdued it. Thus he quotes a common saying about Nimrod, to justify what he writes of his greatness: (see Gen. x. 9.)

Come into Heshbon.] The words either of Sihon calling to his people, or of the Amorites exhorting one another to go to Heshbon, and help to repair the ruins that had been in it by the war, that it might become the royal city of their country. For that is the meaning of the following words.

Let the city of Sihon be built and prepared.] Let that place which Sihon hath chose for his seat be built up again, and made fit for his reception.

Ver. 28. For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon.] Now the poet rises into a rapture, and prophesies the conquest of the whole country by the army of Sihon marching out of Heshbon. For in the prophetical language, the desolations made by war are compared to fire and to the flames, which consume all they come near, (Amos i. 7. 10. 12. 14. ii. 2. 5.)

A flame from the city of Sihon.] This is but a repetition (as the manner is) of what was now said in other words; expressing the certainty of this presage.

It hath consumed Ar of Moab.] He speaks as if he already saw the thing done which he foretold, though it never came to pass. For they did not conquer Ar, which remained in the possession of Moab in Moses's time, as appears from Deut. ii. 9. 18. 29. But, in his poetical heat (or fury, as they speak), he exults, as if they had actually taken the capital city of Moab. For so Ar was; and afterward called Rabbath, and Rabbath-moba, i. e. the great city of Moab, to distinguish it from Rabbath-Ammon, i. e. the great city of the Ammonites. For so we find in Stephanus (de Urbibus), Ῥαββάθμωμα (it should be Ῥαββάθμωβα, as Bochartus hath truly corrected it, in his preface to his Phaleg.) which he calls Πόλις τρίτη Παλαιστίνης ἡ νῦν Ἀρεόπολις. For Ar, as I said, was the old name of it, (Deut. ii. 29. Isa. xvi. 1.) from whence came the name of Ἀρεόπολις, which it retained in later ages.

And the lords of the high places of Arnon.] The masters or owners (as the word baale may be translated) of the high places, &c. i. e. those that dwell in the strongest forts of the country: or, as some fancy, the priests of the places are here meant; or, rather their temple where Baal was worshipped. For we find a place in this country called Bamoth-Baal, (Josh. xiii. 17.) the high places of Baal. And it is evident, this poet triumphs in this Ἐπινίκιον over their gods and their religion, as well as over them.

Ver. 29. Woe unto thee, Moab!] He goes on to foretell the calamity of the whole country.

Thou art undone, O people of Chemosh!] So he calls the Moabites, who served (as the Chaldee translates it) or worshipped Chemosh as their god: for so we read he was, Jerem. xlviii. 7. 13. 1 Kings xi. 7. Judges xi. 24. which St. Jerome thinks differs from Baal-Peor only in name. (See Vossius de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 8.) Some take Chemosh to be Saturn; particularly Scharastanius: the manner of whose worship see in Dr. Pocock's excellent annotations in Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 316. I shall only add, that as the Moabites are called the people of Chemosh, because they worshipped him as their god, so the Israelites are called the people of the Lord and the people of God, because they worshipped the Lord alone. (Judges v. 11. 1 Sam. xiv. 13.) For in the days of paganism, as Mr. Mede observes, every country, nay, every city, had its proper and peculiar gods, which were deemed as its guardians and protectors: from whence the nations themselves are expressed by the name of their gods. That is evident from this place; but it is not so plain, that when God threatens to deliver up Israel to serve other gods, he means giving them up into the hands of the people of strange countries; which he takes to be intended in Deut. iv. 28. xxviii. 64. Jerem. xvi. 16, &c. (See book iv. p. 977.) And so he thinks the words of David may be expounded, (1 Sam. xxvi. 19.) "They have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, saying, Go serve other gods;" i. e. banished me into the country of idolaters. See book iii. p. 823. where this is more largely explained.

He hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity, unto Sihon king of the Amorites.] This is a manifest triumph over their god Chemosh, who was not able to save his worshippers (whom he calls his sons and his daughters, i. e. his children) who were under his protection. No, he could not so much as preserve those that escaped the fury of the sword, but they were afterward taken captive, to make up part of the triumph of Sihon king of the Amorites.

Ver. 30. We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon.] The Hebrew words vamiram abad Heshbon ath Dibon, may as well, if not better, be translated, their light is perished (or taken away) from Heshbon unto Dibon. So Forsterus in his Lexicon, and the Tigurin version, and others. That is, their glory is gone from one end of the country to the other: for Heshbon and Dibon were two famous places in this territory, (Josh. xiii. 17.) And some think this is the place called Dibon-Gad, chap. xxxiii. 45. which was the more noted, because there Nebo, one of their gods, was worshipped: for in Isaiah xv. 2. Dibon is mentioned as one of their high places; and there Nebo is lamented, i. e. their god which was there worshipped; whence Hesychius saith, Δεηβὼν (which, no doubt, is this Dibon) τόπος ἔνθα ἵδρυται ἱερὸν Μοαβιτῶν, a place where the Moabites had a temple. (See Selden de Diis Syris, Syntagm. 2. cap. 12.)

We have laid them waste even unto Nophah.] Another place in that country, as appears by the words following.

Which reacheth unto Medeba.] That is, the territories of Nophah extended as far as Medeba, which was certainly a place in the country of Moab, (Isaiah xv. 2.) But the word reacheth is not in the Hebrew; and the words without it may be thus truly translated, and as far as Medeba. For so the Hebrew particle ascher is sometimes used, to signify simply and, as Eccles. vi. 12. ascher mi, and who can tell, &c. so here ascher ad, and unto, &c.

And here I think fit to note, that it is likely these verses were some part of the history of those countries: for a poetical way of writing was in use before prose, as Strabo tells us, lib. i. Geograph. p. 18. where he saith, ὁ πεζὸς λόγος ὅ γε κατεσκευασμένος μίμημα τοῦ ποιητικοῦ. Πρώτιστα γὰρ ἡ ποιητικὴ, &c. All set or artificial speech (whether historical or rhetorical) was but an imitation of poetical compositions, the ancients knowing no other: Cadmus, and Pherecydes, and Hecatæus, being the first who brought in this form of writing now in use. (See Salmasius in Solinum, p. 841. and Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 55.) However, this is certain, that they who would instruct the people put their lessons into verse, as Strabo there shews; where he says, p. 15. Οἱ Παλαιοὶ φιλοσοφίαν τινὰ λέγουσι πρώτην τὴν ποιητικὴν εἰσάγουσαν, &c. the ancients call poetry the first philosophy, forming our lives from tender years, teaching good manners, governing the passions and actions with pleasure: for which cause the Greeks instituted their children in their cities by poetry, Οὐ ψυχαγωγίας χάριν δήπουθεν ψιλῆς ἀλλὰ σωφρονισμοῦ, not merely for the sake of bare delectation, but to form them to sobriety.

Ver. 31. Thus Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites.] This he mentions again to make it the more observed, that this was the country of the Amorites, into which the children of Israel entered, not of the Moabites, who had been expelled out of it, as was notoriously known, there being a song in every body's mouth which continued the memory of it.

Ver. 32. And Moses sent to spy out Jaazer.] Another city formerly belonging to Moab, but now in the possession of the Amorites, which the Israelites did not take at the first; but after they had conquered all the country beforementioned, they sent some men to bring them intelligence which way it was best to attack that city also, and the country about it. It was not far from Mount Gilead, (2 Sam. xxiv. 5, 6. 1 Chron. xxvi. 31.) and both of them were famous for good pasture, and therefore given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who had much cattle, (chap. xxxii. of this book, 1. 3, 4. 35, 36.) After the ten tribes were carried captive from their own land, it fell into the hands of the Moabites again, as may be gathered from Jer. xlviii. 32.

And they took the villages thereof.] As well as the city itself.

And drove out the Amorites that dwelt there.] If it had not been possessed by them they would not have meddled with it.

Ver. 33. And they turned.] Or returned (as the LXX. have it) from Jaazer.

And went up by the way of Bashan.] A famous mountain (Psalm lxviii. 15.) lying more northerly than the country of Sihon, and belonging also to the Amorites, where was very rich pasture, and an excellent breed of cattle, (Deut. xxxii. 14. Psalm xxii. 12.) and stately oaks, (Ezek. xxvii. 6.)

And Og the king of Bashan.] The whole country of which he was king had its name from that mountain, and was called the kingdom of Og in Bashan, Deut. iii. 10. where he is said, as well as Sihon, to be a king of the Amorites, (ver. 8.) and (ver. 11.) that he was of the remnant of the giants, or of the Rephaim, who were a mighty people in that country of Bashan, (see Gen. xiv. 5.) which in afterages was called Batanæa.

Went out against them.] To oppose their passage.

He and all his people.] With all the men of war in his country.

To the battle at Edrei.] A city near that country, afterward called Adara, as St. Jerome tells us in his book De Locis Hebraicis. He offered the Israelites battle, which, by God's order, they accepted.

Ver. 34. And the Lord said unto Moses.] That he might report it to the people.

Fear him not.] They had reason to be courageous (and not affrighted, because he was a giant), having lately overcome a mightier king than he, of which God puts them in mind in the end of this verse.

For I have delivered him into thy hand, and all his people, &c.] For their greater encouragement he adds his promise, on which he bids them rely, as if they saw it already done, that he would give them the victory over Og and all his forces, and bestow upon them his country. This history Moses reports more at large, Deut. iii. 1—3, &c.

Ver. 35. So they smote him, and his sons, and all his people, until there was none left him alive.] After they had overthrown him and his army, they pursued the victory till they had destroyed all the people of the country; some part of which held out longer than the rest, (as appears from chap. xxxii. 39, &c.) but at length was wholly subdued by Jair, the son of Manasseh, who had all the region of Argob given him for his pains, (chap. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.)

And they possessed his land.] Wherein were sixty walled cities, besides a great many small towns, (Deut. iii. 4, 5. Josh. xiii. 30.) All which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh, (Deut. iii. 13. Josh. xiii. 29, 30. 1 Kings iv. 13.)

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel set forward.] In what month of the fortieth year this which follows fell out we cannot tell, but it is likely in the seventh; when they removed from the mountains of Abarim, (chap. xxi. 20. xxxiii. 48.)

And pitched in the plains of Moab.] Which had formerly belonged to the Moabites, from whom it took its name: but had been taken from them by the Amorites; and now was in the possession of the Israelites.

On this side Jordan.] Unto which river this plain extended: and they pitched near to it, from Beth-Jesimoth unto Abel-Shittim, (chap. xxxiii. 49.) where they stayed, till under the conduct of Joshua they came to Jordan, and passed over it, (Josh. iii. 1.)

By Jericho.] Rather against Jericho, as the LXX. translate it: for Jericho was on the other side of Jordan, directly opposite to the place where they now pitched. And therefore the Vulgar Latin translates, or rather paraphrases it, where Jericho is situated beyond Jordan: i. e. passing the ford, they came directly to Jericho.

Ver. 2. And Balak the son of Zippor.] Who was king of the Moabites at this time; and descended, it is likely, from the ancient kings of that country, (chap. xxi. 26.)

Saw all that Israel had done to the Amorites.] To Sihon and Og, the two kings of the Amorites, (as they are called, Deut. iii. 8.) who were such near neighbours to Balak, that he not only saw, but considered (as the word implies) what a speedy conquest the Israelites had made of their country.

Ver. 3. And Moab was sore afraid of the people.] Lest they should expel them out of their country, as they had done the Amorites: for they knew nothing of God's command to the Israelites, not to disturb them in their possessions. Some imagine, but I see no good ground for it, that they were afraid the Israelites should get possession of the land of Canaan, unto which they thought themselves perhaps to have a better title; being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, who was the son of Abraham's elder brother; for Abraham was the youngest son of Terah. But nobody can see any right that this descent gave Lot or his children; there being no promise made of it by God to any person, but Abraham and his posterity.

Because they were many.] Too strong for the Moabites to deal withal; having conquered those who had been too hard for them, and taken a great territory from them, (chap. xxi. 26.)

And Moab was distressed because of the children of Israel.] As Moses in his song, after they had passed the Red Sea, foretold they would be, (Exod. xv. 15.)

Ver. 4. And Moab said.] By messengers, which were sent (it is most likely) by the king and the princes of the country.
